THE second model carries us back yet another 2,000 years into the past. This is the ancient camp of the Hyksos invaders. Here, again, modern discovery confirms ancient historians. Doubt had even been thrown on the existence of the Shepherd dynasty in Egypt. The explorers have now found scarabs of between twenty and thirty of their kings, and Professor Petrie is able to give a hypothetical but probable construction of their order of succession: It is a civilisation, if civilisation it can be called, which had no cities, strangely different from that of the Egyptians: Not a walled town, but a vast open camp protected with immense ramparts of earth. The men of the invasion were archers; it was with the bow and the arrow they smote the Egyptians. All this and much more may be seen and learnt this month at University College, and the British School deserves the gratitude and the support of those who are lovers of humanity in the far distant ages, whether they are Egyptologists or not.

THE Rev. R. J. Orr, of Belfast, writes to us on the constitution of committees, contrasting the large clerical majority on the General Purposes Committee of the Non-subscribing Association of his district with the equal proportion of laymen and ministers in the Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire.

A LETTER FROM WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.

IN the INQUIRER of May 26 we published an account of the arrival of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones at Wellington, their welcome, and the beginning of his services there. We have since received a letter from Dr. Tudor Jones himself, in which he sends cordial greetings to all friends in the Old Country, to many of whom he would gladly write personally, if it were possible, and tells something both of the voyage out and of the beginning of his work.

They sailed, it will be remembered, on February 8 by the Gothic, and reached Wellington on March 23. At Santa Cruz, five days from London, they were already in a semi-tropical climate, and, after leaving Tenerife, had a glorious view of the Peak, nearly 14,000 ft. in height, with its eternal snow, rising out of the clouds in the evening light.

We lost most of our noisy companions at Tenerife (writes Dr. Jones); they were men of the army, navy, and the golf-links. The "bar" of the ship sobered down after they were gone, and many of us were glad to see them going. Now we had time to know our fellow-passengers. I came in close contact with several of them. A prominent Colonel who was on his way to South Africa was interested in liberal religion and philosophy. We discussed together Unitarian Christianity and Eucken's Philosophy of Religion. He was surprised to hear that the Unitarian Church in England had doors so wide to receive the entrance of modern ideas of science and philosophy. I have now put him in communication with Essex Hall, and when he is back in London he promised he would attend one of our churches.

The chief medical officer of health for New Zealand was also on board, and we became fast friends. As he lives near Wellington, I shall have the great pleasure of welcoming him occasionally to our services. We were but twenty-five passengers in the first saloon, and on Sunday it is the custom to read the Morning Service of the Church of England there. There were two hundred passengers in the third-class, and I preached to them twice every Sunday, except once, when the sea was so heavy that most of them had to retire early. Some of them wished to know to what denomination I belonged. I said that I belonged to the Unitarian Free Church. "Oh!" said one man, "I know. That is the same Church as Gipsy Smith belongs to." The Plymouth Brethren were annoyed because I told the children that there was something divine in their little hearts, and that they should strive to cultivate this by doing the things which are good. An old man came to me and said, "That is a strange doctrine you are giving the little ones. Why don't you preach the fall of man and the total depravity of human nature? A teaching like yours will destroy the children." I am old enough now to know that it is of no use arguing with people of such frame of mind, especially if they are over fifty years of age.

Fine weather continued until we came in view of Table Mountain and Table Bay. It is a glorious view. The ship reached Cape Town late in the afternoon and was to anchor in the bay until the following mid-day. I sent a note to our minister, Mr. Balmforth, asking him to meet me in the morning by the General Post Office. I have heard from him since that he was out of town, and so this pleasure of meeting a brother in a distant land was denied us.

After leaving Cape Town, we were to sail the Easting for three weeks. Fine weather prevailed, and during the whole of this time we saw no trace of any ship or land. We were followed all the way by a large number of albatross, molly-hawks, and what are known as "Cape hens." The land of Tasmania was sighted on Wednesday morning, March 21, and Hobart was reached at 3 p.m. We were to remain here for the night. We were met by Mr. Taylor, the public librarian, who often conducts the services at the Unitarian church there. He took us to his home, and we spent a very happy evening with him, viewing his wonderful private museum which contains many rare things. Unfortunately, Mr. Lovell, the Senior Inspector of Schools for the island, was away. He also has been very faithful in connection with our services at Hobart. Space will not permit me to say anything of the town, or of the wonderful coast of Tasmania, which surpasses in many ways the coast of the North of Ireland. After four more days of stormy weather we sighted the land of the South Island of New Zealand, and at 1.30 p.m. (March 26) we were in the Bay of Wellington.

The Medical Officer of Health came on board and looked at us very carefully. He was on the look-out for consumptive patients. There are very stringent laws about the landing of such patients, and, in fact, when it can be clearly proved that they are consumptive, they are not allowed to land. Professor Mackenzie, of the Victoria University College, came on board the Gothic with the medical officer. He had very kindly come to welcome us—he was the scout of the Unitarians of Wellington. It was a glorious mid-day, but just as the Gothic reached the end of her 13,000 miles a terrific storm of hail greeted our arrival. The hundreds of people on the wharf were pelted, and ran in all directions to seek shelter. The moment the bridge was down, they rushed on board, and large numbers of men, women, and children greeted us. They realised that we had come so far and were unacquainted with everybody. But they took us to their hearts, and although only five weeks have passed since we came, it looks more like five years in so far as friendship is concerned. There is something so honourable and generous about these Colonial people.

On Thursday evening, March 29, they gave us a reception. Mr. and Mrs. Jellie had come all the way from Auckland, and remained over the first Sunday. Another time I may be able to give some account of the speeches of the President, Mr. John Gammel, B.A. (London), who is now in his seventieth year, an ex-inspector of schools, Sir Robert Stout, the Chief Justice of New Zealand, Mr. Jellie, and others.

Five Sundays have passed away, and we have had congregations of about sixty in the morning and between two and three hundred in the evening—an achievement which the most sanguine had not dreamed of. We have collected on Sundays during the month of April the sum of £25. We have had in our congregations Members of Parliament, the Chief Justice, inspectors of schools, professors at the University, lawyers, doctors, business men, artisans, and others. The immediate success has frightened me, but we cannot help it. We have made no noise, and we have only taken the one-inch advertisement in the Saturday papers. If this kind of thing is to go on—and we as a congregation say that it must go on—we shall soon be able to open Unitarian services in several towns in New Zealand. We hold our services at present in a public hall. The people are hungry for our gospel.

Wellington, New Zealand, May 2, 1906.

"A GLORIOUS Church," was the title of the sermon preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood in Boston, Mass., at the American Unitarian Association anniversary meetings. The text was Ephes. v. 27, and the sermon is published in full in the Christian Register of May 24. Mr. Wood was also one of the speakers at the Unitarian Festival in the same week.

IN the interest of the Boston Conference Fund, 1907, Dr. Herbert Smith has just sent to the secretary of every congregation in the Essex Hall Year Book a circular, urging that in the autumn each congregation should devote the proceeds of some one entertainment to the fund, so that in this way all should give a helping hand. So far the total of the fund is only just over £400. The Treasurer hopes that by the help of energetic friends, including the members of the Laymen's Club, a bazaar may be held in London for this object, and the example is commended to the larger churches in other parts of the country.

SPEAKING of "Christian Unity" in a Whit Sunday service, published in the July number of the Mill Hill Pulpit, the Rev. Charles Hargrove shows wherein the only possible unity lies, as follows:—

"That men and women and children should be good and be happy, should be, here on earth, all that they are capable of being, all that God has meant them to be and should be 'saved,' body and soul, here and hereafter—this is the aim, avowed or implied, of every church, and it is in recognition of this common aim, and in uniting in every way to further it, and in goodwill towards one another in all efforts to forward it that the only possible unity lies. This is 'the unity of the spirit.' This is 'the bond of peace.' This is 'the fellowship of our Lord' whose life-work is summed up by his disciple in the words 'he went about doing good.'"

"Let us try each one so to think and feel towards others 'not of this fold' of ours, that we may without ceasing to be Unitarians, be in truth members of that One Holy Catholic Church which God recognises among all our churches, divided as we are from one another by ignorance and prejudice and pride and misunderstandings.

"Let us be Unitarians only in the second place. Our chief allegiance be given not to our own sect but to the large communion of the Universal Church of the Children of God."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES C. COE, F.R.G.S.

"PERSONAL Preparation for the Christian Ministry" was the subject of Mr. Coe's address, with special reference to the period embraced in a collegiate course. He spoke, he said, not as an expert in academic affairs, but from an experience of over fifty years in the ministry. It should be their aspiration, in the words of Theodore Parker, "to do each day's work in its own day," and it would be to their advantage to remember the warning of Wordsworth:

"He who intermits

The appointed task and duties of the day, Untunes full oft the pleasures of the day;
Checking the finer spirits that refuse
To flow when purposes are lightly changed."
And what was true of each day was also true of each successive stage of life. The best preparation for the future was faithful performance of the duties of the present. He did not think that a sense of special call to the ministry was absolutely necessary, but there must be determined faithfulness to duty; and a candidate should give some promise of capacity to perform the functions of the ministerial office, and especially of those gifts which are necessary for the due conduct of public worship and efficient preaching of the word.

They were to be ministers of religion, and vital religion could only arise out of personal spiritual culture, producing personal conviction and personal consecration. Professor Geddes, of Edinburgh, had said: "I remember a saying attributed to the Professor of Divinity which ran through the university like a crack through ice. 'You ask me—What is a theologian? There are two sorts of theologians, those who have read the books of other theologians, and those who have had a personal experience.'" He would not press that particular classification, for it might lead the ignorant to assume that all professors of theology who ex officio read the books of other theologians were devoid of a personal experience of religion, which would be a gross libel, while it might encourage a self-satisfied youth to say that he already had a spiritual experience which constituted him a theologian, and he was not going to sacrifice that in order to become the other sort of theologian. The point on which he would insist was that the study of theology should be made subservient to the cultivation of a spiritual experience; and a spiritual experience should be utilised to the further understanding of the opinions and the mental and spiritual struggles of the theologians who had moulded the views of Christendom. And that was indeed what Professor Geddes advocated, for he went on to say that the essential, the ideal, lay "in the inmost self and in the measure and character of its action and reaction on the vital realities of the subject."

He need do no more than suggest to them how useful they would find such personal realisation of religion in the most important functions of the ministry. They would have to lead the devotions of a worshipping community, and, whether they did so by extempore prayer, or prayer that had been carefully prepared and written down, or through the printed words of an appointed liturgy, the earnestness and sincerity of their personal feeling would be an essential element of efficiency. They would be called upon in private to comfort the sorrowing, the afflicted, and bereaved, and by their silent sympathy or modest expression of their own faith and hope to impart the much-needed comfort and support. They would be called upon to talk with those perplexed by sore doubts and misgivings, and if possible to confirm a wavering faith and secure for a wavering hope the ultimate victory over despair. Every act and thought and aspiration, whereby they cherished a religious life in their own souls would help them to speak the word that should be with power and not return unto them void.

He might take it for granted, he presumed, that most of them were preparing to enter the Christian ministry. Then they would naturally take an interest in the various theories of the nature and work of Christ. They would determine on which of those theories to build their personal faith and allegiance, and whatever intellectual conception they formed, would strive to realise his beautiful character and grow into his likeness. While thus justifying their claim to Christian discipleship, he trusted their sympathies would be extended to those who occupied a different intellectual position, and in spite of differences of opinion, they would not refuse to say: "Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." And he would go a step further, and assume that, like their great Master, they would not harshly criticise those who lived a Christian life and exhibited a Christian spirit, if they declined to be called by his name and enroll themselves as members of his church.

As to subjects for sermons, a clergyman in the Established Church had the natural suggestion of the appointed lessons, the collect, gospel, and epistle for each Sunday. He did not suppose it would be possible to persuade their own congregations to adopt and adhere to one common lectionary; but he advised them to prepare for their future use what he would call a Preacher's Calendar, in which certain days should be allotted to the seasons of the natural year, the great festivals of the Christian year, and the larger materials of the Churchman's Christian year, to the saints and heroes and illustrious men of Biblical and non-Biblical times, to the great events of ecclesiastical history, the sad story of persecution, notably of St. Bartholomew, and of the slow development of toleration; and last, but not least, to the present effort to ameliorate the conditions of national and social well-being, for which such days were set apart as Empire Day, Citizen Sunday, Peace Sunday, Temperance Sunday; and to each Sunday they should allot not lessons, but groups of chapters, so arranged that they should read portions of the whole Bible during the year. In dealing with the Bible in the services of the church, it would be well for them to remember that simple piety looked to it as a source of present spiritual edification. To that end they should read it through as a whole to find those chapters which would be suitable for lessons, and avoid the danger of too constantly reading a few favourite passages.

In working out their sermons they would find help in every branch of literature, but they must not rely on the descriptions of others. They should study nature and human nature at first hand. Then they would find much good in unexpected places, and they would note that the tenderest nature was often concealed beneath a brusque manner. In the composition of a sermon the great thing was to make it interesting. That was no modern idea, for there was a Rabbinical saying of the first century which enforced the same teaching: "In his principles he must be as hard as iron; but, in the expression of them, the scribe whose discourse is not as pleasant to his audience as fine honey in the mouth had better hold his peace." He recalled an incident at one of the Triennial Conferences. While someone was speaking, there issued from the body of the meeting a shrill, penetrating, plaintive, he might say a pathetic, voice, which said: "Could not we sometimes dispense with the sermon?" He ventured to believe that that sad cry found an echo in many hearts. And what did it mean? It meant that it was taken for granted that the sermon was a thing to be endured, not enjoyed, that it was for patient endurance, not for spiritual edification. A friend of his (though doubtless the story was apocryphal) was said to have refused to use his influence to get rid of a minister supposed to be an inefficient preacher, on the ground that the half-hour of the sermon was to him the most valuable in the week, as the one time free from interruption, when he could think out all the problems of his business. On the other hand, a little girl, set to learn a hymn during the sermon, did not do so, because, she said, the minister kept disturbing her so! It was their business to preach sermons which were not trials to patience, which would interfere with those who were thinking of worldly things, and would disturb the child occupied with its own thoughts or tasks by some simple utterance which would go home to its heart, or by some illustration that would appeal to its imagination. There were many ways of making a sermon interesting. The intense earnestness of the speaker would often do it; some public catastrophe or private sorrow known to all the congregation would give a personal interest to the most abstract discourse; and for ordinary occasions the true way was to make the discourse concrete rather than abstract, and to illustrate it by apt simile, by an historical instance, or by quotations in which the thing was said far better than they could say it themselves. They had the highest authority for speaking in parables.

Mr. Coe then added some advice as to the delivery of sermons, and particularly in regard to written sermons, that they should be legibly written, familiar to the preacher, and be not only well read, but preached; and then as to the minister's personal relations as the friend of all sorts and conditions of people.

"Let me remind you," he said, in conclusion, "that you will exercise an influence of which you will yourselves be unconscious, at times when your real nature will be revealed. Speaking of this self-revelation of the inmost character of a man, Dr. Martineau says: 'The enjoyments in which he takes the heartiest relish, the sentiments which raise his quickest response, the occasions which visibly call him out and shake him free, the moments of his brightening eye and genial laugh and flowing voice leave on us an irresistible impression of his sincerest tastes and deepest desires.' At such moments you may reveal a nobler nature than that manifested on ordinary occasions; or one less worthy. In the one case you will confirm and increase a good impression already made; in the other case you may do more than you might suppose to mar your influence for good. Self-culture and self-discipline based on self-knowledge will tend to produce that purity of heart, that constant consideration for others, and that aspiration after the best and noblest, which will remove all fear as to the consequences of unconscious self-revelation.

'In a recent number of the Hibbert Journal we were reminded that St. Gregory said of St. Benedict that he ran away from the schools of Rome, 'Scienter nescius et sapienter indoctus.' You will not be deluded by that quaint saying into supposing that the less you know and the less inclined you are to learn the greater genius you will be sure to prove in the long run. Rather let me advise you to adopt as your ideal the words which Evelyn saw inscribed over the great gate of the University of Padua, words which will have for us a special significance to-day, when we do honour to one of the most illustrious of the students and the teaching staff of this college, and which I will venture to paraphrase thus:—

"So enter that thou mayest daily surpass thyself in learning; so go forth that thou mayest day by day become more useful to thy country and the Christian church: until, in due time, thou shalt joyfully be acknowledged as an illustrious ornament of thy Alma Mater and a conspicuous example of the efficacy of her fostering care."

ABOUT JOHN BROWN.*

THE personality of John Brown is one of those "motives" that either make or mar the artist. It has not marred Mr. Mott. It is not too much to say that what we see of the soldier-prophet in these pages is as convincing as any historical portrait in the long gallery of fiction: This is high praise. Probably if Mr. Mott had selected a milieu of a less dramatic—I was going to say, melodramatic—kind, the book as a whole would have won a high place in literature, for he has the true storyteller's gift, and his people live and move. As it is, the story is all compact of incidents that have a familiar thrill, and very much thrill: While this, however, may cause the judicious grief, it certainly proves an effective medium for bringing the great Captain and the Source of his strength before the eyes of a generation that knows him not, and, for this, every true man and woman must rejoice. The book, it seems, was dramatised in the States immediately after its appearance, and one would give a good deal to encounter John Brown on a London stage, as Wentworth encountered him when "through an opening in the trees he saw some twenty men drawn up in line, and facing them a man of magnificent bearing, standing with uncovered head, and reciting impressive passages from the Scriptures."

The "army" really consisted of thirty. There was "no swearing, no drinking, no smoking." This was in 1855 when Brown, a determined abolitionist, went to Kansas with his four sons resolved to oppose with all the means in his power the establishment of slavery in that territory. With this year and this attempt the story deals, the "crisis," of course, being Harper's Ferry. In marked contrast to the austerity and calm religious fervour of Brown's camp, we have the reckless rowdiness and devilry of the South. Not all rowdiness and devilry, however, for the author has been judicious in showing us slavery under excellent domestic conditions, and the misery of human life under even a "good despotism" is one of the strong points of his book. There are still excellent Virginians—I met one only the other day—who believe in the "institution" of slavery, and regret its abolition from a sociological standpoint. Now few things in Mr. Mott's book are so striking as the way in which the "possession" of one class by another, even by rectors and other heavenly minded people, dehumanises the possessed—yes, and the possessors, too. The condition of the Moses family under the Fairfaxes, and that of the Fairfaxes over the Moses family, should be commended to every anti-abolitionist, whether in Virginia or elsewhere. Slavery, no matter what its conditions, curses "him that gives and him that takes."

But to return to John Brown, who saw this so clearly that he sacrificed all in the interest of what must have seemed to the majority in his day a forlorn hope; his influence on his sons, on Wentworth, and others drawn in like manner to his side is unbounded. More convincing still is his influence over Barbara Fairfax, the beautiful heedless rector's daughter, who, accepting slavery as nowadays we accept domestic service, has not a thought at the opening of the story except for herself and her triumphs. She is not at all an ideal young person, and this, again, is a strong point in Mr. Mott's story, for she ends by being, if not ideal, something far better, really loveable; and the change, though God and Master Wentworth have a hand in it, is really traceable to the glimpses of manhood which she catches in a letter of John Brown's to the said Wentworth—whichever, of course, she has no business to peruse. To "endure hardness" for pure love of the oppressed is a revelation to her, a vision not vouchsafed by desperadoes like Colonel Mendelhall. This is the very touchstone of spiritual genius, the awakenings it effects in souls far removed, geographically as well as spiritually, from the sphere of its activity. Barbara, the careless cynic, and Barbara teaching the women-slaves cookery—for their own good, and not for the anti-abolitionist stomach—are two wide extremes connected by the personality of John Brown.

"I accept you. In the name of the Eternal God, I accept your consecration to this holy cause: You have hold of a great truth when you see that this work means hardship. Few will uphold you in it. Talk, talk, talk, is the whole armoury of most of our northern leaders. Watson, give him food, and find him a blanket.' And the tall figure, straight as a pine, moved away with long, springy strides."

And the recruit, Wentworth, whom Brown thus greeted, had fought his way to the camp through innumerable difficulties and dangers, being desperately wounded, imprisoned, and tortured on the way: He was, moreover, a powerful ally rather than a recruit, a volunteer of whom any leader might be proud. "You have hold of a great truth when you see that this work means hardship!" There is something great about that, something they knew in Sparta and under the Covenant, something we shall all have to get back to before any work is done.

Again: "Under a low hickory tree, a rough walnut slab rested on crossed bayonets. This was the camp mess-table. Men who were not on duty quickly gathered round. Then the Captain appeared and immediately uncovered: 'God reigns! To Him be the glory for ever!' Through the quiet woodland the simple words rang with strange solemnity. The Captain was courteous, but silent. The bread, dried fish, and cold water were not a stimulating repast. The ascetic look on the stern faces about her pricked into Barbara's heart, as though she had in some way a personal responsibility for it. 'To endure hardness, as in bonds with them that suffer.' It was indeed no illusion. At the moment of her departure Barbara intimated timidly, for there was an air about Captain Brown which dissipated all her usual assertiveness, that it did not seem a very luxurious life in the Free State Camp. Brown's reply was brief: 'We are willing to bear more than this, for the sake of the crushed millions who have no comforter.'"

According to the latest revelation vouchsafed our perplexed race, all this is radically wrong. To concern oneself with crushed millions or units is to proclaim oneself an idiot. Let the "superman," i.e., the sophisticated egoist, look John Brown in the face! Superhuman ethics, the latest bid to the gallery of a Cheap Age, become grotesque wherever a man gives his life for men. The verdict of the world is instantly for that man. He kindles again the instinct rendered historic at Calvary, an instinct "in widest commonality spread," the inspiration to suffer and to die for love. Superhumanism could not exist as even a possible thesis were our age one of action and not one of talk. To simple warrior souls who see and do, we owe it that our age has not wholly wandered through pleasantries of "self-development" into unmitigated jungle. Of such souls was John Brown—was, or rather is, for "his soul goes marching on."

WESTWARD IN CANADA:

May 23, 1906:

SIR,—If I remember rightly, I promptly declined your suggestion that I should describe a holiday, and try the patience of your readers by sending you "copy" from the Far West. Probably, by the time we get there, I shall have acquired sufficient strength of mind to keep good resolutions; but at present the luxury of steamship life, and a sudden burst of mid-summer weather strikes at the root of all the virtues, and, after all, this may be a cheaper form of idleness than wasting Kodak films on impossible subjects.

Let me sing the praises of the Canadian Pacific Railway—most wonderful of companies—which took charge of us at Liverpool, and (barring its embarkation arrangements) has conducted us with absolute comfort through a considerable storm and no little fog to Quebec and Montreal; thence in luxurious beds to Toronto, and finally deposited us in a fine floating hotel at Owen Sound on Lake Huron. Truly, we have much to learn at home in the matter of railway travel and accommodation.

In a transient mood of humility we decided to come to Montreal by a steamer carrying only second and steerage passengers, and have been glad we did so, for it brought us into contact with the best of the emigrant class, and gave us the opportunity of getting to know something of the men and women who are making the Empire, rather than those who talk cheap patriotism about it. And excellent people most of them were, with money enough to pay for a second-class cabin, but none to spare on luxuries. Consequently, no drinking, "language," or betting, no dressing-up, and not more noise among the younger ones than there would be in an equal number of young "swells." In a frank and friendly way they would tell their plans and discuss their prospects in the new world. Down among the 1,000 steerage passengers, too, were many nice people, and some brave, bright women making a better best of it than some of the men. One could not but feel that much good human "stuff" was being lost to the old country, which would have stayed had there been a chance of acquiring its own bit of land or achieving its own independence there. Should any of your readers still be shuddering at "second-class steamer," let me add that we had an excellent and roomy cabin on the promenade deck, and food as well cooked as, and more varied than we are used to at home.

Quebec is doubtless a great sight in fine weather in the day time, though its river front is becoming much spoiled by grain elevators, and all sorts of dock arrangements and railway sheds. We saw it through a long evening and a tremendous thunder storm—a glorious sight—which we watched from the well-known battlements; but the unfortunate steerage folks herded straight into their westward-bound train over the streaming wet quay, men women and children, carrying their often too heavy burdens, and dealt with painfully en masse—more happy, however, than a weeping few whom a suspicious doctor quarantined on an island below the town—all their plans upset; and, as the ship's doctor declared, probably nothing the matter with them.

A long day to Montreal, the river banks closely lined with the tiny white houses of the French "habitants," whose farms stretch in long strips from the shores inland. They are increasing much in number, and content with a very quiet and modest prosperity. Their surplus funds must be largely swallowed up in their very numerous churches.

We do not greatly love Montreal. It has the fever of progress, with a big "P," upon it, and much noise and bustle. Yet many of its streets, as to their pavements, and its smoky manufacturing quarter, would disgrace a second-rate Lancashire manufacturing town. But the noble "mountain" park, with its lovely woods and splendid views, and a fine group of university buildings go far to redeem the place. Perhaps with these things under its eyes it will get tired of growing rich, and find time to tidy up a little and become less noisy.

But who shall praise Toronto sufficiently—the Queen City—with its glorious situation on the great lake, its not too large and demonstrative, but eminently busy commercial fringe along the water, and its lovely leafy suburbs, where substantial and often beautiful houses—not large, because of the servant trouble—are almost hidden behind long avenues of fine trees, just now in their full spring glory? Best of all, the Queen's Park, with noble Parliament House, university buildings, statues, trees, and flower beds, makes an impression not easily forgotten. Prosperity tempered by refinement seems to be the note of it all.

This morning we woke on Lake Huron, in a wonderful blue misty world—water, sky, and land melting into one another, and suffused with pearly tints; a very welcome state of things, as these great lakes can be dangerously stormy and foggy. Hour after hour the big boat glides smoothly along, passing an endless succession of great woods.

Here would be much opportunity of moralising on those Indian tribes who once possessed those woods, and the courageous "voyageurs," who, venturing up in their canoes, led the way to the new order of things. One smokes the pipe of peace and meditates, and then—better smoke another and not moralise.

At the end of the lake some sixty miles of lovely river scenery leads to a remarkable place—"Sault St. Marie"—an old trading station, now two busy little towns, one Canadian, one American, with the celebrated rapids just between and above, which have to be dodged by big canals on either side. An extraordinary amount of shipping passes through, more tonnage than through the Suez Canal. The river is alive with all kinds of craft, from great passenger steamers (ours is 2,000 tons) to strange, long, low cigar-shaped grain boats. On each shore are huge grain elevators, works of various kinds—woodpulp, mineral, &c.—"million dollar plants," and all the accompaniments of active commercial life. Yet, on the Canadian side, in full sight, are the ancient forests which stretch almost unbroken to Hudson Bay; while on either hand lie the great silent lakes. Lumbermen bring down their wood to be pulped; miners their ore to be dealt with, a railway runs in from the North and the South; and "The Soo," as it is called, "booms" and grows ugly, and is said to have many drunken sailors and other rowdy persons about it. Out of the great peace you come to it, into the great peace you go from it: Curious and suggestive as it is, you are glad there is not more of it, and that the forests still hold their own.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO PAUL.

"The Gospel of which I was the gospeller is not human. I did not receive it from men. I was not taught it. I had it through a revelation of Jesus Christ."—GAL. i. 11, 12.

God said to a son of God, "Behold, a new thing shall be:

Take power, and create my plan:
Shape water and land, life rooted and moving in land and sea,

And make, in our image, man.
A wretch shall he be: set his pleasure in things that mock, and his pride

In pitiful thought-webs vain;
Give him over a prey to the powers that have hated us and defied,

To confound him, and work him pain."
So the son made souls, and delivered them up to the gaoler Flesh,

And Flesh was the serf of Sin;
And to torture them Law was set with a goad and a steel-wove mesh,

Till Death should gather them in.
And jealous angels and demons foul, in depth and height,

Wrought Hell upon earth with glee;
And God saw all, and waited an age, and withheld his might

From the world, and let it be.
The son said, "Father, 'tis thine to bid,
'tis ours to obey;

But woe is me for the wrong
These creatures suffer, whose life is a grief and a hopeless fray.

How long, O Lord, how long?"
God answered, "Mine it is to command;
to obey is thine.

Go, empty thyself of bliss.
Be born under Law in the Flesh of Sin, and yield thee in fine

To Death. Son, dar'st thou this?"
Then, meek in the might of his love, he faced the infinite loss,

In the Flesh of Sin drew breath, And bled with the goad of Law, and died the Death of the cross

As Jesus of Nazareth.
"O thou that art in obedience first,
first also be

In glory," the Father said:
"The path that thy love hath trodden through Death stand henceforth free

For all mankind to tread!
Thy weakness shall be his power, thy gloom shall become his light,

Thy stooping, his way above;
Nor jealous angels nor demons foul, nor death nor height

Shall sever him from our love."
Now therefore to them that believe there is no more Flesh, no Sin,

No Law with its load and strife,
No Death; for they that die and are buried with him, pass in

With him to the perfect life.

CAN UNITARIANS BE MARRIED IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

SIR,—Is there a theological test legally applicable to those who seek to be married in a National Established Church? The recent extraordinary ruling of the Bishop of London, his refusal to allow American Unitarians to be married in Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, on purely theological grounds, raises this question, and an important issue which ought to be made clear and definitely understood. It is certainly the fact that hundreds of Unitarians have availed themselves of the national parish churches for wedding services; must we understand that in the future no Unitarians need apply for that privilege? The Bishop of London declares that as far as his diocese is concerned it is the duty of vicars to see that only those who were baptized in the Christian Church shall be married by the Church.

Has such a case occurred before? Have any Unitarians actually been refused the services of the National Church for marriage, when the legal licence was already granted, and upon purely theological grounds?

Allow me to record as briefly as possible the actual incident which led to this ruling on the part of the Bishop. I was sent for on Monday, June 25, to attend the wedding of American friends in London, the ceremony to take place at 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning. On my arrival at Euston on Monday night the prospective bridegroom met me, told me that he had made all arrangements for the wedding in the morning at Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, that he had told the vicar he had sent for me as his own pastor in America, and would I go with him to see the vicar and make clear what part I should take.

Of course I at once informed him that the vicar must have supposed I belonged to the Established order of clergy, or he would not consent to my taking any part in a service of any kind in his church. The vicar was not at home, and we were sent to the curate, to whom the wedding service for the following morning had been assigned. The matter of my taking part was quickly set aside, and the bridegroom having all other arrangements completed rather reluctantly consented. The curate, however, then said he could not conscientiously marry Unitarians under any circumstances, and after some courteous but restrained conversation referred us back to his vicar, virtually saying that the vicar might marry Unitarians if he liked to do so, but the curate would not. Neither would the vicar. When we protested that Unitarians were constantly being married in the Established Churches all over the country, we were told that there had been much laxness, but that better things were hoped for. I fancied that the vicar was perhaps an exceptionally prejudiced man, that his view could hardly be in harmony with the generally accepted action of the Church, and counselled application to the Bishop of London. The Bishop was appealed to by wire, but replied supporting the curate and the vicar, adding, however, that he would consider the matter further in a personal conference with the vicar. When this personal interview was brought about the Bishop finally ruled that no professing Unitarians could be married in any church in his diocese, that it was an essential condition of admittance by the Church to the ordinance of marriage that the parties should have been baptized in the Christian Church. None of the legal qualifications were for a moment questioned; the refusal was wholly and entirely upon the ground of Unitarian as opposed to Trinitarian religious faith.

Few other than bishops, vicars, or officials clothed about with the extraordinary harshness of an Established dignity could, I think, have withheld their sympathy from the young couple in such a trying situation. Thanks to the courtesy of the trustees of Dr. Clifford's church, that famous building, which happens to be in the same parish (which the licence required, and no Unitarian church fulfilled), was put at our disposal, and the wedding happily consummated.

But the question we want settled is: Are Unitarians henceforth excluded from marriage in the Established Church unless they conceal their opinions and allow the officiating clergy to assume them to be Church members?

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—No reader of the INQUIRER will refuse to give careful consideration to anything from the pen of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. In this education controversy he speaks with special authority. And yet his criticism of the Education Bill in your columns last week strengthens my conviction that, in the main, the Government are doing the best that is possible in the circumstances with which they have to deal.

Nobody likes Clause 4. Its author, Mr. Birrell, describes it as an excrescence on the Bill. But Mr. Dowson admits that with Cowper-Temple teaching in the undenominational schools it is "almost a necessity." Without Clause 4, or something like it, the Bill could not pass; if it did pass it would break down in administration. The denominational system is too deep-rooted to be abolished at one stroke; and if the Government used or abused their huge majority by trying to force through Parliament a Bill that would satisfy Dr. Clifford and Mr. Hirst Hollowell, they would bring upon themselves disaster more complete than that which overwhelmed Mr. Balfour.

It seems to me, and I hope to many other readers of the INQUIRER, that Mr. Dowson's plan is worse than that which he condemns. As I understand him, he proposes a secular curriculum with the right of entry by all denominations into provided and non-provided schools alike. This is to be permitted on two mornings a week, attendance not to be compulsory during the time of religious instruction. If, as at present, this instruction were given at the commencement of school we may be sure that most of the children would be present, compulsion or no compulsion.

Mr. Dowson dislikes the division of the scholars into sectarian groups, and consoles himself with the thought that the divisions would be few. He thinks the great body of Nonconformists would combine in support of religious teaching such as is now given under the Cowper-Temple syllabuses. If, as is probable, such combined action were organised by the Free Church Councils; Unitarians would be excluded. Parents rarely withdraw children from religious instruction, and we should have to choose between assenting to syllabuses on a Trinitarian basis, or organising classes of little Unitarians two mornings a week. Either course would be objectionable to most of us. It must not be overlooked that, with Cowper-Temple restrictions withdrawn, the general Nonconformist teaching would be more dogmatic.

What of the Roman Catholics? Mr. Dowson thinks that, "as now, they would keep themselves to themselves." This can only mean "contracting-out," a reversion to the status quo ante 1902, with loss of rate aid, consequent impoverishment of schools, and more and more reliance by Catholics on teachers recruited from religious orders. There is a vast number of Irish Catholics in Lancashire and the West Riding of Yorkshire. They are among the poorest of the people. They need a better, rather than a worse, education than they have had hitherto; and I trust that Parliament will never assent to a so-called settlement which would seek escape from a difficult problem by thrusting back these neglected little-ones into permanent disability.

Contracting-out for Roman Catholics, contracting-out for Jews, contracting-out for High Anglicans, sectarian pens twice a week in all schools—can this really be preferred to Cowper-Temple instruction and Clause 4?

Mr. Dowson must know that a secular system imposed upon the nation by statute is for the present impossible. It is said that the vote for Mr. Maddison's amendment did not adequately represent opinion in Parliament or in the country. That may be true. But if public opinion is so strong for a secular curriculum, why is it that the secular system has been abandoned in many towns where it was adopted when School Boards were established? In Rochdale there was no scheme of religious instruction from 1870 to 1892. An undenominational syllabus was then introduced, and though much is said at public meetings here in favour of secular schools, no one ever suggests that the religious instruction given in the Council schools should be discontinued. Is it reasonable to expect Parliament to impose on the country a system for which the localities show no real desire?

Many people suppose that the Bill now before Parliament will compel some sort of religious instruction in all schools. That is not so. The local authorities will be left free to make the Council schools entirely secular. How many of those who now complain that the Government have not introduced a secular Education Bill will lift a little finger to secure the adoption of the secular system in their own districts?

A secular system minus the Bible is hopelessly impracticable. When those who are opposed to what is called religious instruction agree that the Bible shall be kept in the schools they will have taken the first step towards bringing the secular solution within the limits of practical politics. One way to help this forward would be for enlightened men in all the churches to combine to produce a children's Bible—a Bible from which would be eliminated all that is unsuitable or superfluous for school use.

Meantime do not let us be led by the appeal to logic and the argument from despair into supporting a plan which would exclude the poorest of the schools from the national system, and convert the others twice a week into rival and wrangling sectarian pens.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

VIII.—THE SON OF GOD.

"HATH in these last days spoken unto us by His Son"; "The Word became flesh." Thought translated into life is complete and final revelation, and such revelation, it is here affirmed, was given in Jesus Christ.

There are three senses in which the Christ has been regarded as the Son of God—essentially, in being; officially, as the Messiah; ethically, in character—and each of these meanings may be supported independently by passages from the writings of the New Testament.

The mystery of the person of Christ is not solved by substituting one genealogy for another. Let the miraculous birth be explained away; the miracle of the life will remain. It is the life itself, as much as its mode of entrance, that challenges human experience. "Who shall declare his generation?" There are plants which hold to the earth by a thread, and need no more, for they are fed by the light and dew of heaven; so, at the point of attachment to this present world, a life may be human, but by that one point we cannot explain the whole. The human form is only the outward manifestation; it is the spiritual power of such manifestation, not the physical process, that is the fact and starting-point. God's highest revelations of Himself are given through soul to soul, through the media of human relationship, and there is no reason why, in the fulness of time, there should not have been added to these a supreme revelation and a perfected relationship. This is well expressed by the words which speak of "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Historically, the Christian profession has always involved the acceptance of a personal claim made by Christ, but it is impossible, from the testimony we have, to determine the extent of that claim, as originally and actually made. It is described by the Evangelists as ranging from the simple pronouncement, "Ye call me Master, and ye say well, for so I am," to the assertion of more than Messianic power to forgive sin, to be Lord of the Sabbath, to come in the clouds of heaven, to raise men up at the last day, to judge them, to pass sentence on them. Nor is it of any avail to trace, as we think, the growth of Christologies, if we leave unexplained the depth and fervour of that spiritual affection out of which the worship of Christ arose. Humanitarianism has not yet assigned an adequate cause. Deal as we may with the particular expressions of personal claim in the Four Gospels, the acknowledgment in other parts of the New Testament of all that is there claimed is not to be disputed. Love of Christ burns steadily still, and with as pure a flame; two thousand years have not dimmed its force; it has entered into the strength of the world's strongest men, giving deep and masculine expression to their love of God. In the presence of mystery it is best to keep religious silence.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE Norwegians have just celebrated the coronation of their King and Queen, and it has been a time of great rejoicing, for Haakon VII. is the first king who has reigned over Norway alone, for many years, and the people naturally feel that it is a very important event in their history. In 1397, the three countries, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, were united under one king. The agreement which united them bound them to be ready to help one another, while it left each country free to be governed according to its own laws and customs. If this agreement had been faithfully and loyally carried out, the kingdom of Scandinavia would probably have strengthened and prospered, and taken a high place among European powers, but it was not kept, and the national strength was wasted in quarrels and wars among themselves. Then, after a time, Sweden separated herself, and Norway became practically a province of Denmark. It was a wretched time for poor Norway; and in 1814, after she had been through many troubles, a fresh union was formed between her and Sweden. The two countries were now under one king, but the spirit of independence in Norway seemed to grow with the years. Oscar I., who came to the throne in 1844, gave Norway a flag of her own, which, however, as a symbol of the union between them, had the mixed colours of both countries in the upper corner. Under Oscar's son Charles, Norway flourished more and more. Her trade increased; greater religious liberty was granted; and the telegraph was introduced into the country. Charles was succeeded in 1872, by his brother Oscar II., who is still reigning in Sweden, but the Norwegians were not content without complete independence, and this they have now gained. Last year they chose Prince Charles of Denmark as their king, and he has just been crowned under his new name of Haakon.

What qualities do you think they looked for in the king they were to choose? A king's work is very difficult, and very responsible. He is in a position of great influence, which he may use well and wisely, or just the reverse. If he is to do all the good that a king may do, he must be strong, brave, true, good, wise, unselfish, tactful and full of sympathy, and those qualities are not gained easily. The king must first have a high ideal of what his life should be. He must aim high, and he must not lose heart if he sometimes fails, but must go on trying perseveringly to be to his people what a king ought to be. And the people have duties too; they also, must aim high, and be true and loyal to their ideal, if the nation is to be a real power for good in the world.

But it is not only the kings and queens of countries that require all those fine qualities we named. They are needed quite as much by the kings and queens of everyday life. Do you wonder who those kings and queens are? Go and look in the looking-glass, and you will see one of them. Yes, it is quite true; you are a king or queen, and you have a kingdom to rule; and for ruling it well, you need all those qualities which King Haakon will need for ruling Norway.

I was speaking once to the head-master of a school, and I asked him about one of the teachers—whether he taught and managed the boys well, and whether the boys liked him. And the head-master replied, "Yes, he is a good teacher, and he is very popular among the boys; they will do anything for him, and they respect him, for he has perfect control over his temper." That was indeed high praise. I wonder of how many of us it could be said that "we have perfect control over our temper"; but it is worth gaining even at the cost of some trouble, for "He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city."

I think the following verses by Miss Alcott will help you to realise your kingdom, and your duties as a king or queen. She was quite young when she wrote them. She was naturally a very passionate child, but she tried hard to control her temper, and it was after some occasion when she had given way to passion, that she wrote these lines:—

"A little kingdom I possess,
Where thoughts and feelings dwell;
And very hard I find the task
Of governing it well;
For passion tempts and troubles me,
A wayward will misleads;
And selfishness its shadow casts
On all my will and deeds.

"How can I learn to rule myself
To be the child I should—Honest and brave, nor ever tire
Of trying to be good?
How can I keep a sunny soul
To shine along life's way?
How can I tune my happy heart
To sweetly sing all day?

"Dear Father, help me with the love
That casteth out all fear;
Teach me to lean on Thee and feel That Thou art very near;
That no temptation is unseen,
No childish grief too small,
Since thou with patience infinite,
Dost soothe and comfort all

"I do not ask for any crown
But that which all may win,
Nor try to conquer any world
Except the one within;
Be Thou my guide until I find
Led by a tender hand,
Thy happy kingdom in myself,
And dare to take command."

TEACHERS IN COUNCIL.

THESE weeks bring together a number of interests, to which it is difficult to do justice at once in the space at our disposal. From a fortnight ago we are completing this week the report of the close of the session at Manchester College, with an account of the Visitor's Address; and there are the proceedings at the close of the session at both the Unitarian Home Missionary College and the Presbyterian College at Carmarthen, the reports of which are waiting to come in; but this week we furnish at least the beginning of the report of another session, which, we trust, will be of special interest to our churches throughout the country. In the present position of the Education question, the work of religious teaching in our Sunday-schools ought to be recognised as of supreme importance; and anything that may help towards strengthening that work, and raising it in the estimation of the members of our churches to its due place of honour and consideration, is deserving of most cordial welcome. And such is certainly the Summer Session for Sunday-school teachers which has just been held at Manchester College, Oxford, with results on which its promoters must be warmly congratulated.

"Kindly express to the friends and fellow-workers whom you gather together my deep sympathy with their purpose, and my hope that their days in Oxford may strengthen and enrich it." So Dr. CARPENTER wrote in a letter of greeting to Miss PRITCHARD and the assembled teachers: "May the happy companionship and the wise and instructed counsels of the next week bring help and encouragement to all." That hope has been amply fulfilled. The high aims of the work, the true methods for its effectual accomplishment, and, above all, the spirit of earnestness and happy fellowship, which must prevail among those who give themselves to such work, have been admirably demonstrated throughout the session. We commend the report to the attention of all who care for the welfare of our schools and churches and the religious education of the children.

SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS

THE fifth summer session for Sunday School Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, which opened on Friday, June 29, has been continued throughout the present week, concluding with the last meeting of "Teachers in Council," and the mid-day luncheon on Saturday. The first two sessions were held in 1899 and 1900, and since then every other year has seen a similar gathering. The form of programme adopted in the first instance has been maintained throughout, and fully justifies the foresight of the promoters of the session. No longer a new departure, it is one of the best things the Sunday School Association has done of recent years. In the morning a brief devotional service, and then two lectures, with an interval, and after the common mid-day meal in the College, afternoons devoted to seeing Oxford and the surrounding country, and evenings to social gatherings or conferences on practical aspects of the work. Such is the general idea of the session, which this year has been once more carried out with the happiest results. The first of the two lectures each morning has not, indeed, been so uniformly academic as in previous years, but there has been abundant material for the quickening of thought and the stimulating of teachers to further study. The attendance was close upon a hundred teachers (with a few other interested friends), of whom not quite a third had taken part in previous sessions. Schools from many parts of the country were represented, and from Ireland and Scotland: Dublin and Holywood, Glasgow, Bath and Bristol, Hull and Scarborough, Sheffield, Bolton, Manchester, Liverpool, Leicester, Rotherham, Monton, Chowbent, Oldham, Nantwich, Dukinfield, Leicester, Norwich, Plymouth, and others; Oxford and London, of course; forty-three in all. The weather, it is true, offered to the assembling teachers a thorough baptism of healthy rain, but before the first morning was far advanced the sun was out again, and up to the time of writing these notes there has since been beautiful summer weather.

OPENING SERVICE.

The session opened on Friday week with a service in the College chapel at 10 o'clock, conducted by the Rev. James Harwood. The hymns were Dr. Sadler's "To God most high, draw nigh," Lynch's "Dismiss me not thy service, Lord," and at the close, "Come, labour on." The lesson included the praise of wisdom in Proverbs viii., and the parables of the wheat and the tares, and the leaven in a measure of meal.

In the address, which he said would have been given by their old friend, Dr. Blake Odgers, as President of the Association, if he could have been there, Mr. Harwood began with a word of welcome to the teachers present. He had gladly accepted that invitation to speak to them, for he had delightful memories of a previous session in which he had taken part. If there were any grumblers in their churches—he did not say there were, but if there were—the best prescription he could suggest to them would be a week of Oxford Summer Session ozone, followed by steady exercise in their Sunday-school.

Speaking in the course of his address of the future of their work in the Sunday-School he said that he had no fear for it. Methods might change, but the great aim remained unaltered, to cultivate goodness; and whatever they might think of the present controversy over the day school, the religious atmosphere in the true sense was essential to a Sunday-school. To this end they must dwell on what is great and noble in life, and in doing so they could not be too concrete. And he went on:—

Abstract qualities seem very abstract when you want to touch the springs of life; but let them be embodied in a living, or even an imaginary person, and the appeal to the heart will not be in vain. "The only knowledge," said Dr. Martineau, in the last book he published, "that can really make us better is not of things and their laws, but of persons and their thoughts; and I would rather have an hour's sympathy with one noble heart than read the law of gravitation through and through. To teach us what to love and what to hate, whom to honour and whom to despise, is the substance of all human training, and this is not to be learned from the magnet or the microscope, from insects born in galvanism, and light polarised in crystals, but only among the affairs of men; from the rich records of the past, the strife of heroic and the peace of saintly souls, from the great thoughts of great minds, and the sublime acts of indomitable conscience. The soul takes its complexion and its true port from the society in which it dwells; it lives with the living and dies with the dead, and no intimacy with rocks and reptiles, however enlarging to its conception of the world, can lift it to its dignity and warm it with its proper glow; but only communion with the prophets, the patriot, the sage, the martyrs of the cross. It is the grand fault of our modern education that we limit it to the mere knowledge of things, and, except where the Scriptures save us from such blight, bring the scholar's mind into scarce any admiring contact with pre-eminent persons. We teach him the grammar, the forms of speech, but few of the things most worthy to be spoken. We teach him the seas and lands, the rivers and mountains of a dead or empty world, but of the histories they have passed there, the proud passages of his country's life, the good men that should be as the beacon in his path, we too often leave him in ignorance. We lost the true notion of human culture when we threw away 'The Lives of the Saints.' The type of excellence which they held up was not, indeed, the right one, or worthy to be preserved in the place it claimed; but until they be rewritten with a better selection of examples, and be made the manual and favourites of the cottage and the school, all our education will multiply the force without greatly mending the character of our society."

In the spirit of this admirable passage I have often wished that we stirred the enthusiasm of the scholars in our Sunday schools by familiarising them with the lives of good men and women—not alone those who have achieved great distinction, but also those who in the common ways have left a sweet fragrance behind them, I am not, of course, forgetful of the excellent biographies written by Miss Cooke and published by our Association: I wish they were used more frequently, and that we had more of them. It seems to me that if every young men's class in our schools were to take up the "Life of William Rathbone," a nineteenth century saint nurtured in our own household of faith, they would not only incidentally learn much about citizenship and public questions, but would also have their spiritual life stimulated by the infectious power of a fine example. I say nothing about the Life of Lives, whose study is taken as a matter of course in our schools. But in the cultivation of what have been called "the minor pieties" there is, I am persuaded, a great opportunity for both strengthening and elevating character, and for quickening loyalty to our own religious communion. Thank God, the hearts of the young, at any rate, beat faster at hearing the story of those who have lived for conscience and for God:

I congratulate you on the time in which your lot is cast. Though feeling a natural sympathy with those who talk of the good old days, I am a strong believer in the better new days. I sometimes catch myself wishing that I had been born when my children were. I don't remember ever wishing that I had been born at the time of my father or grandfather. Mind, I do not say that we are better than they; that is a difficult question to settle. But, if we are not better, the fault lies not in the times but in ourselves, and in the neglect of those very things which it is the business of Sunday-schools and other religious institutions to look after. Never were the possibilities of life, its resources, its opportunities, in the aggregate richer than they are to-day. We have the accumulated experience, knowledge, thought, ideals of all the generations that have gone before; the powers of nature are yoked in our service to a degree never hitherto reached. The question of questions is, whether we are going to prove equal to the great position to which as a nation and, shall I add also, as a religious community, we are called? Have we the open mind and heart to profit by the divine teaching of events? Mere lingering over the past will not save us; like the Father of the Faithful we must be ready at the call of God to go forth, even though, like Abraham, we know not whither we go.

At first sight it may seem a far cry to these great results from the work of a Sunday-school teacher; but it is not really so. Every life that has been touched to finer issues—and such, we rejoice to know, are to be found in every Sunday-school—is a help towards the establishment of the Kingdom for which we pray. Go forth, then, in faith, and hope, and love, and may the Father of all richly bless your efforts in His service.

THE FIRST LECTURE.

"Teachers' Ideals" was the subject of the first lecture by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool, given after the opening service; "Teachers' Ideals, and How to Get them Home." When the invitation came to him to give that lecture, Mr. Roberts said, he was reading the history of Humanism in Europe, and was interested in the effect of the New Learning on teachers and teaching and taught. He read of one learner that he was a born teacher whose one interest was his scholars. He was a tireless student, yet he warned his scholars "that all learning is harmful which is gained at the expense of piety"; and of another who insisted that all education should be primarily moral, and should affect the character alike of teacher and taught. That was the ideal he wished to emphasise. For the Sunday-school teacher especially character was the supreme thing. For a good teacher, and, above all, a good religious teacher, certain qualities were essential—zeal, faithfulness, self-consecration, and personal aptitude. Method, training, experience, all were good, but they would not make a good teacher without those other fundamental qualities. For the Sunday-school teacher especially could not afford to consider the information imparted during the short hour on Sunday as the only or the chief part of his work. His great function was to influence the character of the child, not the mind only, but the character through the mind. And that he would do, not only by what he said and how he said it, but much more by what he was. Nothing influenced character like character, so the great question in Sunday-school work was not only what was taught and how it was taught, but what sort of persons they were who taught. Matter and manner were important, but the man all important.

Thus, for a good teacher, among necessary qualities, he would put first a good temper, the habitual attitude of cheerful forbearance and self-control. Not good temper by fits and starts, but habitual good temper.

And here we quote from the lecture verbatim:—

I am not going to sketch the ideal teacher to you; I will only select and touch upon one or two of the qualities which help in his making: and I do think this virtue of cheerfulness is one of them. With some of us it is a difficult virtue. Our temperaments are against us; we are inclined, it may be, to look on the dark side, or we are "nervy," as we say nowadays, irritable, worried, touchy.

This sort of disposition is apt to make us say hasty, injudicious words. Often we don't altogether mean them, but they do harm all the same. If we will recognise that all this is a real misfortune, not only in the teacher, but in the man, teaching may become a splendid discipline for us ourselves. If we will take pains on our own account, and force ourselves to practise self-command, I think more and more that cheerfulness is a capital thing in dealing with children. For think what children are—young and strong as yet, lighthearted and looking after happiness by virtue of their youth, and often in spite of their circumstances. "By all means respect the happiness of a child," says someone. They are of the new birth. It takes so little to make a heaven of happiness for a child! I am not speaking of what are called pleasures, or enjoyments, or things that cost money; but just the genial cheerful atmosphere in which child-nature blooms and expands.

They do not always breathe it in their homes, some of these poor little Sunday-school scholars. All the more, therefore, let them look for it habitually in the Sunday-school, and associate it with the person of their teacher. It will teach them the great lesson that to have a strong, serious purpose in life need not mean dullness or moroseness, and that to be good does not mean to be unhappy. So the good teacher will never have absent from his mind the blessed ideal of being happy and of making happy, if only for the Sunday hour, and this is bound to tell upon his children.

For all other qualifications will fail of their best without this. One hears it said sometimes of some gentle personality, "He, or she, has a wonderful way with children," and it just means that there is perfect sympathy with the little ones, their natures and their ways, even when they are trying ways. To get ideals home to these possessors and wielders of trying ways is our object, the very reason of our being. Sympathy with a child means the power of projecting one's own mind into the child mind. It is to see with the child's eyes, to understand the child's point of view, to get into the atmosphere of the immature intellect, and see how things look in it; to be, in fact, always young one's self.

To some people, you may say, all this seems absolutely impossible. We all know people who, though not ancient in years, seem to have been born such centuries ago that they have quite forgotten their childhood; and none are quicker in perceiving it than the children themselves. They cannot reason about the deficiency, much less define it; but they are soon conscious of it. It is not too much to say that the person who has no sympathy with children and who cannot put himself into the child atmosphere should not attempt to be a teacher. I know the superintendents will say, "We must get teachers for the classes somehow," and I quite appreciate the difficulty. But still I say that he should not teach to whom the infinite possibilities of a child's nature are hidden things, who only sees the husk of it, may be, a rough and unattractive exterior, but who is powerless to perceive and foster the qualities that may be latent behind it, who cannot hope with a child, think with a child, love with a child, wonder with a child—be the moulder of a new, fresh soul.

Sympathy has faith, faith in the child and faith in the work, in spite of discouragements, and they will come; we must make up our mind to that.

And note that by sympathy I do not mean merely a kindly sensibility or a sentimental pleasure in children. It is not just an easy benevolence which seeks gratification. Something of these it has, but it is very much more. It is not a readiness to praise or reward. Children really only value praises and rewards for their rarity.

No; it implies your own power to look back upon your own child life, and remember yourself as you were then; to look into the young lives of your pupils by the light of your own.

We were all children once, even the oldest of us. How strange it is to some of us to think so!

I would not discourage not eliminate teachers from the already too thin line;

but I would try to show, in fact, I affirm that the teacher must have this power of drawing to him, which is in teaching what chemical affinity is to the atoms of the material universe.

If you ignore this power, for I think you have it, even if you do not know it, you leave unworked the greatest engine we have; you put yourself outside the orbit of active good.

And sympathy will lead you, knowing your own memories, to ask what recollections your pupils will come to have of you and your teaching in the years to come.

Because, remember, these recollections will not, in all probability, be of the lesson you have consciously given them.

They will forget them, or most of them, but they will remember you, your personality, the spirit in which you taught them, the purpose and motives which were seen to actuate you.

Children are astonishingly keen and accurate in their judgment of people in any kind of authority among them.

They can discriminate between earnestness and fussiness, between kindness proceeding from love, and easygoingness proceeding from weakness; between solicitude for their good and solicitude for "personal clat or apparent success.

All this about you will have become one of their mental possessions. What a solemn question it is—What impressions are we and our characters making on the plastic minds of the children, the future men and women, who are shortly to take our places in the procession of life?

Do you remember how Emerson, in one of his essays, refers to those who felt in listening to Lord Chatham that there was something finer in the man than anything he said. That is the crux, I think. What behind all our words and all our doings and all we appear and achieve, what about the real "I" behind? Is it greater or less than our words? Is there a reserve force, a latent power—in a word, is there the Divine in the human? If there is, it will tell surely upon our children. Never mind the halting speech or the lack of culture. Character will tell more than scholarship. They will feel it there. That, and that only, will write itself silently and irreversibly on their hearts.

After all, there is something more comprehensive than "Do good," and that is "Be good." That is the greatest power in the world.

Speaking further of direct religious teaching Mr. Roberts reminded his hearers that it was from them that many of the children would get whatever knowledge of truth and moral obligation and love might lead them to the conception of a noble life, and earnestly impressed upon them the greatness of their calling.

Sunday-school teachers, he said, deserve well of their country, and should be honoured for their devoted work. And so the lecture concluded:—

To a large extent the religious future of the nation is in their hands. What splendid hope for England if they could, and would, grasp this—that it is not catechisms, not dogmas, not any sort of churchianity, but righteousness which exalteth a nation. If they, the young men and women teaching in our schools, could have the vision of the

Truly that was a wise man who said, "Without the vision the people perish." Keep your eyes open to the vision, young souls who strive to reach the souls of the children. Follow the gleam!

Think of that great Teacher whose name you love, and whose ideals are the sweetest in the world. For he, too, drew the children round his knee, and took them in his arms, and made the child-mind the very type of the kingdom.

And he left his work begun to be carried on by simple souls; not learned, not full of curious knowledge, not great like himself; men whose only fitness seemed to be their passionate love and belief in him, and their desire to do his wishes.

Lowly, poor men they were: men of humble employment and insignificant status, called out from their mean stations to the greatest work in the world—to "allure to brighter worlds and lead the way," to be pioneers—wondrous thought—to that kingdom of heaven.

And this is a parable for you and for me. We are called from many places in life: from the profession, from the office, from the shop, from the home, from work, and from ease, because in our ears has sounded the "cry of the children"; called to be, we also, "fishers of souls." For, remember, it is a call, whatever may have led you to listen. It may have seemed accident or circumstance; it may have been conviction of the great need for the work; it may have been a casual invitation from friends; it may have been undertaken unthinkingly; and it may have been a yearning desire to do some good to the little ones.

Whatever it was, you are called; "called and chosen"—it is for your heart to finish the familiar words—and "faithful." "Called and chosen and faithful." Splendid motto for valiant ones in the army of right and of God.

In that unique chapter, called of John—it makes no difference who wrote it: that man, whoever he was, saw "the vision," and was dazzled by "the gleam"—we have a picture of the Master, yearning over his future teachers; agonising in prayer that they shall be worthy—these called to be "fishers of men."

They, poor souls, follow his eyes, wistfully, trying to catch a glimpse of the ideal he sees. And as he points their gaze to their fellows and up to God, bearing their labouring souls on the strong flight of his own, he exclaims—let us echo the Master's cry in our own hearts, we who take the children by the hand:—

"For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified through the truth."

SATURDAY AND SUNDAY.

The first day of the session ended with a very pleasant reception by Dr. and Mrs. J. Edwin Odgers, in the College Library, and then, on Saturday morning, after a brief devotional service conducted by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, Mr. Ion Pritchard gave the first lecture, which was a most interesting account of the visit which he and Mr. Tarrant recently paid to Palestine. In the evening, after the conference, Mr. Pritchard also showed the lantern slides of Palestine, which may be had for lectures, on loan, from the Association.

The second lecture that morning was by Mr. E. F. Davidson, M.A., of Oxford, one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, on "Points for Teachers to Remember." It was a thoroughly practical address, often lighted up by vivid and amusing illustration.

The first essential, he said, is good discipline. If the children don't attend, they cannot learn anything. If there is habitual disorder in class more harm than good is done, for it is the training of character rather than the imparting of knowledge, that is the great thing. The class must be made to feel from the beginning that the teacher is master, and this is to be done by quietness and firmness, not by shouting and scolding. Then followed three good rules. Be in all respects alert, and insist on equal alertness from the children. Be definite, not vague. Be just and consistent in your dealing with the children.

(1) Alertness in Teacher and Taught.—The teacher must be able to see all the children; none of them must be behind him in the class. Keep your eyes open, and see everything that is going on. Do not pass over any single piece of disobedience or disorder. Deal with each individual case as quietly as possible. Keep the whole class awake. Do not ask questions round the class in turn. Let them never know who will be asked next, so that all must attend. Do not mistake perfect stillness for attention, but see that it is your subject they are thinking about. Do not allow simultaneous answering. Do not repeat a question for those who did not hear, or they will not learn to hear properly. Do not think that the way to teach is to lecture. Make the children take part by answering questions. Education is not pouring information into the children, but training them to make efforts for themselves. "Telling is not teaching."

(2) Clearness and Definiteness.—Do not make too many rules, but be sure they know what rules are made, and make them all obey. Do not be variable in discipline if you can help it. Have a steady control, and be the same to all the children. Obey your own rules, especially in the matter of regular and punctual attendance. The lesson must be carefully prepared, with clear purpose. Have definite knowledge, and where you do not know frankly confess it. Children are quick to see through all pretence.

(3) Justice. Do not show special favour to any. Above all, keep your temper. Do not worry or nag. Never indulge in sarcastic remarks on those you reprove. In punishing avoid all hastiness. Do not expect the children to keep still for too long together.

The most effective teacher is the one who knows his pupils out of school. It is good to train them in acts of practical helpfulness. Do not waken noble emotions and let them lead to nothing. To collect money for a distant society, the object of which is not very clear to the children, is not so good as the doing of some simple act of kindness close at home.

Clearness and definiteness is necessary, not only in discipline but in the actual work of teaching. There should be in the school one guiding and controlling mind, and each teacher should carefully prepare the work. Do not try to do too much; do a little thoroughly, and constantly recapitulate, and be sure that the children know what has been done. Let them have the pleasure of discovering things for themselves. If an infant is always carried in arms, it never learns to walk. Have a clear scheme of the lesson. Let the scholars know what it is to be about. Find out what they already know of the subject, and connect the teaching with their previous knowledge; that stirs interest. Correct their inaccurate knowledge. Go slowly and take one thing at a time. Use simple language and not foreign words. Be sure they understand the meaning of the words. In all these things never forget that the one supreme end is the training of character.

On Saturday evening the first of the meetings of "Teachers in Council" was held, when Mr. J. C. Ballantyne introduced the subject of the Code Book, and a useful discussion followed. These are among the most valuable and helpful meetings of the session. Thus on Sunday evening there were two meetings devoted to the subject of Social Morality, the one for women, conducted by Miss Marian Pritchard, which took the form of a service in the library, with an address; the other for men, conducted by the Rev. J. L. Haigh. Then on Monday evening the subject of Temperance was introduced by Mrs. Leighton Tucker, and on Wednesday that of Guilds and similar societies, by the Rev. F. K. Freeston.

Sunday morning saw the College chapel filled by a congregation such as seldom gathers there, and the singing of the hymns was delightful. The service was conducted by Dr. Odgers, and the opening hymn was Watts's "O God, our help in ages past." The lessons were from Deuter. xxx. and 2 Cor. iii. The hymns before and after the sermon were Samuel Longfellow's "I look to Thee in every need," and "In life's earnest morning."

In the sermon, which had as text Eccles. i. 4 and 5, Dr. Odgers said that looking back over forty-one years of his own ministry, he remembered a sermon preached by his father, after he had been forty years in the ministry, and it led him to the thought of the great changes that had taken place in their conceptions of religion, changes for which they had reason to be very thankful. The centre of gravity in doctrine shifted, even while the formularies of the orthodox churches were kept unchanged. The emphasis had shifted from the Atonement to Incarnation, from a ransoming death to a quickening life. The conception of Divine revelation was now of an energy inspiring and interpretative, unifying human effort and making it all part of one progressive salvation, a charter of life in which they were all to have a share. Thus the new orthodoxy was giving back to the church the Johannine view, which all the ages of Evangelicalism had overlaid and forgotten. Revelation was no longer regarded as superseding and stultifying human faculty, but the natural and spiritual were blended without noise or conflict in our progressive life. Religion was not something alien to fallen humanity, but the spell of natural attraction, an upward looking towards the light, which enabled man to see the infinite relations of his life. There were the great heights of truth, and while a man could not attain to them all, he yet loved those eternal hills.

Dr. Odgers then proceeded to speak more fully of our present apprehension of the truths of religion, in which faith and reason both have part. There is now a much deeper human interest in religion and in the human history of Christ; and there is a wider application of salvation, through an enlarged feeling of the brotherhood of men, and through channels of Divine grace even beyond what the churches can effect. It is to the salvation of the world that we now look, and not the salvation of a handful out of the world. We recognise the reality of truth and goodness in God and man, and there is continuity of life here and hereafter. It is a present God in whom we trust, whose creation is continuous, and His truth in the heavens above and the earth beneath and in the heart of man. His love touches us not merely in one divine humiliation of centuries ago, but as ever with us in our weakness, temptation, and trials, handing as it were a cup of cold water to the tired soldier of Christ, and binding up the heart wounds that have been gotten in His service. His mercy touches us, like the healing touch of Christ; His judgment is not in one final last Assize, but is judging us every day, making us know the solemn truth in ourselves. All these Divine things are operative in all life, and in the simple experience of the humblest soul. These are but imperfect hints of what there was in the sermon touching the deepest things of life, with a faith that was full of hope and thankfulness.

In the afternoon the children of the Sunday-school at the Charles-street Institute were brought to the college, and assembled in the chapel, where Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, acting as superintendent, opened school, and gave an address. The children, about eighty in all, were then divided into five classes, which were taken in various rooms, the girls by Mrs. Haigh, Miss Pritchard, and Miss Hilda Pritchard, the boys by Mr. Jessell and Mr. W. H. Ballantyne, and the infants by Miss Grace Spears. They were model lessons that were given, which many of the teachers had the privilege of attending, and afterwards the children all together sang one of Mr. Hugh Atkins' musical settings of the Parables. At the close Miss Pritchard gave the children tea (or, rather gallons of milk and other things) in the garden of the residence, and they enjoyed themselves immensely.

THE WEEK'S LECTURES.

Of the ten lectures given this week we can offer here only the briefest notice, but we shall hope to have some further notes next week. The first lecture on Monday morning was by Dr. Odgers on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," of which most interesting document he is preparing an edition of his English translation, with notes and introduction, which is very soon to be published. The first Tuesday lecture was by the Rev. Alfred Hall, on "James Martineau: Some Points of his Teaching." The lecture dealt with Dr. Martineau's ethical teaching, and at the close Miss Pritchard spoke very warmly of it, and said that she should suggest its publication to the Association Committee, as a useful companion to Mr. Hall's little book on Martineau. On Wednesday and Thursday came the Rev. C. Hargrove's New Testament lectures, "How the New Testament came to be one Book," and "The Three Gospels and the Fourth," and on Friday a lecture by Dr. Crothers on "The Teacher as a Learner." The second lecture of the morning is, as a rule, less academic in character. On Monday Miss Pritchard spoke of "The Bible in Class Teaching," on Tuesday the Rev. T. P. Spedding gave an address on "How to Meet the Secularist Spirit among our Young People," amending the title to the more general secular, as better describing his meaning; on Wednesday the Rev. J. Robinson gave one of his delightful talks on "Rock Pool Dwellers," which he illustrates with so much skill on the black-board, and during the day exhibited to the teachers a number of wonderful and beautiful things under his microscopes. The second Thursday lecture was by the Rev. J. J. Wright on "The Sunday School from the Scholar's standpoint," and that on Friday by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, on "Tennyson's Idylls; Gareth and Lynette."

The afternoon excursion by river to Nuneham on Tuesday was made in perfect weather, and as we write there is the same promise for the Blenheim excursion on Thursday. On Wednesday two very pleasant garden parties were given by Mrs. Odgers and Miss Davenport Hill. Every day of the session has been thoroughly enjoyed, and many teachers have had the opportunity of seeing something of Oxford for the first time under the happiest conditions.

THERE is no silence more docile than the silence of love, and it is indeed the only one that we may claim for ourselves alone. The other great silences, those of death, grief, or destiny, do not belong to us. They come towards us at their own hour, following in the track of events and those whom they do not meet need not reproach themselves. But we can all go forth to meet the silences of love. They lie in wait for us, night and day, at our threshold, and are no less beautiful than their brothers. And it is thanks to them that those who have seldom wept may know the life of the soul almost as intimately as those to whom much grief has come; and therefore it is that such of us as have loved deeply have learnt many secrets that are unknown to others; for thousands and thousands of things quiver in silence on the lips of true friendship and love, that are not to be found in the silence of other lips, to which friendship and love are unknown.—Maurice Maeterlinck, in the volume, "The Treasure of the Humble," translated by Alfred Sutro.

IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE annual meetings of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians were held on Wednesday, June 20, in All Souls' Church. Divine service took place at noon, when, in the unavoidable absence of the President, Rev. Wm. Napier, the sermon was preached by Rev. James Kennedy, of Larne. At two o'clock the annual business meeting took place. The Rev. Principal Gordon took the chair, and constituted the meeting with prayer, after which the roll of ministers and elders of the various presbyteries was called by the hon. sec., Rev. J. Kennedy.

Principal Gordon said he took the chair as the oldest ex-president in the unavoidable and much regretted absence of their president, Rev. Wm. Napier, and his business was simply to call upon them to elect a successor to Mr. Napier in the presidency of the Association. He would ask the secretary to read the nominations.

It was announced by the hon. sec. that the presbyteries of Antrim, Bangor, Armagh, and Templepatrick had nominated Rev. W. H. Drummond for the presidency.

Principal Gordon said it would not be improper, he took it, if the Association would desire to put on record its sympathy with their president under the circumstances of close domestic affliction which had prevented him taking his place there that day. He thought he expressed the feelings of those whom he addressed when he said, in regard to the devotional service and the very impressive address to which they had listened that they had lost nothing by Mr. Napier's absence save the aroma of age and experience which age and experience alone could give. It was a regret to them that they had not been able that day to listen to what might almost be called publicly and officially the farewell utterance of their deeply venerated friend. Mention had been made at the previous day's meeting of the loss which they had sustained in the untimely death of the Rev. A. B. Hamilton, in the ministry of Banbridge. They felt also very closely the loss of the late minister of Moneyrea. He was speaking no secret when he said that had it not been that they all desired to render due respect to the Rev. Wm. Napier, their friend Rev. Richard Lyttle would have been appointed their president last year. It was thought that a time had come for a representative as president of one of these congregations which were not associated in the Presbyterian way. While they had differences with Mr. Lyttle they had simply added to the endearment with which he was regarded. Always trustworthy and gentle, they looked upon him as a friend to every cause tending to the advancement of his fatherland and his ancestral faith. He was sure they would join that day in expressing by resolution their sense of the deep and grave loss which had fallen upon them all by his removal to another and better world. Just in passing, to turn from the darker to the brighter side of the past year, it had been a year marked by earnest, and, in some quarters, enthusiastic endeavours for a fuller and more perfect union. They were indebted to Dr. John Campbell, the worthy son of a worthy sire, the representative of long generations of Presbyterian staunchness and vitality, for calling them to their sense of unity. With those few remarks he called upon some member of the Association to move the appointment of a successor to the Rev. Wm. Napier.

On the motion of the Rev. R. M. King, seconded by the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, and supported by the Rev. R. J. Orr, Mr. Drummond was then elected president, and took the chair.

President's Address.

Rev. W. H. Drummond, having returned thanks for the honour the Association had done him, said: Let me ask you to consider for a few moments the relation of the fundamental principle of our Association as expressed in its title to the present doctrinal tendency in the larger churches by which we are surrounded. We find a growing recognition of progress in theology, of the unimportance of many things which were considered formerly to be essential, of the need of doctrinal reconstruction. With this there goes necessarily considerable uneasiness of conscience in face of the rigid demands of subscription, and a plea for larger liberty for the clergy to think and to accept what for many of them are the proved results of thought. Declaratory acts and broad Church interpretation of ancient formularies are only tentative measures; they are palliatives for inconsistency, but they are no real cure for the present distress. In face of this tendency to push inconvenient questions into the background, and to make light of serious credal obligations we should raise our voice and make our position clear. And we have a right to do it with all boldness, for we are not a small company of theological faddists, or an upstart growth of yesterday. We are a genuine branch of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; its history is our history, and we perpetuate an attitude of tolerance and freedom of thought, which was long a characteristic of the Irish Presbyterians, till upon an evil day the church was purged of its liberal leaven, and the majority declared that the Westminster Confession of Faith should be the infallible rule of Christian faith and practice. It is open to us to plead that, while we have lost much in effective organisation and the kindling influence of numbers by our enforced severance from the larger body, the loss has not been only upon our side. Some victories are won too dearly, and it is easier to bind fetters on the soul than to throw them off in the day of larger vision and juster judgment. Slowly the forces of liberalism are gathering in strength. The demand for freedom to advance, which we have enjoyed for so long, is the one that cannot be resisted. It is the time for us to stand firm and to be proud of our history and to uphold our principle of non-subscription boldly in the interests alike of intellectual sincerity and of spiritual effectiveness in face of the needs and problems of the world in which we live. But when I use the term "spiritual effectiveness" am I not inviting the most damaging criticism? We have dreamed dreams, we have thought lonely thoughts, we have claimed liberty in creed and conduct to the utmost; but we have failed to be an effective religious force or to make any strong popular appeal. Can we, in the main, deny it? Are we satisfied to remain just as we are? Have we said all that can be said when we speak of the great difficulties to which a dispossessed minority is exposed, surrounded as it is on every side by stronger and more popular churches? I am not going to dwell upon what has happened. It is written down; it cannot be altered. Is it not human for Churches as well as for men to make mistakes and to repent of them at leisure? But behold! now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation. It is not what our forefathers did or omitted to do which concerns us, but the pressing duty of the present moment. In our loyalty to our principle we have neglected our machinery. Those things ought ye to have done and not leave the others undone. The lake lying in the bosom of the hills reflects the heavens in its clear waters and gladdens the lonely traveller with its beauty; but if it is needed to bring health and refreshment to the cities of men, you must call in the engineer and cut channels and keep the ways of communication open. The water of life must be brought from the uplands of the Spirit by human means; and it is better that we should co-operate in making channels for it than that we should go, any one of us with his separate vessel, and bring down just what we want for our private use. It is true that it may mean some curtailment of individual freedom, and the primitive way of Jack and Jill is certainly more adventurous; but freedom which means the dissolution of social duties and corporate bonds cannot be tolerated in a civilised community, and I will venture to breathe the suspicion that such freedom has not the ultimate value for religion that some people have supposed. Of this at least there can be no doubt, that in the fever of life men require a plentiful supply of living water, and they are not likely to leave their necessities in the hands of a committee with a deeply rooted prejudice against machinery and water engineers: I confess that I grow a little tired of the false antithesis between spiritual life and Church organisation, for I am not an Anarchist even in religion. The attempt to live on a plane of superiority to the elementary conditions of human existence always brings its own defeat. No one can carry it out quite consistently. Even the Quaker has his forms. After all, the quarrel is not between life and machinery, spirit and letter, but simply between the old methods, which we like, because we know them, just as some people have an unalterable attachment to old and threadbare clothes, and the demand for something more adequate to the real needs of life. Have we the courage to make ourselves efficient? Have we sufficient faith in our message and its value for the world? Do we believe enough in the accession of strength and gladness which closer corporate union would bring to us to make the attempt? "God buries His workman and carries on His work" is a sentence as true of Churches as of men. Churches are the temporal instruments for the accomplishment of an eternal purpose. The cause of Christ's kingdom does not depend upon the success or failure of any of the partial embodiments of the Christian Gospel. We may weakly decline our responsibility or drop out exhausted from the fight, and the cause will still go marching on. But these unseen issues are in other hands than ours, and as yet we have received no providential sign that the hour of our dismissal has come. Our successors have not yet taken the field with more persuasive lips to speak our message and stronger hands to carry our flag to victory. We have still our part to play; let us play it with all the earnestness and skill of which we are capable. God still needs us for His work; let the sense of this Divine compulsion animate us with courage and the spirit of sacrifice. No detail of organisation or of mere machinery will seem insignificant to us when we have grasped the truth that effectiveness may be part of godliness. Everything will fall into its true rank and subordinate itself to our central purpose. It will seem a great thing to bring the healing waters of life from the heart of the mountains to the valleys and plains where men toil and suffer and die, and we shall recognise that it is our bounden duty to do this with the skill of hand and heart and brain, with the best adjustment of means to ends, which long experience has taught us is essential in all practical human affairs. We have yet to prove the extent of the service which an ordered and organised freedom can render to the cause of Christ's Gospel and Kingdom among men. Its unrealised possibilities of good should give us faith and courage for the task to which we have set our hands.

Further Business:

At the conclusion of the President's address the Rev. J. Kennedy was re-elected hon. secretary, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly treasurer, and the report of the General Purposes Committee was adopted. The report referred to the death of the Rev. Richard Lyttle and the departure of the Rev. D. Walmsley, from Belfast. In the matter of organisation, Dr. Campbell's lecture given at the last meeting of the Association had been printed and distributed through the congregations. A committee representing the different presbyteries and the unattached congregations had been appointed, and considerable progress had been made. It was believed that there would be practical unanimity on the question.

The report of the Orphan Society, which was adopted, contained the following:—"The Governors of the Orphan Society, in presenting their nineteenth annual report, have pleasure in being able to set forth the usual satisfactory account of the year's work. The income from all sources for the year ending March 31 amounts to the sum of £365 6s. 2d., which is made up as follows:—Subscriptions, £209 6s. 2d.; bank interest, £3 17s. 5d.; and dividends on invested capital, £152 2s. 7d. This, the year's income, together with the balance of £256 15s. 7d. brought forward from March 31, 1905, gives a total of £622 1s. 9d. for the year under review. The balance carried forward to next year's account is £350 13s. 9d., the expenses for the year are £23 18s., and £247 10s. have been paid in grants to orphans. It will be observed that the present income is smaller than that for the year 1905. One reason for this is to be found in the fact that about two-thirds of our congregations have this year each made a smaller return, and another reason is that one congregation—viz., Moneyrea—because of special circumstances, does not appear on the list at all. Nine congregations have slightly increased their subscriptions, and it is intimated from Moneyrea that we shall be able to include their list for this year in our report for 1907."

The Sunday School report, which was also adopted, contained the following statistics:—"The total number of scholars returned as on the rolls during 1905 in 36 schools is 1,590, as against 1,567 in 37 schools for 1904. Comparing returns of those schools which made them in 1905 with those of 1904 from the same schools there is a net decrease of 56 scholars in average attendance in those schools (30 in number). The average attendance of teachers in similar comparison is the same as in the previous year. In 24 schools there are 262 scholars over 16 years of age. Out of 23 schools making returns teachers' meetings are held in 11. Twenty schools have libraries, with a total number of 5,108 volumes."

The Temperance Committee and the Theological Library Committee's reports having been passed, resolutions of sympathy with Mr. Napier, and of sorrow at the deaths of the Revs. Richard Lyttle and A. B. Hamilton, were passed. The Rev. W. H. Drummond was nominated as dean of residence at Queen's College, Belfast.

At the conclusion of the business the annual dinner at Ye Olde Castle Restaurant took place, when the toasts, concluding with "The President," were duly honoured.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

THE annual meeting of members was held in All Souls' Church, Belfast, on Tuesday, June 19. The moderator, the Rev. J. J. Magill, of Rademon, preached the sermon, and, after the roll call, by the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, to which a large number of ministers and elders responded, delivered his address.

The year, he said, had not been eventful, but good work had been quietly carried on. The need for closer union had been brought before them a year ago by Dr. John Campbell, and the opinion in favour of better organisation seemed almost unanimous, provided existing interests could be safeguarded. It would place in their hands the means of solving many of the difficulties of their denominational life, and might help them in making more widely known the truths for which they stood. The Remonstrant Presbyterian Church (if that was the name finally chosen) they might hope would bring new life to their scattered congregations. The views generally associated with the Unitarian name were now finding wide acceptance. Whatever might be the outlook for their denominationalism, the outlook for their teaching was never so bright. They might well take fresh courage. Their lives must prove that the spirit of Christ was in their hearts.

The Rev. W. G. Marsden was then elected as the new moderator, and took the chair. The Rev. J. A. Miskimmin was re-elected clerk. Various accounts were presented and adopted. The income from the Sustentation Fund for the year was stated as £603 16s. 9d. A resolution in memory of the late A. B. Hamilton was passed; and also resolutions on Temperance and Peace.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT HOSPITAL HOME.

THE annual meeting was held at Dr. Williams' Library on Monday afternoon, Mrs. Homan, of the L.C.C. Committee of Education, in the chair.

The report, which was read by Miss Marian Pritchard, recorded a good year's work. The 51 children cared for at Winifred House had almost, without exception, made good progress. An average of 17 beds had been occupied throughout the year. Of 14 children under treatment in the hip and spinal department 9 had been restored to health. After consideration it had been decided to slightly modify the name of the Home, and to call it now a "Convalescent Hospital Home," as more strictly defining its character.

FINANCE.—Your committee would have been glad to have been able to report that the ordinary annual income had balanced the ordinary outgoings: but alas! this happy state of things has, as yet, never been attained, and were it not that, from time to time, some special gift, or legacy, comes to the treasurer's assistance, our accounts would show a yearly deficit of a full hundred pounds. As, however, this is a source which cannot be relied upon, your Committee feel much anxiety, especially when, as at present, the reserve fund is diminishing so steadily; and they therefore earnestly invite all who believe in the good work of the Home to strive to increase the number of its friends and supporters. And in this direction an excellent example has been set by our President of two years ago. Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, who gave herself most earnestly to the task of making the Invalid Children's Home better known among people likely to be interested; writing some fifty personal letters, and arranging for an At Home at Winifred House whereat these new friends might see what was being done there; with the result that thirty fresh names were added to our list, producing £11 in new subscriptions, besides £7 17s. in donations. Your Committee wish to take this opportunity of thanking Mrs. Blake Odgers and her co-adjutor, Mrs. Henry Gow, for their valuable assistance, and would like to commend their example to friends in other neighbourhoods.

The Sydney Cot, the Edie Cot, and the Amy Cot, the Brixton Cot, and the Young Day's Cot are still provided for; the two last by Sunday schools, their teachers and friends; and your Committee are glad to take this opportunity of thanking the generous unknown donor, who adds £25 to the amount collected at Effra-road Church and School; and to the Rev. J. J. Wright, who allows "Aunt Amy" a corner in the Young Day's Magazine, in which to tell all about Winifred House to its youthful readers.

Thanks to various friends the children have enjoyed several treats during the year. A tea at Highgate, drives now and again, festivities on special birthdays and at Christmastide, mark the year's Calendar with many a red letter; and perhaps chief of these, because it comes once a week, is the Wednesday morning's visit from Miss "Berfer," as the children love to call their visitor, who has, now for some years, come with unfailing regularity to give "needlework," bringing with her the most fascinating collection of fancy work of a true kindergarten type, suitable to the individual powers of each child. It is a pleasure to see the pride and joy with which a finished needle-book, or mat, or bookmark, is brought out and displayed with triumph, as a gift to be given next Sunday to father or mother, as the case may be.

Truly, our Home is rich in friends! Not only can we note it by glancing through our list of subscribers, but also by recalling the numerous gifts of clothes and toys, and flowers, and other things that come in from time to time. This working together, this fulfilling of the Gospel of Togetherness, as Edward Everett Hale calls it, helps to minimise trouble and anxiety, and to increase the joy of service, and therefore the Committee, officers and staff alike, all feel deeply grateful to the many friends of Winifred House.

Thus, "toiling," "rejoicing," and sometimes, but happily not often, "sorrowing," the workers of Mrs. Hampson's Memorial Home continue on their way glad to know that their chief officer, Miss Emma Hope, is still at the head of affairs, guiding, nursing, mothering her large little family with devotion and skill; for so long as that is the case they feel sure that Winifred House will continue to hold an honoured place among the Homes devoted to the care of Invalid Children.

The accounts, which were presented by Mr. Blyth, the hon. treasurer, showed subscriptions £374 10s., donations £82, and a Hospital Saturday grant of £25. Patients' maintenance fees (4s. weekly) produced £177 10s., interest on war loan £6. The total expenses were £786, more than £100 more than the regular income; but £100 War Loan had been sold out for £98 10s., and a balance of £140 10s. from May, 1905, was thus reduced to £118, showing the serious need of more annual subscriptions.

Mrs. HOMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke of the thoroughness of the work done at the Home, which results in the mental as well as the physical improvement of each little inmate, and expressed the earnest hope that the necessity for drawing on the small reserve fund will be obviated in future by a substantial increase in the subscription list. She also dwelt on the fact that by helping such homes as Winifred House we helped many other societies to carry out their work. Hospitals needed such homes, the Invalid Children's Aid Association could not get on without them, and the Charity Organisation Society constantly required just this kind of help for many a household which comes to it for assistance.

Dr. URBAN PRITCHARD seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mrs. BLYTH, who seconded a vote of thanks to medical officers, lady superintendent and staff, told of a little girl who, on returning home, spoke of the happy time she had had, and specially dwelt on the puzzles that had been lent to her to put together. Mrs. Byth said that she felt that Winifred House was full of puzzles, chief of which was the puzzle as to how they managed to get so much sunshine into the Home, for it was a well-known fact that more sunshine was registered there than in any other spot in or around London.

Miss M. PRITCHARD thanked Mrs. Homan for presiding, feeling that it was an honour to have the chair filled by one who was spending her life in work for children.

DR. CROTHERS AT BIRMINGHAM.

THE Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., was on Sunday last presented with an illuminated address by the congregation of the Old Meeting, Birmingham. The interchange of pulpits has proved a most successful experiment on both sides of the Atlantic. The address was as follows:—

To the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., Harvard, U.S.A.

DEAR DR. CROTHERS,—As members of the congregation of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, we desire to record our sincere and grateful appreciation of your ministrations during the months of May and June, 1906, when our own minister, the Rev. Joseph Wood, occupied your pulpit in America. Your presence among us has once more shown that an occasional interchange of pulpits can be beneficial and stimulating to congregations as well as to ministers. In our own case we acknowledge with thankfulness both the pleasure and the advantage which we have derived from being privileged to attend your services.

We sincerely hope that you and Mrs. Crothers will carry back with you to your distant home some agreeable memories of those who count themselves as among your friends here, and, in conclusion, we trust that in your future journeys to the old country you may find opportunity to revisit our church, when we can promise you always a most cordial and appreciative welcome.

On behalf of the congregation.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Mansford-street Mission.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from the Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal-green, E.:—"I shall be grateful if you will again allow me to ask your readers for subscriptions to our Convalescent, Excursion and Country Holiday Fund. Heavy demands are made upon this fund in the summer, when it is so desirable to send people away into the country, even if it is only for a day; and at present the balance at my disposal is very small. I should also be glad to receive subscriptions to our Window Gardening Society. Last year we had rather a heavy adverse balance, but some kind friends of the Mission have paid that off, and it would be pleasant now to add some new names to our list of subscribers, that we may not again get into debt."

Ainsworth.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday by the Rev. W. G. Schroeder, M.A., of Sale. There were crowded congregations afternoon and evening. Special anthems were rendered by the choir, under the leadership of Mr. Jas. Mason, and Mr. A. J. Wilson officiated at the organ. The collections amounted to £40, an increase of about £5 over last year.

Cardiff.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on Sunday, June 24. In the morning the preacher was the Rev. W. Whitaker. In the evening a Service of Song, "The Story of Joseph," was given by the children. Mrs. Whitaker gave the connecting readings.

Ditchling.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when thoughtful and inspiring sermons were preached by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, of Islington. Many friends gathered from Lewes and Brighton, and the day being pleasantly fine, a very happy and stimulating time was passed. Luncheon and tea were provided at the neighbouring hostelry, and the afternoon was spent by rambling over the downs or in the meadows.

Douglas, I.O.M.—Unitarian services are being arranged for the summer season, to be held in a hall at the Gymnasium, in Upper Douglas, in the vicinity of Finch Hill, off Bucks Road. They are under the direction of the Missionary Conference, and will begin on July 22nd. The place of meeting is central, and should be found without difficulty by visitors. It is earnestly hoped that visiting and resident Unitarians will make an effort to be present at the services, which are to be held morning and evening, and will extend over eight Sundays.

Nottingham: Christ Church (Farewell).—On Sunday last the Rev. William Lindsay concluded his ministry of more than seven years at Christ Church, Peas Hill-road. At the afternoon service the secretary of the Sunday-school (Mr. F. O. Hallott), presented to Mr. Lindsay, on behalf of the teachers and scholars, a splendid gold Albert, with expressions of warm regard and gratitude. Afterwards Mr. Lindsay kindly entertained the teachers to tea in the school-room. The improvement in the school and the success of its several institutions has been entirely due to the energetic and business-like way in which Mr. Lindsay has conducted the work. At the evening service Mr. Lindsay preached his final sermon from the text: "And there shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit, and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him." After the evening service Mr. Lindsay invited all present to a reception in the school-room, and personally said good-bye to all present.

Windermere.—Local Unitarians and visitors to the Lake District will be interested in hearing that the Missionary Conference has made arrangements for another series of services to be held on Sunday mornings at 11 o'clock, and extending from July 15 to September 16. They will be held this season in the Institute, Bowress, situate in North-terrace, as the hall at Windermere, owing to a legal prohibition, has been withdrawn from our use. The whole of the services will be conducted by the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, B.A., now resident at Windermere.

Yorkshire Ministers' Union.—A meeting of the Union was held at Mill Hill, Leeds, on Tuesday, June 26, Rev. C. Hargrove presided. Sixteen ministers were present. Mr. Hargrove kindly offered to open a discussion on "Some Ministerial Difficulties," at the next meeting, on July 24. Ministers were afterwards entertained at lunch, at Roundhay Park, by the kind invitation of Mr. George E. Verity, also at tea, in his own house. A thoroughly enjoyable day was spent. On the motion of the Rev. C. J. Street, seconded by the Rev. Ottwell Binns, a cordial vote of thanks was given to Mr. and Mrs. Verity, for their kindness and generous hospitality.

Yorkshire Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union.—On Saturday afternoon, the half-yearly meeting took place at Elland, the president (Mr. James Thompson, of Pudsey) presiding. After the reading of reports setting forth the work done by the Leeds and district, and also the Sheffield branches of the Union, the supplying of pulpits, &c., tea was served in the Elland school-room, kindly presided over by ladies connected with the Elland congregation. Arrangements had been made for conducting an open-air service on a plot of land near the Elland town-hall, by the lay preachers, somewhat on the lines of the Unitarian Van Mission. A lorry had been provided, and also a harmonium and a number of the Elland choir led the very hearty singing of upwards of 100 persons who had assembled. The Rev. John Ellis, the district minister of the Yorkshire Union, presided, and opened the meeting with prayer. Earnest addresses were given at intervals by the chairman the Rev. H. Cross (assistant district minister), of Dewsbury; Mr. Fred Clayton, of Leeds; Mr. T. Manning, of York; and Mr. J. Thompson. A portion of Scripture was read by Mr. F. Blackwell, of Sheffield. Each speaker emphasised the more salient and distinctive points of the Unitarian faith, to which the people listened with marked attention. Unitarian literature, tracts, &c., were distributed.

Sermons on Different Subjects, by Rev. F. F. Carmichael, LL.D., Canon of Christ Church, and Chaplain of the Magdalen, Dublin. These sermons are of the Broad Church type, and of excellent quality. We quoted recently one passage from this volume on the cruel destruction of beautiful birds for the decoration of women's hats, and will add here another quotation. "Some people talk as if the world was growing worse and worse every year. Our judgment in that respect depends on where we look. If we look but in one direction, we may say it is an idle, frivolous, luxurious, good-for-nothing age, thinking but of amusement and selfish enjoyment; or else it is a sceptical, infidel, irreligious, Godless age, with a literature base, sensual, and impious; or else it is a self-admiring, self-contemplating, self-congratulating, self-advertising age, in which hysterics is mistaken for genius and men are taken at their own measurement; an age of muddy poets, shoddy novelists, and knavish politicians. But in all such estimates we note only the diseases of the age. Its real life is full of health and living interests, of beneficent designs and movements, of great inspirations and sense of world-wide duties, of devotion to the cause of humanity—the rescue of the wretched and debased, the protection of the innocent, the training of the young, the bringing of us nearer and nearer to the ideal of Christ." (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis & Co. London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

ERRATUM.—In last week's INQUIRER, p. 432, third column, line 18, for very factor read benefactor.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE First Church in Plymouth, Mass., the Church of the Pilgrim Fathers, is to celebrate on Wednesday, August 1, the tercentenary of the first gathering of the Church at Scrooby. There will be a morning service, and after luncheon a communion service, conducted by the Rev. John Cuckson, the present minister of the Church, assisted by others, "to which Christians, of whatever name or creed, are cordially invited." The thoughts of many in this country will be with their brethren on that occasion. The following passage is from the letter of invitation from the Church to which we would gladly have responded, had it been possible, with more than this word of cordial acknowledgment and sympathy—:

"The old First Church sends greetings to its kindred on the occasion of the 300th anniversary of the gathering of the Church of the Separatists in Scrooby, Nottinghamshire, England, the mother church of the Pilgrim Fathers, in 1606.

"It is meet that honour should be paid to the brave and faithful souls who, driven by cruel necessity and in obedience to conscience, left home and friends to dwell in a strange land, and who finally, by the providence of God, crossed the Atlantic in the depth of winter, settled on these shores, and in 1620 founded Plymouth Plantation. They brought with them a church of their own order, and a charter of civil government.

"The church organised in England went from thence to Holland, and at Leyden there was duly set apart a branch of the parent community, which was sent out with blessings and prayers, to be planted wherever the Pilgrims might land. It has preserved continuous records, an unbroken ministry, and the original covenant of faith.

"The anniversary services will be held on Wednesday, Aug. 1, at the First Church, when addresses will be delivered by His Excellency Curtis Guild, Jr., Governor of Massachusetts; the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., Chaplain of the United States Senate; the Hon. John D. Long, LL.D., ex-Governor; Professor Edward C. Moore, Ph.D., D.D., Parkman Professor of Theology, Harvard University."

THE Christian Register, of June 28, writing of the First Church in connection with this celebration at Plymouth, has the following note:—"This church during the last century became Unitarian by slow degrees, without violence, without controversy, and without disruption. During the period in which the change occurred there was no hint of disloyalty, dishonesty, or breach of trust on the part of the members of the First Church and parish who had received their inheritance from the fathers and believed that they, in their administration, were loyal to their spirit and to the spirit of truth. Later controversies do not change the facts of history. Exactly similar changes are now taking place in orthodox parishes that might be named; and there is every reason to believe that, in New England at least, Congregationalism will soon freely admit the right of the congregation, when it moves together freely and harmoniously, to worship the God of their fathers in a way that seems most honourable to him and edifying to themselves."

WHEN we turn from the debates on the Education Bill in the House of Commons, to the new "Code of Regulations for Public Elementary Schools," we do so with feelings of relief. For the new Code has really to do with education, into the scheme of which it introduces several ingenious alterations. Some of these are likely to have a far-reaching effect, and are recommended to the consideration of all who are concerned with the influences through which the children of the people grow to manhood. The first change to be noted deals ostensibly only with a matter of administrative mechanism. The rule under which every school must be visited by an inspector at least once a year is withdrawn. "He may forego such a visit for a year or even longer, in the case of any school which was in a satisfactory condition when last visited, if he has good grounds for believing that its circumstances have not undergone any material change."

THE advantages anticipated are partly of a technical character. The inspectors will thus be set free (1) for more frequent visits to inefficient schools; (2) for larger and comparative inquiries into special problems in particular groups of schools, or into special or improved methods of teaching. These reports, it is rightly supposed, should be of more value to the local authorities than the brief and formal reports of a perfunctory annual inspection. The chief significance of the regulation, however, is different. It marks a further step away from the old and now discredited payment-by-result system, and it seems calculated to encourage initiative and enthusiasm among teachers. It is a milestone on our long road from the ideal of instruction to that of education.

THE most welcome and valuable of all the changes, however, deals with the subject of character formation, which is indeed the paramount ideal, but is now almost for the first time recognised as even a legitimate branch of the school curriculum. The Minister of Education is apologetic (unduly so, we should have thought): "It will not be disputed that the time-table for a public elementary school may properly provide for regular instruction in the principles of individual, social and civic duty." It is good to have even a beginning of recognition of the work of social and civic life, and although the beginning is a timid one we trust it may lead to larger thoughts in the future. The curious proviso that in giving such lessons teachers should "guard against doing or expressing anything in the least subversive of the authority of religion," must be a reflection upon the temper of certain advocates of "moral instruction" as a substitute for the customary religious lesson. Certainly no wholesome moral teaching can be subversive of religion.

ANOTHER provision has to do with the organisation of games: Organised games may be played under the supervision of master and mistress during one afternoon in the week and may count as a school attendance. The Introduction to the code points out with perfect truth how "children who take part in properly organised games will learn, among other things, to 'play the game,' to give and take,' to devote themselves to, and efface themselves for, a common cause, to feel pride in the achievements of others, to accept victory with becoming modesty and defeat with due composure, and, speaking generally, to acquire the spirit of discipline, of corporate life, and of fair play." These are great qualities. If the child possess them, he can succeed in life with honour, or if he fail, as many will, he can do so without dishonour. The method of corporate play does foster these virtues, and is a delightful thing in itself. It is of undoubted value for the development of character. We must only hope, and indeed we are confident, that the excessive public school over-valuation of games will not also find a way into our elementary schools. The proclamation of the ideal of corporate play is in itself sufficient to make this a memorable code.

An admirable letter appeared in Tuesday's Tribune on the subject of "Non-conformists and Secular Education," by the Rev. F. R. Swan, who is a Congregational minister at Marsden, near Huddersfield. Mr. Swan pleads for consideration of the wishes of Churchmen as well as Nonconformists in the matter of religious teaching. We quote the concluding portion of his letter;—"The only fair, just solution of the problem is secular instruction during school hours and facilities for all churches in all schools at their own cost outside school hours. But secular education is not anti-religious; in its deepest sense it is religious. It is time we gave up being frightened by the word 'secular.' The reading of a few verses, or singing a hymn, or teaching a creed, does not make a school or a scholar religious. The religious tone, influence, atmosphere, must be in the ideal, in the character of the teachers, in the justice, kindness, discipline, and unselfishness manifested. That is the true 'religious atmosphere.' A secular education which included not only intellectual instruction, but the drawing forth of the Divine spirit within the child, the development of the higher nature, the teaching of reverence, honesty, courage, duty, justice, kindness, honour, all that tends to make a child a noble citizen—such an education, I say, even if called 'secular,' is religious, for it is the revelation of the Christ spirit within. If our education does not mean that, and involve that, it is no good; it is an offence against the child. For education is for life, not simply for a living. Such a religion ought to be taught by State teachers, because the very existence of a true social body called a State depends upon such a religion. This is not religion in the ecclesiastical sense, but I submit that it is religion in the human sense, religion as Jesus lived it, and if Parliament has a mandate for anything, it has a mandate for securing such a religion for our children, and such a religion is a child's religion. Is it too late to decide for this Christian-secular education?"

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—I have read with much interest Mr. Hadley's courteous reply to my letter, and ask to be allowed to add a few words of rejoinder in explanation on certain points. I take no exception to his statement that I admit Clause 4 to be almost a necessity in a Bill based on Cowper-Templeism. I regard the Bill as hanging together; and, accordingly, I am aware that to get rid of Clause 4 we must first get rid of Cowper-Templeism. But, so far from desiring a one-sided Bill to suit the Bill's most extreme Nonconformist opponents, I rather desire to go to the furthest limit in the consideration that I would show to the Church of England, the Catholics, and the Jews. I am not in favour of abolishing denominational teaching in the schools, but of admitting it into all schools impartially; that is the only condition on which I could assent to confining the State-paid instruction to secular subjects. I am not at all convinced that the country is not ready for schools that will be co-denominational, the State providing the secular, and the denominations the religious, teaching in all of them impartially. This system works with acceptance in a portion of the Canadian Dominion, and to it I look, if not for the immediate, for the ultimate solution of our scandalous religious quarrels in regard to the education of the people. Broad-minded clergymen of the Church of England, like Canon Hicks, of Manchester, favour it; a Catholic layman told me he favoured it; it is in accordance with the wise advice given to the churches in the House of Commons by young Mr. Acland, a worthy son of the best Education Minister the country ever had, to organise their own religious teaching as the great demand that the future will make upon them. Mr. Hadley interprets my proposal quite correctly; but under Clause 6, it will be left to the parents who desire special religious teaching for their children, and to them alone, to send them to it. This for the first time is an operative conscience clause. The will of the parent comes in to send and not to withdraw his child; and the argument based on parental desire is met. It is quite true that I do not like this system; but I do not want a bill forced through Parliament to suit me; if it did, it would certainly alienate the whole body of denominationalists and be a complete failure. Unitarians have been already accustomed to suffering from a Cowper-Templeism in which the Apostles' Creed is taught, and taught at the expense of their rates and taxes. In the scheme I propose whatever will be taught under Free Church Councils, if they take it up, will be paid for by those who believe in it alone. And if Unitarians are left out in the cold, it will be nothing new. At all events, no Unitarian parents will send their children to teaching which they do not desire; nor do I think that we shall organise our own teaching in the schools, but rather outside their walls. My co-pastor, Mr. Andreae, is now doing this in connection with the Hyde Secondary School, teaching our own children on a week evening in our own school.

I do not favour "contracting out" for the Roman Catholics and Jews; that is one of the worst things in the Bill, with consequent educational starvation, and jumble sales to raise the wind. But I am confident that Catholic children will still collect in the schools owned by the Catholic Church. On the transfer the old Catholic teachers are to be taken over, and the schools will be started under the old Catholic atmosphere. If there are to be sectarian pens in the common schools, however, I will take them as a less evil than the separation of children in sectarian schools; it would not prevent common education with all the lifelong benefit of school friendships. It is a complete misnomer to call the universal right of entry a secular system; it takes the religious teaching out of the hands of a State which has no business with it, and places it in the hands of the churches whose business it is, that is all; and I have yet to learn that religion has ever gained by being established. Is not the Irish Church stronger to-day than in its days of establishment? Where is Catholicism more alive than in Ireland?

CAN UNITARIANS BE MARRIED IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

SIR,—The Church of England will marry members of the Christian Church. Members are persons who hold the Christian faith and have been baptized either in that or the Roman communion, or by a person who is in the eye of the Church a layman (or woman) if he use water and the words, "I baptize thee—in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

It is not prescribed that the religious belief of the applicants for marriage shall be inquired into. The fact of their applying for the service is presumptive evidence that they are members of the Christian Church.

The difficulty in this case seems to have arisen from its coming openly to the knowledge of the clergyman that neither of the applicants was a member of the Christian Church.

We know that marriages are often celebrated by the Church of England where one of the parties is a Unitarian, and some of the clergy would have been prepared to go a step or two farther, and perform the marriage ceremony at Christ Church; but in that case they would have been transgressing the rules of the Church, in that they would have been using a rite designed exclusively for members of the Christian Church for the benefit of non-members.

Unitarians naturally will not agree to this definition of Christian or of Church, but it is that of the communion whose salt those three clergymen eat.

THOS. S. WICKSTEED;

West Croydon, July 8.

SIR,—Mr. Mott's letter throws further light on that useful object-lesson. Let us be quite frank about it. The Bishop of London said that the Marriage Service of the Church is a Trinitarian one, and that therefore a Unitarian is a hypocrite who proposes to avail himself of it; and he is right. But the matter must not end there. It is our duty to walk across the road and tell the good Bishop that his Marriage Service is a blush-provoking and untruthful service, and that, however fashionable it may be, it ought to be distasteful to every honest and self-respecting person, as well as to every Unitarian.

Mr. Mott's friends may be the nicest people in the world, and one cannot help feeling sorry for them; but they deserved all they got. Did they read that service before they asked for it?

J. PAGE HOPPS.

THIS week's Christian World has the following note on this subject:—

"The Bishop of London seems to have much zeal for ecclesiastical traditions, but only a scanty knowledge of them. In a recent speech, as mentioned in a Note by the Way last week, he announced that he had refused to permit a Unitarian couple to be married in one of the churches of his diocese. And he said that he had refused it in order that he might 'maintain the Church's laws as they have been handed down.' The good Bishop, says a correspondent, forgot that within the memory of men still living the Established Church was so far from refusing to marry Unitarians that she even claimed to monopolise the right of marrying them. When, in the Parliament of 1824, the Unitarians begged for leave to marry in their own chapels the application was actively opposed by the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Chester. The former prelate said, 'There is no essential difference between Unitarian tenets and any doctrine recognised in our marriage service.' The latter prelate said, 'It is impossible that a Unitarian can object to any words in the marriage service.'"

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.—In accordance with resolutions of the governing body, it has been decided to raise a sum of £5,000, by means of an Association Fund and a United Bazaar, to be held in the autumn of 1907. The Association has to meet increasing calls with diminishing resources, and needs generous replenishment of its funds; if its work is to be efficiently carried on and extended. An urgent appeal has therefore been issued to the churches of the district to unite in an earnest and enthusiastic effort, and the Provincial Assembly at Padiham endorsed the appeal and agreed to furnish a stall at the bazaar. It is proposed to spread the spending of the bulk of the reserve fund obtained over a period of years, during which time it should be the aim, not only to bring the churches at present receiving aid to a position of financial independence, but also to strengthen all the churches in the Association, so that an annual income sufficient for the Association's work can easily be raised. A garden-party will be held at Summerville, by kind permission of the college committee, on Saturday, July 21, to inaugurate the effort;

SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS.—II.

WE reported last week the proceedings of the Summer Session at Manchester College, Oxford, June 29 to July 7, and add here some notes of lectures and of the closing meeting of the session. But first the letter of greeting from Dr. Carpenter from which we quoted last week. His telegram was read at the first evening meeting, and a message sent in reply. The letter was read at a subsequent meeting:—

DEAR MISS PRITCHARD,—I wrote a letter of greeting this morning to your company of teachers, but by a misadventure it was lost on the way to the village post, and the early hour of closing did not permit of my writing another. So I sent a hasty telegram of salutation. But I should be really glad if you would kindly express to the friends and fellow-workers whom you gather together, my deep sympathy with their purpose, and my hope that their days in Oxford may strengthen and enrich it. You will have the most genial of hosts in Dr. Odgers, and, I trust, fairer skies than the clouds and rain which envelope us here. May the happy companionship and the wise and instructed counsels of the next week bring help and encouragement to all. It is clear from the discussions in the House of Commons that this is not the last Education Bill which it will be our fate to see. Logic will claim a larger share in future attempts to secure a settlement, and whenever secular education is enacted, the Sunday-school will become more important than ever. For that issue we must steadily prepare ourselves: whenever it comes—and it will come sooner or later—I pray that we may not be found wanting. So I earnestly hope that we may be able to maintain an honourable succession of teachers in our little fellowship, with clear aims and loyal devotion, resolved to make a strenuous use of our present opportunities. I have been struck again and again with noticing that in the speeches of men who have recently made their way to the front, they do not dwell on what they learnt of religion in the day-school; it is the lessons of the Sunday-school that proved the real power in their lives. With kindest regards and best wishes for the success of another of those gatherings which we owe to your kindness,—Believe me faithfully yours,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

Those who heard the lecture by Dr. Crothers on "The Teacher as a Learner," both at Oxford and on an earlier occasion at Birmingham, will be glad to know that it appears in this month's Atlantic Monthly (published in this country about the 15th inst., by Messrs. Constable & Co.) with the title, "The Ignominy of Being Grown Up."

What notes we have of Dr. Odgers' lecture on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," we shall reserve for the time when his promised translation of that interesting early Christian document, with introduction and notes, appears.

The lecture by the Rev. J. J. Wright on "The Sunday-school from the Scholar's Standpoint," we hope to publish next week in full, and in the following week the Rev. W. L. Schroeder's lecture on "Gareth and Lynette."

The Bible in Class Teaching.

Miss Pritchard's lecture on "The Bible in Class Teaching" was thoroughly practical in its aim, with many suggestions of useful helps in the work. The first place, from the teacher's point of view, for the right understanding of the subject she gave to Mr. Montefiore's "Bible for Home Reading," and every teacher, she said, should master Dr. Carpenter's little book on "Life in Palestine when Jesus lived." Philip's sixpenny Scripture atlas was admirable, and other useful books they would find named at the end of the Code Book. Even a teacher with the scantiest technical knowledge of the Bible and little time for study could teach what was best in the Bible, from carefully selected passages, such as those noted on the back of the Association's New Year's cards. Gould's "Children's Book of Moral Lessons," together with the Bible passages selected for use with it, was also commended; and Mr. Spedding's "Scenes and Stories from the Life of Jesus."

At the beginning of her lecture Miss Pritchard spoke of the great change that has come over our view of the Bible, and as an illustration of the old view, quoted from a quaint book originally published in 1711 by Josiah Chorley, M.A., Minister of the Gospel in Norwich, "An Index of the Bible, or Alphabetical Tables of the Holy Scriptures, in Metre." These are the concluding verses:—

This Book, these Sentences, these Lines,
Each Word and Letter
To me are better
Than Strings of Pearl, and Golden Mines.
'Tis Heav'n transcrib'd, and Glory
penn'd;
God's Mind, no doubt,
Was copy'd out,
When He this Gift to Men did send.
'Tis Truth itself: God does intend,
Man's Word shall fall;
Heav'n, Earth, and all:
But this shall never have an End.
My Soul, admire that Hand and Quill,
That did produce
For Sinners' use
Th' Eternal Mind, and Sov'reign Will.
Adore the Author too, and when Thou canst not raise Sufficient Praise,
Sit down, and wond'ring say, Amen:

The teacher's supreme aim, Miss Pritchard said, as had been pointed out by their first two lecturers, must always be the building up of character, and so in teaching the Bible, knowledge must be quickened by the true spirit in the teacher. Bible knowledge must not be confused with religious teaching. Every lesson rightly given would be religious, and on every side of life they must impress upon their children the reality of the perfect and immutable law of God.

The Secular Spirit.

In the course of his lecture on "How to Meet the Secular Spirit among our Young People," the Rev. T. P. Spedding said that he made no protest against the participation of their young men in any form of social service, in political or educational work, only they ought not to feel that they must give up their school in order to engage in it. It was good that the school should be a nursery of the Church, but it should be also a centre of social service, and their young men should be made to feel that through the social activities of their school they could make some contribution to the higher citizenship. Considering the number of young men who passed through the schools, there ought never to be any shortage of teachers, and there would not be if the school exerted its proper influence. The secular spirit which tended to draw young men away must be met with forbearance, candour, and sympathy. Harsh measures were useless. All social sympathies should be encouraged, and the secular spirit must be met by their Unitarian spirit. There must be some controlling idea running through the instruction of the school, and it must have a living spirit of its own. He was a believer in sectarianism, as the great fact of the present day. Any sectarianism was likely to succeed where they failed, because it knew what it wanted. If they knew and said what they wanted, they also would succeed. They must be sectarian, with a clear cut, definite aim; in their schools there should be clear doctrinal teaching. They wanted also a missionary magazine for teachers. With an earnest teacher Unitarianism was not simply doctrine, it was a saving of souls, productive of true life.

CLOSING MEETING AND SERVICE.

On Saturday morning there was one more devotional service in the college chapel, and a most helpful meeting in the library of "Teachers in Council," but many of the teachers had already been obliged to leave, and for them Friday evening marked the real close of the session. Then was held the last social gathering, and it was a very happy thought to hold this not in the library, but in the garden of the residence. The path from the college to the garden, and the garden itself were lighted by fairy lamps, which had a charming effect, and after the music and speeches, refreshments were dispensed on the lawn. Then at ten o'clock the closing service was conducted by Dr. Crothers in the chapel.

At this meeting Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, president of the Sunday-school Association, was able to be present, and in the course of a very happy address expressed his regret that he had only been able to join them at the eleventh hour. His first experience as a Sunday-school teacher had been as a boy at Ilminster, when he had to teach reading and writing. Now they had a higher duty, to give religious teaching, and that was becoming more and more important, because the parents of many, in London at all events, made little or no effort to teach their children religion, and many of the children had no minister or priest to call them to a knowledge of higher things. He urged upon them in their teaching not to neglect the immense stores of religious teaching to be found in English literature, and especially in the poets. It was a thing for English men and women to be proud of, that all their greatest poets were inspired by true religious feeling, which appeared in their writings. The children should be made to read and learn by heart the shorter poems of Milton and Wordsworth and Tennyson, and others, both grave and gay. He commended to them especially Mr. Stopford Brooke's "Theology in the English Poets" as a book to be read; and concluded by referring the teachers for their own guidance to a short poem of Coleridge's of which he quoted the opening lines. [The poem, as a whole, will be found in another column.]

"O'er wayward childhood wouldst thou hold firm rule
And sun thee in the light of happy faces?
Love, Hope, and Patience, these must be thy graces,
And in thine own heart let them first keep school."

Dr. CROTHERS, in a brief address at the closing service, said that was the last evening of the session, and they naturally asked what they were taking away. One great thing was the sense of fellowship, of comradeship, in a work which sometimes might seem lonely; and another thing was a sense of the spiritual importance of the work they were trying to do in teaching religion to the children. The most perfect illustration of that he found in the autobiography of Helen Keller, where there was a profoundly interesting account of how she, who was deaf and blind from infancy, cut off from all communion with her kind, was brought by her patient teacher into relation with the things and people about her, and so was enabled to go through school and college with those who could see and hear, understanding and entering into the whole life of the race. That was what they tried to do with the children. They used signs and symbols—signs that had come down from the great history behind them, symbols of the great life of God in human hearts. That was the greatest work anyone could aspire to, so to influence a child as to make communication between its mind and the great life of God in humanity. That was what lasted, and it was a great privilege to do it. The other day at Warwick he had watched the beautiful pageant, and at the end there was one thing that remained, the simplest thing and the last of all. It made an impression that would last. The kings and queens, the knights and ladies had come out from the woodland and acted their parts, but at last the procession passed away into the forest glades, and only one remained—a wondering little boy, standing there all alone, watching the great procession pass away. That little boy was the one central object that remained, because in his heart, in his mind, the whole pageant of English history was realised. [It was the boy Shakespeare who thus appeared in the pageant, and was the last to go.] It is not given to everyone of us, said Dr. Crothers in conclusion, to teach a Shakespeare, but no one of us knows just who we are teaching. No one of us can possibly know what may be in the future, what influences may spring from a word fitly spoken, the connection between the truth in our minds and the capacity of the child mind. The one object that remains is the child, the child eternally asking, eternally watching for the divine answer. We must go away with the sense that there is a greater privilege for any one of us than just that of giving the right direction and impulse to some child's mind. May that be our closing prayer this night!

So the service ended with prayer and hymn and Benediction:

Before the social gathering had broken up Mr. Ion Pritchard expressed the warm thanks of the teachers to the Committee and Professors of Manchester College for allowing the session to be held there. Cordial acknowledgment was also made to Mr. J. W. Cock, who again acted as local secretary, and contributed greatly to the success and pleasure of the session;

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

Books about books are not always very satisfactory reading; they tend to put us off with second-hand information. We are too easily content to see with another man's eyes, and to approach the classic only through the popular critical essay. If the literature of criticism could be suppressed, we might keep closer company with the literature of power. And yet the satellites which gather round a great book have about them some reflected glory, and they are eloquent of a fascination which has been felt by many minds. Translations, commentaries, introductions, lives of the author, critical essays of appreciation, they throng about us in such multitude that we could hardly tolerate them at all, if it were not for their common tribute to the master-mind who holds them in its orbit. The Bible is nearly smothered under the weight of the books which are meant to explain it; but for this one thing we may be grateful—that it is an invincible testimony to the fact that the Bible is our best and greatest book.

I have on my library table one of the attractive catalogues issued by Rosenthal, of Munich. It is printed in red and black, with Holbein's Dance of Death forming an artistic border to every page. It runs to 420 items, and it is all concerned with one small book. There are manuscripts and incunabula which will appeal to the collector; there are editions arranged in chronological order; there are translations into sixty-two different languages; there are attractive Elzevirs; there are éditions de luxe; there are editions for the blind; there is a series of books dealing with the controversy over its authorship; there is a list of other works by the quiet, saintly man whom most of us are content now to accept as its author. On the cover there are simply these words: "De Imitatione Christi." If anybody is inclined to doubt the intrinsic greatness of the Imitation, I advise him to read this catalogue and find in it materials for a saner and humbler judgment. Here, at least, Securus judicat orbis terrarum.

Many of my readers will remember a striking passage in "The Mill on the Floss," which describes the spiritual fascination of this book for ordinary men and women. Maggie Tulliver, in the weariness of her self-pity and discontent, takes "the little, old, clumsy book with some curiosity. It had the corners turned down in many places, and some hand, now for ever quiet, had made at certain passages strong pen-and-ink marks, long since browned by time. Maggie turned from leaf to leaf, and read where the quiet hand pointed: 'Know that the love of thyself doth hurt thee more than anything in the world. . . . Both above and below, which way soever thou dost turn thee, everywhere of necessity thou must have patience, if thou wilt have inward peace, and enjoy an everlasting crown. . . . Blessed are those ears that receive the whispers of the divine voice, and listen not to the whisperings of the world. Blessed are those ears which hearken not to the voice which soundeth outwardly, but unto the Truth, which teacheth inwardly. . . .' A strange thrill of awe passed through Maggie while she read, as if she had been awakened in the night by a strain of solemn music, telling of beings whose souls had been astir while hers was in stupor. She went on from one brown mark to another, where the quiet hand seemed to point, hardly conscious that she was reading. . . . She knew nothing of doctrines or systems, of mysticism or quietism, but this voice out of the far-off middle ages was the direct communication of a human soul's belief and experience, and came to Maggie as an unquestioned message." The author goes on to add the following comment:—"I suppose that is the reason why the small, old-fashioned book, for which you need only pay sixpence at a bookstall, works miracles to-day, turning bitter waters into sweetness, while expensive sermons and treatises, newly issued, leave all things as they were before. It was written down by a hand that waited for the heart's prompting; it is the chronicle of a solitary, hidden anguish, struggle, trust, and triumph—not written on velvet cushions to teach endurance to those who are treading with bleeding feet on the stones. And so it remains to all time a lasting record of human needs and human consolations, the voice of a brother who ages ago felt and suffered and renounced—in the cloister, perhaps, with serge gown and tonsured head, with much chanting and long fasts, and with a fashion of speech different from ours, but under the same silent, far-off heavens, and with the same passionate desires, the same strivings, the same failures, the same weariness."

To these words of the great novelist we may add this sentence from the pen of the critic, who describes the "Imitation of Christ" as "the most exquisite document, after those of the New Testament, of all the documents the Christian spirit has ever inspired."

Nobody can accuse either George Eliot or Matthew Arnold of a blind partiality for conventional books of devotion, or of following too closely in the beaten tracks of religious experience. I have chosen their tribute to the worth of this book, which has been more used and better loved than any book outside the Bible, because it will arrest attention. The source from which it comes is proof of its sincerity. But what a striking tribute it is—"the most exquisite document, after those of the New Testament, of all the documents the Christian spirit has ever inspired." And yet it is simply condensing into one beautiful sentence the Christian experience of centuries—of the monk in his cell, of the soldier on the battlefield, of the politician amid the cares of state, of the Maggie Tullivers of the sombre everyday world, who sigh for some escape from their weariness and heartache and the pain of unfulfilled desire, and have found it here, in a clearer vision of duty, in a closer walk with God, in the imitation of Christ.

The Imitation is the last word of the Middle Ages on the things of the spirit to the modern world. It is the ripe fruit of Christian mysticism. The period of religious decadence which preceded the Reformation was also the age of the great mystics. Perhaps the prevailing apathy and corruption helped to intensify the passionate desire for holiness and a more intimate knowledge of God. Christianity has never been without its strain of mystical feeling, just because it has always carried the New Testament in its heart; but there have been varieties of method and emphasis in the expression of its devotional fervour. Some of the great mystics have been practical men living in the world, handling its affairs with prudence, and yet with a strange simplicity and detachment. Others, calling the gifts of the intellect to their aid, have constructed vast edifices of thought for the service of divine contemplation, till knowledge has passed upward into the ecstasy of worship. But, as a rule, the mystic does not argue or explain; he attracts. He convinces us not by the keen edge of his thought, but by the vividness of his experience. He has the secret of making us desire what he desires, feel what he feels, see what he sees. He does not dwell upon the peculiarities of his own thought or the problems which lie upon the surface of life. He does not lay stress upon ceremonies, or point with eager emphasis to the authority of the priesthood or the Bible. He may not doubt their claims, but he lives above them, and is a constant witness to the eternal religion of the pure in heart. The Gospel of St. John, the Confessions of St. Augustine, the Imitation of Christ, they do not belong to the century when they were written or to any one party in the Church. They are an everlasting possession for all men, because they are the ripest fruit of Christian mysticism.

Master Eckhart, whose daring pantheistic thought has only been appreciated in recent times at its true value, Heinrich Suso, the sweet singer of fervent mystical hymns, Nicholas of Basel, and John Tauler, the preacher of Strassburg—all lived in the fourteenth century. Round the two latter there grouped itself the Society of the Friends of God, whose beautiful spirit lives for us still in the sermons of Tauler, and in the deep meditative calm of the Theologia Germanica. In the Netherlands a movement very similar in aim sprang up under the powerful influence of Ruysbroeck and his disciple, Gerard Groot. Ruysbroeck was known as the "ecstatic doctor" on account of the fervour of his spiritual feeling, and he was one of the most remarkable men of his time. Living in quiet retirement from the world, for the last years of his long life as prior of the monastery of Groenendael, he had a far-reaching influence both by his writings and through his personal intercourse with a few chosen companions. "He who is the conqueror of himself is lord of the world and inheritor of heaven" was one of his characteristic sayings. Gerard Groot was a man of similar temper, though with him mystical teaching took a more practical form. He gathered a number of disciples around him, both laymen and clerics, at Deventer, and he formed them into a society called "The Brothers of Common Life"—a name of singular beauty and suggestiveness. They lived together under religious discipline, but they differed from the regular monastic orders in the freedom which was granted to every member to leave the community when he desired. They dedicated themselves to the cultivation of the devotional life and to works of Christian benevolence. They were eager to promote sound learning, and their schools played an honourable part in educational progress. Erasmus—restaurator latinitatis, as the proud title runs—received the rudiments of his vast learning in the Brotherhood school at Deventer. Nor must we forget their delight in the production of beautiful books, a pious work for which they have earned a just fame. The last project of Gerard Groot, which was fulfilled after his death in 1384, was the foundation of a settlement under stricter monastic vows, with the object of imparting an element of stability which was lacking in the freer organisation of the Brotherhood houses. Possibly he wished also to gratify the desire on the part of some of his friends for a life of austerer discipline. This was the origin of the House of Augustinian Canons at Windesheim, and of the branch monastery of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, where Thomas à Kempis spent the greater part of his long and quiet life.

The reader of the Imitation feels on every page the atmosphere in which its author lived and worked and prayed, the simplicity, the devoutness, the mystical detachment from the noise and ambitions of the world, the strain of ascetic fervour, so different from our modern ideals of comfort and happiness and success. This is how he writes in his little-known book called "The Soliloquy of the Soul":—"I entreat thee also, O holy Father, vouchsafe to me, the least of thy servants, time and opportunity for tarrying in the most pleasant pastures of the Holy Scriptures, which are and will be my most cherished delight, until the day of eternity dawns and the shadow of mortality is gone down. Remove from me useless cares, temporal loves, hurtful passions, and other causes that keep me back from the desired rest. For it behoves the mind to be free and tranquil which desires to meditate on things inward and divine." How the words lay their spell of interior peace upon the mind and linger like music in the memory! Who that has felt the weariness of false ambitions, or prayed for a stricter following of Christ, will not confess that for him the quiet voice has still its power and charm?

WESTWARD IN CANADA.—II.

SIR,—It is a more or less aggravating thing to get up at 4.30 in the morning to catch an early train, and when you have virtuously packed and dressed to be informed that your train is two hours behind time, and that you need not hurry. However, when it is a gorgeous summer morning, and you can sit at an open window looking across pine woods and a roaring river to a range of snow-clad mountains, there are compensations, and the conscience can be relieved in the matter of correspondence.

Since I wrote to you last we have crossed the prairie, a forty-eight hours' run from the head of Lake Superior to this place. Let no one say that the prairie is uninteresting. That it may be, though not so uniformly as one expects: There is much rolling country and tracts of little hills, with also long stretches of billiard table level. From Fort William almost to Winnipeg, indeed, the country reminded us somewhat of the lower parts of our own Lake District—hilly, with rock cropping up through the green surface, woods bright in their spring clothing, and many little lakes. Winnipeg itself seems a big and busy place, with handsome buildings, but we did not stop. From the bustle of its great station, a few minutes see you out into the great silent tracts of fertile Manitoba and the prairie proper, for, curiously enough, there is more unfarmed land in the neighbourhood of Winnipeg than there is some twenty miles further on. Speculation and "holding for a rise" has something to do with this. Winnipeg is still the great distributing centre. Day after day throughout the summer the trains roll in laden with colonists of all nationalities and descriptions, to be sent out again in all directions to take possession of the land, or find work with those who are already settled. Nor, as I gather, need any man, with strong arms, and some power of using them usefully, have any fears as to his future; but let the man who is conversant only with books keep away.

You do not see very much of the farm life from the train. The homesteads, from the elementary "shack" to the comfortable house, dot the landscape here and there, and the great fields, with the tender green just showing through the black soil, mark the presence of busy men, but of themselves you see little, except in the growing towns. These are strung like beads about the railway line at intervals of ten to twenty miles, and are very interesting in their various stages of development. The train rushes in from the solitudes, and suddenly you are in the middle of a bustling little centre of life, to be as suddenly quitted. Often they are very bright with their painted wooden houses, and here and there a more pretentious building, bank, or church, probably. In many a huge grain elevator reminds you of their raison d'être, but does not add to the beauty of the scene. All seem laid out, with a view to the future, with broad streets. Some are already considerable places, such as Brandon, Broadview, Medicine Hat, and Calgary. What a series of big towns they will be in twenty years' time it is easy to see:

From Manitoba one passes into Assiniboia, and enters on a country where the landscape is diversified by innumerable lakelets and ponds, often teeming with wild duck. Other wild creatures also may be seen if you keep your eyes open, an occasional prairie wolf or dog. Or you may have a disagreeable variety in the way of a dust storm, blowing up from the ploughed lands, which spoils views and permeates the carriages. Under such circumstances you do well to draw out the table between your seats, order afternoon tea, and get out your books or picquet cards. Such is the modern way of crossing the prairie for idle folks.

A luxurious dining car accompanies your train, and the approach of night sees your "section" of the car converted into two comfortable beds, though the access to the top one is not too easy for elderly people. In the morning comfortable lavatories with plenty of hot water start you well on the next day, and your section is reconverted, while you breakfast, by the obliging coloured gentleman. Ours was most obliging, and, by the way, spoke excellent English with a remarkably good accent and choice of words.

Our second morning found us nearing the ranching country. Wheat growing is pushing cattle ranching back towards the mountains. It was dull and snowing when we woke in a country not unlike Scotch moorland with occasional "bunches" of cattle grazing. Later on we were fortunate enough to see a "round up" of many hundreds of cattle, massed together, and guarded by mounted men, but on the whole we did not see any great number. The ranches are so vast in extent that large herds are easily lost to sight in the folds of the little hills.

Early in the morning we reached Medicine Hat, why so called I know not, where the railway forks for its double assault upon the Rocky Mountains. It is a most thriving looking place, with an enormous asset in the shape of an unlimited supply of natural gas, whereby the town is lighted, heated, and supplied with power.

It is quickly left behind and we enter on the last and highest plateau of the prairie, stretching away to the foothills of the mountains. Seen through a light fall of rain and under a dull sky, it might be fairly pronounced monotonous, but even under such circumstances it has an attraction of its own, which grows on you as hour after hour you roll through its vast expanses, stretching to the horizon in often unbroken flatness. The line of the great mountains should have been becoming visible, but not that day, even at Calgary, the great ranching centre where the foothills begin.

Here should have been crowds of cowboys and other picturesque persons, but the station was filled with rather ordinary looking people, and it was too wet to explore the town. Rowdiness has largely died out, under the influence of the excellent N.W. mounted police, striking figures, as you meet them patrolling a lonely road in their red jackets. Law and order are, on the whole, excellently preserved. Nevertheless, a train was held up in the mountains a few weeks ago, and the malefactors are even now undergoing

A dull day has this advantage here that, after a short run through the foothills, you find yourself, almost without warning, passing through The Gap, between snow-clad summits, and entering the valley of Banff, the great health and pleasure resort, which welcomes you to the Rockies. Glad as one is to see the snowy peaks, it is not without regret that one bids adieu to the prairie, which has brought with it suggestions of something greater even than its own expanse, or the great people which is coming so fast into being upon it.

One speculates much on the future of that people which starts with so many advantages, yet has been so painfully ready to acquire one at least of the vices of civilisation. If part only of what I have heard be true, there is much political corruption—"graft" they call it. On the other hand, let me note how singularly little intoxicating liquor is consumed at the public tables, though they say there is a good deal too much drunk in the bars. I have not, however, yet seen a drunken man on this side of the water:

OBITUARY.

THE REV. J. F. BLAKE.

THE Rev. John F. Blake, M.A., F.G.S., died on Saturday, July 7, at his residence, 35, Harlesden-gardens, N.W., at the age of 67. He graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1862 as 15th Wrangler and first in the second-class Natural Sciences Tripos. He was ordained the same year, and from 1865 till 1874 was mathematical and natural science master at St. Peter's School, York. He was afterwards assistant-master at Clapham Grammar School, lecturer on comparative anatomy at Charing Cross Hospital, and Professor of Natural Science in University College, Nottingham, from 1881 till 1888. Mr. Blake was president of the Geological Association in 1891-2, and had published several works on geological subjects, and contributed articles to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." About twelve years ago Mr. Blake became a member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and a tract of his, "The Gospel of the Better Hope," was included in the series of "Pages for Religious Inquirers," and gave the name to a small volume of these tracts published in 1894. He took an interest in the formation of the Unitarian congregation at Kilburn. He was an earnest, thoughtful, deeply conscientious man, whom it was a pleasure to know. The funeral took place at Kensal-green Cemetery on Wednesday.

On the occasion of the King's visit to Newcastle-on-Tyne this week, the honour of knighthood was conferred on the Mayor, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, who is a leading member of the Church of the Divine Unity. The King also declared that the chief magistrate should in future bear the honourable title of Lord Mayor.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

IX.—THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

THE Kingdom of God is the reign of God on earth in love and holiness. It claims the whole field of life, and would make all life religious. Society may think to organise itself under two aspects—the spiritual and the secular, the ecclesiastical and the civil—but the Kingdom of God, as Christ saw it, is one undivided whole, the ideal commonwealth, the entire community in its highest conceivable form.

The character of the citizens of the Kingdom is drawn out in the Sermon on the Mount. Right conduct and true piety are there described, and filial reverence and brotherly goodwill are pronounced to be the two principles on which God's whole commandment hangs.

The opposed ideas of Church and State were unknown to the Jew. For him there was but one polity. We have no reason, therefore, to suppose that Christ contemplated the possibility of that dualism which now rends society in twain. He ignored every line of internal separation, whether social or religious. It cannot be proved that he instituted any ecclesiastical ordinance. "He that doeth the will of my Father," are words which mark out the area of the Kingdom, on which devout men of every nation under heaven may stand. Here is the one hope of universal religion.

Only, perhaps, as a Church could the Kingdom safely preserve and transmit itself under the Roman Empire, but the word Kingdom has little meaning now, if it does not mean that which binds all humanity into one people of God, under one divine will. Membership in a church is unfortunately easier and more open than citizenship in the Kingdom, for the Kingdom of God is entered "through much tribulation." To enter the Kingdom is to set yourself wrong with the world at many points, to accept an entirely new order of ideas, ideas which must lead in the end to an entirely new ordering of life, personal and social, commercial and political. Not till then will the Kingdom have come in any complete and royal sense. John the Baptist preached the Gospel as a kingdom, Christ himself as a kingdom. As a kingdom Philip preached it in Samaria, St. Paul in the chief cities of the West. The Kingdom of God is not a term about which we can easily quarrel; it is what all men desire in their hearts. It is a temper, a habit, a rule of life. It is the reign of God in man, first individually, then collectively—His righteousness the righteousness of men. The dream of one undivided Church is gone for ever—for without uniformity ecclesiastical unity cannot be—but in a kingdom there may be diversities of administration in the several parts, and the oneness of the whole may still be preserved. In the acceptance and realisation of the "Kingdom," local "Churches" may some day find both usefulness and peace. But to this end the word "church" must first be used as a term of subordination, and not as a title of assumed control.

Nor a single day is trivial. It is essential that this idea should sink into our life and take root therein.—Maeterlinck;

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

SOME years ago, we had a beautiful elderberry tree in our garden. A seed dropped from the tree, and was blown by the wind over a wall into the yard, where it found a little bit of soil between the cobble stones, and managed to take root. It grew quickly, and in a very short time there was a tiny little shoot of green, whose growth I was always interested in watching. When it was about two feet high the old tree had to be cut down. But the little seedling went on growing, and now it is a beautiful tree; and out of my bedroom window I can see right on to the top of it. This year it has been more thickly covered with blossom than I have ever seen it before, and the mass of lovely creamy white flowers, with the light green leaves showing here and there among them, is a pleasure to me whenever I look out of the window.

Each year it is an interest to watch the tree going through its various stages. The flowers grow in clusters, one stem branching off into several others, each of which divides again and again, until at the end of each little final stem, there comes a tiny green bud—hundreds of them from each main stem, and each bud tightly folded up like a minute cabbage. Then the buds grow whiter, and gradually unfold, until each cluster of buds becomes a mass of beautiful creamy white flowers, so many of them that though each is at the end of its own little stem, the flowers are all crowded together, and, looking down at them, the stems are completely hidden, and you can see nothing but flowers. And each little flower is so perfect; look at some if you can through a magnifying glass, and you will be surprised how much more beauty you can see than with the naked eye.

Then the next thing is that the flowers fade and drop off, leaving behind the tiny beginning of the fruit or berry, which will grow and ripen until (in this common kind of elderberry) they will form clusters of little black berries, which to the naked eye are not unlike the original clusters of buds, except that the buds were green, and the berries will be black and larger. It is all so interesting to watch, and even now, if you have any trees near you, you can see part of the process, though it is too late this year to see the flowers in bud.

The growth of a tree seems to be a parable of the different stages of our lives. We all have to grow out of childhood into boyhood or girlhood, and then into manhood or womanhood. Just as in my tree, the growth is slow, and from year to year I can see very little change, so each stage in our lives is made up of weeks and months and years, each one following on the last, and each preparing for the next.

A tree wants sunshine and rain to make it grow; it needs training to grow straight and upright; sometimes it wants to send shoots out in a wrong direction, and they must be cut off, that the strength of the tree may go to form fresh shoots in another part.

Is not that very like our lives? Our Father gives to each of us one tree to cultivate. That is the tree of character, and we have to train it even more carefully than the gardener trains the trees in the garden. God provides the sunshine of His love; and the rain and the dew are like the helps of all kinds that He gives us to do right. We have to prune away shoots of bad habits, that we may grow strong in good habits. In a young tree you will often see one little stem higher than all the others: in training the tree the gardener is always especially careful about this "leading shoot," for on the guiding of that depends very largely the perfection of the tree. In our "tree of character" our thoughts are our leading shoot, and if we train those right the tree will follow, for "all that we are is the result of what we have thought."

So, now, while you are young, try to put away from you all wrong or unkind thoughts, and to think only of whatever things are right, and kind, and helpful. So I come back in thought to my tree, which grew from a little seed, blown about by the wind, and I say:—

"Do good in thought, some future day

'Twill ripen into speech;

And words are seeds, which grow to deeds;

None know how far they reach."

O. M. RAWLINS.

LOVE, HOPE, AND PATIENCE IN EDUCATION.

O'er wayward childhood would'st thou hold firm rule,
And sun thee in the light of happy faces?
Love, Hope, and Patience, these must be thy graces,
And in thine own heart let them first keep school.

For as old Atlas on his broad neck places
Heaven's starry globe, and there sustains it;—so

Do these upbear the little world below
Of education,—Patience, Love, and Hope.
Methinks, I see them group'd in seemly show,

The straiten'd arms uprais'd, the palms aslope,

And robes that, touching as adown they flow,

Distinctly blend, like snow emboss'd in snow.

O part them never! If Hope prostrate lie,

! Love too will sink and die.

But love is subtle, and doth proof derive
From her own life that Hope is yet alive;

And bending o'er, with soul-transfusing eyes,

And the soft murmurs of the mother dove,

Woos back the fleeting spirit, and half supplies;—

Thus Love repays to Hope what Hope first gave to Love.

Yet haply there will come a weary day,

When overtask'd at length

Both Love and Hope beneath the load give way.

Then with a statue's smile, a statue's strength,

Stands the mute sister, Patience, nothing loth,

And both supporting does the work of both.

THE COLLEGE IDEAL.

IN the two speeches which he made on his retirement from the office of Principal of Manchester College, reported in the INQUIRER of June 30, Dr. DRUMMOND spoke at some length on the ideal of the College, and of what he hopes for its future development. The reception it has met with in its settlement at Oxford has been, he said, beyond anything they had any right to expect. What he did not say, but what we can thankfully acknowledge, is that to his own eminent scholarship, and to the influence of his own personal character, that happy result has been largely due.

Dr. DRUMMOND dwelt upon the College ideal of freedom, and the catholic spirit which it aims at embodying. Its ideal as a Free School of Theology and a training-place for ministers of religion is exactly the same as that of our Free Churches, unbound by dogmatic limitations, pledged to a genuinely catholic spirit.

Taught by the experience of the days of persecution, and the peaceful development of after generations in a freedom that would not be limited by any rigid form of doctrine, we thankfully receive that inheritance of undogmatic churches from our fathers, and understand that the true principle of fellowship in the church is not the maintenance of a standard of orthodoxy as a condition of membership, but trust in the binding power of spiritual sympathy in worship and the natural affinities of those who are united in a common religious life. The "denomination," Dr. DRUMMOND said, has "resolutely refused to lay down denominational lines." We want to have part in a growing life, unflinching indeed in the declaration of the full measure of truth to which it has attained, but open always to the light and ready for the larger vision, if it should be granted. The centre of attraction, therefore, cannot be any form of doctrine, but the fact of spiritual life in communion with the living God. The free church is the company of faithful people held together in that common consciousness of life with God, seeking always to be led in His way, to be taught of His Spirit, to do His work in the world, to be together in the happy fellowship of worship in spirit and in truth. And such a fellowship cannot be shut in by dogmatic limitations. We must trust ourselves to the free ways of the Spirit, for a living church is of God, not of man. We may, indeed, be all of us, or nearly all of us, at the present moment Unitarians in the strict theological sense; but we have no right to close our doors and say to anyone: "You are not a Unitarian; you cannot come in." On the contrary, we must say in all sincerity: "Come, if you desire to be with us in our worship of the living God, in our submission to His will, in our seeking to be led in His true way; come in, and rejoice with us in the fellowship of our Free Church." We want simply to put our best life into that religious fellowship, and into the work we are called to do.

And we must rejoice indeed, if others also will come in to be with us, and if other churches, holding to the same broad principle of religious union, will accept our offer of brotherly fellowship, that we may live and work together for the kingdom of God on earth.

If that is the true ideal of the churches, so is it with the college. It is set not to expound and advocate any one dogmatic system, but to seek and to interpret the truth of God, just in that measure which it is given to the experience of each generation to apprehend, and at the same time to nurture in its students the spirit of a living religion, of which they are in due time to be the ministers. Thus, there can be no standard of orthodoxy enforced, either for teachers or taught; all must be pledged alike simply to the service of truth, and the range of study must be made as complete as possible with the best available teacher in each subject. There might naturally be differences of doctrinal position, as well as of temperament, among the teachers of such a college. Dr. DRUMMOND described the actual conditions at Manchester College when he said: "They knew that every man must have his own thought, and, as thought was limited, it must vary; and the very growth of thought demanded variations. But under it all there was the same simple devotion to duty, the same profound homage to the Christian spirit, the same earnest desire that whatever they might think, or say, or do, they should be in conformity with that spirit, and nothing in their teaching should have any faintest touch of insincerity; nor would they require any man to accept their opinions except as he was led by his own thought and study to do so." And speaking further of the University ideal, Dr. DRUMMOND pointed out how essential to a complete training for the service of religion is personal intercourse between men of different schools;

The ideal of Manchester College is to take a worthy place in such university life, and, above all, to demonstrate as a fact the true principle of freedom for teachers and taught, to offer and be ready to accept the fullest fellowship for men of different theologies and different denominations. The idea that it should become a little university, self-contained and complete in itself, is, of course, absurd. The very meaning of its settlement at Oxford was that it should receive, as well as offer, contributions towards complete study and training for the ministry, and that, while remaining true to its own essential principle, it should, as far as possible, be merged in the larger university life.

This is supposed by some to be incompatible with its work as a training school for the ministry of any one special group of churches. But one of the strongest points in Dr. DRUMMOND's statement was that the best and most complete training of a student for the ministry can only be secured in the wider fellowship thus attained; and if we are reminded of the admission that at Oxford there are influences strongly adverse to the spirit of our own Free Churches, that is a difficulty which must be frankly faced, and which the churches themselves, in their natural care for the men training for their own ministry, ought to do more than they have done in the past actively to meet.

On the question of bursaries for the maintenance of students for the ministry we will only say here that the right principle, in our view, is that such maintenance (where it is required) should be the duty not of the college, but of the churches themselves; and this particular point leads to a wider consideration of the whole duty of the churches in the furnishing of students to be trained for their ministry. First, as the crucial test of their own vitality, must come the production out of their own religious life of men with fitting gifts, of independent character, and the true spirit of consecration; and then throughout their whole course of study there should be an intimate fellowship maintained between the men and the churches they are to serve. How this might best be done is matter which the National Conference, as representing the churches, might well take into consideration. Then there would be also a natural channel of communication for students not born of the churches themselves, but drawn from other quarters to their ministry. Even before college days something may be done towards finding and directing the due training of the men, and then, especially through vacation engagements contact with the religious life of the churches may be maintained and its influence deepened, while at the close of the university course there is a great opportunity for complete training in the establishment of missionary fellowships and curacies in connection with the churches of fullest and most active life. Thus the university training and the influence of religious life in the churches, true to the same ideal of spiritual freedom, would work together, each contributing the best it has to give, for the making of capable and faithful ministers.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

PUBLIC EXAMINATION.

AN interesting and fitting prelude to the annual public examination of the students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was found in the robing ceremony at the Victoria University of Manchester. Special interest attached to the ceremony this year, as this was the first occasion on which the new theological degree was to be conferred. Five men came forward to receive the degree, amongst them being one student of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Mr. Herbert McLachlan, M.A., who had gained honours in Old Testament and History of Doctrine, and who will now add B.D. to his other distinctions. The College was further represented in the Arts section by Mr. Edward Morgan, who was invested with the B.A. gown and hood. With these students of the College in the procession, it was interesting to note the presence of Miss Evans, daughter of the Rev. G. Evans, and Messrs. Agate and Smith, sons of the Revs. D. Agate and H. B. Smith respectively, who had also come to claim their honours in Arts and Science. Returning from this interesting ceremony, the private examination of the students took place the same afternoon at Summerville, in the presence of the Visitors, the Revs. Philemon Moore and Dr. S. H. Mellone. The public examination followed on Tuesday, July 3, at the Memorial Hall.

At the close of the examination the company, which included ministers and laymen from various parts of the country, proceeded to the large hall, and the officers and staff of the College presently entered in procession, accompanied by the students, most of them wearing the robes of their respective universities. The chair was occupied by Principal Gordon, and with him on the platform were the President, the Rev. C. C. Coe, the Visitors, the Chairman of Committee, Colonel Pilcher, the hon. secs., the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas and Mr. E. Talbot, the Rev. A. W. Fox (Gaskell Examiner), and the Rev. J. E. Manning (tutor).

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

Dr. Mellone, in the course of his address as Visitor, having warned the students against the waste of precious opportunities in their years at college, which would all too soon be gone, proceeded to speak of what he held to be one great defect in the intellectual outlook of our people, both lay and clerical, and the possibility of making it good. We are suffering, he said, from a disastrous lack of historic insight in our attitude to Christianity. There is no religious need of man which the Gospel cannot satisfy; its loveliness can be revealed even unto babes; the great realities of religion do their most perfect work when they find out men's hearts and win them, and influence lives through the reverence and aspiration which they call forth. And yet we must remember that the great commandment is to love God with the mind as well as with the heart and soul and strength. The things of God are not wholly loved by us until our understanding is reaching out after them—and we are trying with all our powers of thoughtful inquiry to find out all we can about the nature and the ways of things divine. So much at least is implied in the existence of a theological college, and in the existence of any theological studies whatever. We shall agree it is the same in our relation to Christ. The Gospel does not consist simply of the texts recorded in the books bearing the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The Gospel is a historical movement in which we are implicated, whether we like it or not, simply in virtue of our being born into Western civilisation. In this sense the word has almost an ethnic significance; and the Gospel is your birthright, even though you may disown it.

To understand the Gospel we must have some point of view from which to look at it, but among us there are no settled principles from which to find a point of view. We can no longer use the records of the Gospel as oracles, or appeal to their sentences as direct and conclusive authorities; and the point of view from which our ministers, and our people in general, look at the Gospel, depends for each man on his own predilections or prejudices, on his political opinions, on his ideals in social reform, on the unconscious results of his education and personal history. The letter and the spirit—the passing and the permanent—are favourite antitheses with us, and nowhere more so than in reference to the Gospel. Many able sermons have been preached to distinguish what is permanent in Christianity from what is transient. But after it all, one feels there is something missing.

There is a further point of view which we ought to adopt in regarding the Gospel. "We must take possession of it as a history before we can construct it into a system; we must deeply familiarise our minds with what is temporary before we are competent to pronounce what is everlasting in the Gospel." In these words, uttered in Cross-street chapel seventy years ago, Martineau lays down a principle of the greatest importance. This I say the more willingly, since I have been driven to look upon Martineau's view of early Christian history as inadequate and erroneous. We must master it as a history.

Thus to interpret the history of the Gospel and the history of its expansion in the early centuries is not an easy thing. "We must learn to listen to Christ in the spirit of a Hebrew of old. . . . We must live with Paul in travels and shipwreck, in perils and in bonds, speaking to philosophers on the Areopagus of Athens, walking silent through the forum of Rome. We must make the circuit of the ancient world, penetrate the recesses of Jewish and Pagan society, sympathise with their opinions, adopt their emotions, and trace the modifications (in them) of those human affections which in their essence are immortal." We must make the circuit of the ancient world; for every word, every work, every writing that went to build up the early Church was spoken, done, or written with direct reference to the actual surrounding world of the days; some actual historical situation was the occasion of every precept and doctrine. To understand these we must understand the occasion.

This conclusion would be greeted by some people with astonishment and impatience. They look at the fewness and simplicity of the great Christian truths—which may be taught to a child in the Catechism—and ask why these cannot be carried straight into life and applied to the beliefs and duties of men, instead of being broken up into a bewildering multiplicity of historical inquiries? When we meet this mood of mind there are two things to remember. First, it has not been said that historic insight is necessary for us to be able to believe or love what is sublime in the Gospel; it is necessary for us to understand. Secondly, the question of whether we shall try to understand or not is taken out of our hands; time and the logic of fact are compelling us to understand, not only for the satisfaction of our reason, but for the sake of our conduct itself. Observe the state of things to-day. The traditional attitude of the Christian Church is, the world is called to her judgment-bar only to be condemned. But now, not only is the world called to the judgment-bar of the Gospel, the Church and the Gospel are called to the judgment-bar of the world. There are pleadings on both sides; and whatever demands the Gospel makes on the world, the world makes her demand on the Gospel. "Understand yourself before you assert yourself;" and "understand me before you condemn me." The ways in which the Gospel was applied to the world during the first four centuries have floods of light to shed on the ways in which it may be applied to the world to-day. In a word, the historical study of early Christianity is simply to see Christianity in the process of being made; and common sense itself is enough to assure us that when we see a thing being made, or see it gradually growing, we have gone far towards seeing what it means, and what it is for.

Hence—to dwell on a detail for a moment—we see the real worth of an intelligent study of the Fathers. They are landmarks in the great story of the first making of Christianity. There is much in their writings dreary and unprofitable to read; there is much else that will provide intellectual discipline and enlightenment and even moral inspiration for to-day. It is well that select readings from the

He was not in this, said Dr. Mellone, pleading simply for "much study of many books." A little historical knowledge of the right kind is worth far more than a great deal that is not of the right kind. The great need is of historical insight. For it is not merely a knowledge of what things were done and said, but of the emotions and ideas working in the minds of the men who did and said them. There is no royal road to this but the one marked out in the Hebrew poet's word, "In Thy light we see light." The world, with all its outward confusion and corruption, whose meaning you seek to learn, and your desire to seek its meaning, came from the same Divine power and thought. Say the worst you will of the world, let it be even Nero's world, it is God's world still, and God gives you the desire to learn its meaning. Seen in that light, its history ceases to be a wilderness of details, formless masses of facts like desert sands, but a connected story in which great purposes are slowly wrought out through man's blood and tears, sin and strife, and through man's heroism and greatness, and his restless desire for better life.

If, then, the multitudinous events of history are the pulsations of a continuous divine life, passing through time and giving it greater fullness as it goes, then this gives us one supreme rule for the interpretation of the story; a thing is what it does. To find its whole nature we must see all that it does. All that Christ is will not be seen until all the results of his work are gathered together in the far off Divine Event.

The meaning of the moral impulse given by Jesus is shown in its results; and its characteristic results are shown in the work of the first apostles, founders and fathers of the Church. There we see the Gospel as a living influence passing from person to person—being interpreted, tested, applied—receiving from and giving to Jew and Greek alike. And your first question as to the meaning of any Christian writing is this: Taking the writer as representing the Gospel, and as influenced by it, what is the historical situation that he is grappling with? What light does he desire to throw on it?

This is exactly the principle that is consciously or unconsciously adopted and applied in the best scholarship of our day. This will be abundantly seen if you observe the general drift of the works of Harnack and others now appearing in English dress in the Theological Translation Library. It was, indeed, the outcome of the work of F. C. Baur more than half a century ago; but its true significance appeared less in his hands than in those of his successors, who, with an equal and even greater mastery of facts, were not dominated by a great speculative system.

We who have been called the pioneers of the liberal religious thought of this century shall little deserve that name if we lag behind in this work. We need to make ourselves as familiar with the Christian history of the early centuries as we are with the words of the New Testament itself. I do not claim for a moment to have made myself thus familiar; but I know that if we could do so, we should reap a great harvest of help and guidance in our endeavour to present the religion of Jesus as a living principle to-day.

At the close of the address Principal Gordon spoke on the work of the session, and announced the results of the various examinations. In addition to the degrees already named two other students of the college, the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., and Mr. Edgar Thackray, M.A., had satisfied the examiners for the B.D. degree in all subjects except one, in addition to which Mr. Rossington had gained distinction in comparative religion, and Mr. Thackray had received a prize in ecclesiastical history. In the other examinations some good results had been obtained, while in the examinations at their own college a high standard had been reached. Principal Gordon gave it as his opinion that the removal to Summerville had been as beneficial in the studies as it had in the health and comfort of the men. He then proceeded to award the College prizes as follows, viz.:—Sharpe Prize for general Biblical knowledge, £10, to Mr. E. Thackray, M.A.; the Bibby Prize for Greek, £3, Mr. E. Thackray, M.A.; the Ald. Harry Rawson for English literature, £5 5s., divided between Mr. J. Munn and Mr. H. Warnock. Special Book Prize, Mr. M. Watkins. The meeting then closed with the singing of "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and the offering of prayer by the Rev. John Birks.

VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

The valedictory service was held in Cross-street Chapel the same evening. The choir of the Longsight Free Christian Church led the singing, under the direction of Mr. O. H. Heys.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass. There was, he said, only one subject fitted to such an occasion, that of the work of the ministry itself. When he was asked as to the work of the ministry, he always began by saying all the discouraging things he could. It was hard work. It had always been hard work. It was going to be harder work still. If that made an impression he proceeded to make the good work perfect by naming some more discouraging features and so to weed out the unfit. The preacher then proceeded in an eloquent address to consider three great historical types of men who have given themselves to religion. First of all the Priest, the custodian of sacred things, the guardian of sacred places and traditions, the holy man. The priest always loves symbolism, and sets certain things apart to picture to his mind the holy mysteries of religion. The priestly office had its origin in some deep need of human nature, but, fundamental as it was, there came a time when there arose a man who was no longer satisfied. He turned away from all these traditions of the past. What his soul longed for was power to do and create. He demanded reality. He looked around and saw unspeakable abominations. He drew aside the conventional coverings, and showed that the men responsible for these sins of lust and greed might yet be fulfilling the demands of the Priests and be accepted by them. So the second great historical type was that of the Prophet. He finds religion not in the past but the present. He praises not the dim religious light but the common light of day, which shows things as they really are; and as there had been a succession of Priests so there had been a succession of Prophets, turning their faces to the world and using religion as a tool and weapon, not as a deposit of tradition. The third type was that of the man of religion, the philosopher, the truth seeker. He draws aside and says, is there not something more than even the Prophet sees? The denunciation of evil has its place, but do we not, in addition, need to sit down together to reason about life and God, and think carefully so as to know what is true? Should they not seek and find and carefully weigh all the facts, and in the calmness of wisdom find direction. Men of Hebrew and Greek thought had felt and spoken thus, and there were such voices to-day to which all men felt they must listen. Which of these types does the present time demand? First of all the minister in these days must be a truth lover and a truth seeker. This was his first great task, and the time was fast coming when men would refuse to listen to any other kind of minister. Everywhere else, in every other department of human interest, men now refused to listen to the mere dogmatist. So it would be in religion. They should seek so to prepare themselves as to know a fact when they saw it, for they would have to deal with difficult facts, the facts of the human soul, and they must come to the task with open minds to see the truth. But that was not all. A type wholly intellectual would not fulfil the requirements of the ministry, but the minister who was first of all a truth seeker would be touched with the Prophet's spirit and consecration. He would also feel the essential truth in the Priest's tenderness towards the past. He would come to know what were the real sacred things, and he would find that they were not the outward things, but religion itself. Thus in the true minister of to-day the three great types of all past times must be combined in the working of the real Priest of God.

COLLEGE FESTIVITIES.

The more formal proceedings were followed on Wednesday afternoon by a very successful garden party at Summerville, favoured by fine weather, when nearly one thousand of the friends of the College assembled. Music was provided by the band of the Barnes Home Industrial School, and tea was served both in the dining-room and the conservatories. During the evening a short meeting was held under the presidency of Colonel Pilcher, and addresses were given by Principal Gordon and the Revs. C. C. Coe, H. E. Dowson, and C. Peach.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, in the course of a sympathetic speech, said:—

"I am here this afternoon with a whole-hearted sympathy to accept the accomplished fact of the Home Missionary College in its new home at Summerville. I congratulate all of you, and my dear old friend the President, that during his time of office you are approaching the full payment of money which will set you free from debt, and in that I wish you God speed. Manchester College, Oxford, and the Home Missionary College, are engaged in a common work in the interests of our Churches, and through them, year by year pass out into the Ministry a number of Ministers who feel for one another the warmest affection, and who wish to work heart and hand together throughout the country. And it is because I wish to see a closer co-operation between these two colleges that I am here this afternoon. I think we have a very different environment in the two colleges. Oxford is not exactly like Manchester, or Manchester like Oxford, but we have one heart, one spirit, and one mind, and I rejoice to think that now the standard of education here in Manchester has been raised quite to an equal level with that at Oxford. In Manchester you have a great opportunity in connection with the open faculty of theology, and I congratulate my friends who are taking a distinguished position in connection with it. I congratulate my dear old friend, the Principal, in his distinction in connection with the Faculty, so well deserved an honour to him as well as to us. And I congratulate him on the fruit of his labours when his students take their place in the University. All that I can do to show my heartfelt sympathy with your College and your new home I shall be ready to do.

The old students' annual dinner was this year for the first time also held at Summerville. The President of the Students' Union, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, was in the chair, supported on either side by Rev. C. C. Coe and Colonel Pilcher. There were about fifty students, past and present, at the dinner, which was served in the libraries. Afterwards an adjournment was made to the common rooms, and here toasts and music filled up a happy evening.

Cricket: Another Century.

On Friday came the cricket match, held on the beautiful University Grounds at Fallowfield. The teams were Summerville v. Ministers, but all the students were not free, and so Summerville had to be helped out by the addition of a few friends. The Ministers won the match by an innings and five runs, but Summerville got all the glory. The biggest hit and the biggest individual score were secured for the college by its senior student, Edgar Thackray, who was the hero of the day. The Ministers won the toss, and put the Students in. Alas! they were not in long. Attack, for the Ministers, carried all before him, securing 7 wickets for 10 runs, the others being captured by Shaw 2 for 16, and S. H. Street 1 for 0. Their total score was only 27. The Ministers replied with 179, of which Worthington secured 43, Shaw 40, Dolphin and S. H. Street 22 each, Holmshaw 20, and Turner 15. Things looked bad for the students and their friends when, after a merry lunch, at which they were joined by many friends, including a number of ladies, they went in again. But a new spirit came to them. All played well and fearlessly; runs mounted up steadily.

But where all did well Thackray did better. By bright, quick, free play he piled up the fine score of 104 not out, thus spoiling Attack's average and earning the charring round the field which his fellow students did not fail to accord him.

Yet one further function remained, always the last, and, in some ways, the only sad one in a merry and strenuous week—the "Farewell Social." As in past years this was held on Friday evening, and a number of the students' friends were present at the gathering. Three men were leaving, Mr. Herbert McLachlan, M.A., B.D.; Mr. Edgar Thackray, M.A., who is proceeding to Harvard as a Hibbert Scholar; and Mr. Victor Grayson, who has resigned his College bursary with the intention of entering Parliament. A hearty farewell was accorded to all, and the pain of parting was softened by the warm sense of loyalty which keeps all H.M.C. men, past and present, still the devoted sons of their Alma Mater.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE forty-sixth annual meeting of the Missionary Conference was held in Manchester on Thursday, July 5. The attendance at both sessions was larger than in any previous year, while the actual membership of the Conference is now also larger than ever, between forty and fifty members having been added during the past two years. The Conference opened, as usual, with the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper by the President, Principal Gordon, and a further devotional service conducted by the Rev. A. Turner, of Templepatrick.

The PRESIDENT took the chair, and called the Conference to order at eleven o'clock, when the first business after the minutes was the admission of twenty-five new members, to whom the President gave a hearty welcome, the Rev. C. C. Coe responding.

Before proceeding with his address, the PRESIDENT made reference to the losses sustained by the conference during the year. Two men had been struck down in their ranks, not in failing age, but in the vigour of early manhood. The brave, genial, and kindly spirit of Richard Lyttle had passed on high, while it made one feel as almost belonging to a past generation when one's own pupils finished their earthly course. And he mourned the painfully sudden death of an earnest student, and faithful minister, in Richard Moore. Later in the day the Conference paid reverent homage to the character of its two deceased members by silent standing votes. The Rev. J. H. Bibby spoke on behalf of all the admiration for his fine abilities and the love for his generous personality felt towards the late Rev. R. Lyttle, and the Rev. J. C. Hirst bore affectionate testimony to the worth of his old scholar, who had become to him as a son, the late Rev. R. C. Moore.

The address of the President was a most appropriate and helpful study of the new conditions of missionary enterprise. In addition to traditional methods, two new schemes had arisen amongst them in recent years. The Postal Mission had for its object the seeking of Nicodemus in his home to persuade him to leave the twilight and come out into the open day. The Unitarian Van goes out to invite the common people, who once heard the Gospel gladly, to come and hear it again free from the dogmatic accretions of later days. Both methods had been met with criticism, but the Postal Mission had survived and become well established. The Unitarian Van was still looked upon with suspicion, if not with superciliousness, in some quarters. The object of the Unitarian Van was to bring Unitarians into public notice. But were they not already everywhere in evidence? They used never to be mentioned without the word "moribund." They had been an unconscionable time a-dying. Now Unitarians found that Undenominational religion was by one consent stigmatised Unitarianism. Nor was he surprised. With whatever prepossession you approach the study of the Bible, whatever else you find in it you cannot escape the discovery of faith in one sole God the Father. That is stamped on every part and nearly every page of the Book, and the apprehension in regard to Unitarianism is therefore well grounded. Now the agents of the Van Mission were going to open their souls to the people, and one good thing about such an enterprise was in what it would call forth from us rather than in what it would add to us. But the mission would be undertaken for the good of others. That was the constraining motive in any true Gospel mission. Their aim would not be so much to throw down as to replace. And in doing so speakers would remember the divergencies in our ranks, and speak for themselves alone. Not that differences were peculiar to us. They were far more common amongst Trinitarians. Yet Trinitarians could combine in joint missionary enterprises, notwithstanding that at other times they were in the habit of damning one another. Unitarians were agreed to abstain from that pleasing and self-gratifying exercise, and that in itself might not be an unworthy lesson in Christian charity to present to the people. Another difficulty in this open air work which some had felt, was "the man with the mop," the man who would obtrude upon some fine ideal presented by the missionary with irrelevant and coarse interjections, thus destroying the effect of the appeal. Well, "the man with the mop" must be accepted as a condition of such work, and his point of view must be understood, for however unlovely he might be, he was representative of a great class, and unless the speaker could come to terms with him he could not hope to reach the mass of his hearers. Thus after a few years they might hope that some of them would become equipped for appeal to the masses in a way they never could have been by associating with Unitarians only. There were two objects dear to the heart of the average Englishman. One was the Bible. It may be on its trial at the hands of critics and statesmen. We cannot employ it as our fathers did. To attempt to do so would be unjust to our cause and to the Bible itself. They must strive for the recovery of the true place of the Bible, a work which no one else could do with such authority and frankness as the Unitarians. The other thing was a feeling of the unsurpassed excellence of the character of Jesus Christ. They had it in their power to present the personality of Jesus Christ in a way which would remove the halo of fictitious divinity which now obscured the true dignity of our leader and Lord. In spite of some disabilities they had an equipment inferior to none for appeal to the human heart and mind. Not only could they offer a faith, but also the fellowship of a group of churches, and that would come to many lonely thinkers as a glad surprise. In conclusion, Principal Gordon said he could not help thrilling to the missionary appeal. His grandfather was a personal convert of John Wesley. When he used to put his hand on his head in blessing, he always said, "This hand has touched the hand of the greatest missionary that ever lived." Last month he, Mr. Gordon, reached an age at which his own father resolved to retire as being no longer sure of his own judgment. As he had never been sure of his own judgment, and as it was better to rub than to rust, he hoped God would give him grace to rub on a little longer.

The report, the adoption of which was moved by the Rev. J. C. Street, referred to the successful services held last summer at Windermere, and to the arrangements for services on the Isle of Man. A separate report was presented on the "Unitarian Van," and this was moved by the Rev. J. A. Pearson. The report gave an interesting review of the inception and development of the idea, and testified to the enthusiasm and generous financial support which it had called forth. It also testified to the great service and self-sacrifice of Mr. Bertram Talbot who is in charge of the Van as a permanent link between the missionaries who take up the work from week to week. In addition to the ordinary evening meetings there had been mid-day meetings at mill gates, and special meetings for children. The attendance had varied from 50 or 60 in the villages to anything up to 1,000 in the towns. The addresses were positive and devotional, and only controversial when controversy was forced upon the missionaries. Help had been forthcoming in abundance, and while the ministers had had the greater share in the work, some lay men and women had also helped by speaking, singing, or in other ways. The report declared in conclusion that "those engaged in the work are impressed with its value and without exception ready for further service." The financial statements, both of the Conference and the Van, were very satisfactory, and the whole of the reports were adopted with acclamation and hearty appreciation of the great labours of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, the organiser of the Van movement.

The Rev. J. Channing Pollard was elected president for the coming year, and the Revs. W. R. Shanks, T. P. Spedding, and W. E. Atack were re-elected to the respective offices of secretary, treasurer, and auditor. For committee the conference elected the Revs. J. A. Pearson, C. Peach, H. B. Smith, J. M. Bass, and H. J. Rossington.

Our Name, Message, and Mission.

At the afternoon session the Rev. H. Bodell Smith read a paper on "Our Name, Message, and Mission." He referred to the controversy which the use of the Unitarian name always aroused. This led to appeals to drop both its discussion and its use. But he assumed that great principles were involved, else why so much discussion, and could they burke a question of principle for the sake of comfort? Would it not be better to fight it out to a finish and get it settled and out of the way, whether they split on the matter or not? They would then know where they were, and cease to suspect each other. It was wrong to bury an issue that was very much alive, and hypocritical to pretend that there was peace when there was not. This question would come up. For example, a committee had been established to keep questions of Social Reform before our churches. What was the one and only question upon which the committee differed at its recent meeting in London? The name. The provisional committee recommended "The National Conference Union for Social Service." An amendment proposed "The Unitarian Union." Acceptance of the colourless name was urged, and with no little warmth many secessions were threatened if the word Unitarian came in. The result is that while all other denominations have unions for social services identified with them by name, the Unitarian Society is hidden under a name which will be recognised by none outside, and not even by the majority of Unitarians themselves. This policy of excluding the name was being ceaselessly pushed forward even while controversy was deprecated. He, however, believed it would fail. Where the weight of Dr. Martineau's influence was not great enough to get our churches to disown it, his followers on this question were not likely to succeed. Our mission, Mr. Smith contended, was to expound to the people our Unitarianism in all its fulness, and with all its gains from science, art, and philosophy, to proclaim it as deliverance from ignorance and superstition, from sin and greed, from the hell of evil on earth, from oppression, social injustice, and all unbrotherliness, from war of sects, classes, and nations, and from all fear of the world to come.

A discussion followed, in which the Revs. A. Hall, C. J. Street, W. Hall, J. M. Mills, J. Dale, and others took part. Most of the speakers were in hearty sympathy with the views expressed in the paper.

LAST Saturday the seventieth birthday of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, and his thirty-seven years of service in Parliament, were celebrated at Birmingham with great cordiality. Party differences were rightly set aside. After all his experience of the possibilities of service in the House of Commons, Mr. Chamberlain said that he still felt there was no more honourable, and few more useful careers, than one spent in the performance of civic duties.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

THE session of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, was brought to a close on Wednesday, June 27, when the prizes were distributed and addresses delivered by the examiners. Two students of the College, as we announced last week, have obtained the B.D. degree in the University of Wales.

The deputation from the Presbyterian Board consisted of Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, Mr. Harold Baily, and the Revs. H. Rawlings and E. S. Hicks, who, with Dr. Talfourd Ely and the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, were the examiners.

Dr. Hicks presided at the prize giving, and in his opening address congratulated the students on a good session's work, and spoke with special satisfaction of the work the College was doing in preparing men for the Divinity degree in the University. Turning to the wider aspects of their work as students for the ministry, he spoke of the priceless opportunity they had in those years of study.

Emerson might indeed be quoted as making light of scholarship, as he burst forth into that gladsome canticle of farewell to all that had held him back from the scene he loved:—

"O, when I am safe in my sylvan home,
I tread on the pride of Greece and Rome;
And when I am stretched beneath the pines,
When the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and the pride of man,
At the sophist schools, and the learned clan;
For what are they all, in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?"

Are, then, our academies and schools of learning, Dr. Hicks asked, engaged upon a barren or even a mischievous enterprise? Are they wilfully stifling the prophetic spirit, drying up the genial currents of native enthusiasm, cramming the mind with so much information about the past that it becomes incapable of appreciating the inspirations of the present? In that case you have indeed small reason to be grateful to the teachers of this place, and those of you who to-day are leaving it may well heave a sigh of relief now that the hour of release has struck, and give vent to-night to couplets no less jubilant than Emerson's, seeing that your period of imprisonment is over. Not such, however, I venture to predict, will be the feelings with which you will depart, and I have even a shrewd suspicion that Emerson was doing injustice to his better convictions when he expressed himself in the words I have quoted. For in truth that "sylvan home" of his had become for him the sacred spot it was just through and in consequence of the very things he thus affected to despise; the overarching heavens, the beauteous earth, the whole panorama around him, saturated and imbued with those very imaginations, ideas, and conceptions which he had gleaned from the scholars and thinkers he here treats with such scant respect, and without which he would have stretched himself beneath the pines in vain. There is in truth no fact of experience more certain than this, that we only see what we bring with us the power of seeing, that if we are to extract from life's surroundings their deeper and profounder meanings we must fling into them something of the ideal we would carry away, that if we go to them with none of the insight inherited from the great spirits of our race, they will reveal to us no sanctity and awaken in us no assurance of that which is divine. Herein, then, we apprehend the essential purpose of a liberal culture, a purpose which we might almost express as being to humanise nature, and to naturalise man—that is to say to see reflected in nature the soul's greatest thoughts, and to find in the soul a life at home with nature, because there nature comes to interpret and to understand itself. One of the saddest and most distressing features of modern civilisation is the circumstance that the vast majority of human beings are almost wholly incapable of appreciating aright the greatness and dignity of the existence with which here and now they are endowed, and that they leave this world at the end with as little consciousness as they had at the beginning of its accumulated wealth of heavenly revelation. We need not think merely of the multitudes who are sunk in the slough of ignorance and vice hardly one degree removed in their appetites and desires above the animals; it is enough to remember the dull routine of common-place respectability which is the best a vast number of men can boast of, to realise how delusive would be the thought that they are deriving from the fair universe in the midst of which they are placed anything like the assurances that Emerson stationed amongst his green hills obtained. It is not knowledge that has cramped their souls and blinded their eyes; it is the want of it that is the cause of their disease, and which is condemning them to the condition which Wordsworth describes in the case of Peter Bell, for whom "A primrose by the river's brim" was just a yellow primrose and nothing more.

Now, the course of training pursued within these walls will have performed the highest service that is to be hoped from it, if it has awakened within the minds of those who have followed it a sense of the infinite worth and value of our human inheritance and of the divinity that encompasses it on every side. Here, there has been gained some outlook at least upon an immense world—the sphere of natural law, reason's own incarnation, no less significant in your plot of garden ground than in the stupendous scenes of suns and planetary systems, the wondrous story of the human soul with its almost illimitable resources of reflection and imagination, of admiration and affection, of love and sacrifice, of the human centuries with their ever expanding ideals of goodness and perfection, of the literature in which are enshrined the ideas and aspirations of the choicest spirits of our race, and of the omniscient Wisdom that has been progressively unfolding itself in all these, and gradually conveying to our finite understandings the mother thoughts of the universe. "Pantheism," said a great Oxford teacher, "is wrong if it means that God 'is' all things; but it is right if it means that there is 'nothing' in which you cannot touch God; nothing, that is, which you cannot love, nothing which you need not fear, nothing out of which you cannot make something, nothing out of which you cannot be something." That is the conviction which a liberal culture ought to awaken, and in the light of which this earthly life should assume for us a character of endless suggestion and interest, and link us by a thousand ties to the Mind that sustains and animates the whole. Who can think poorly or speak disdainfully of life, if once he has shared, for example, to any extent in the companionship of Socrates, and listened to that unique teacher as he discoursed on the nobility of virtue and the dignity of manhood? Or who can mutter empty platitudes about the vanity of human knowledge under the eye of that master who taught intelligence to be its own guide and to find its way into the world of supreme reality? Or who could venture to doubt the sincerity of religious conviction, in the presence of that Apostle, who could proclaim the presence of the Universal Spirit on the acropolis of the Olympian deities, and carry the gospel of Christ with never-flagging enthusiasm from one coast of Europe to the other?

Thus has the College sought to equip its students for the momentous work to which they have dedicated their lives, and to fit them for the task of being in their turn witnesses of spiritual truth and interpreters of spiritual realities to the men and women and young people in the midst of whom they will minister. No single item of knowledge which you have gained here will prove to be useless to you in the actual fulfilment of your mission, if only you have so assimilated it and made it part of yourselves that through it nature becomes in some measure more intelligible and the plan of things a little clearer than it would otherwise be. It will not be needful for you to be always talking of the spiritual universe in order to lead your people to a realisation of its presence; gradually and by degrees you will so transform for them their present environment that its divine meaning cannot fail to reveal itself to their understanding and heart. It is not through the stereotyped dogmas and creeds of the sects that the truths of religion are conveyed to the human soul and consciousness. Puzzle not, for example, the minds of the little children of your congregation with the premature information many people think to be so necessary about the soul and God and duty, but take care that when they do come to the knowledge of these it shall be for them a grand and august discovery, which no after reflection will impair, and no further experience invalidate. There is, I believe, no more prevalent ground of indifference and misgiving in regard to the great conceptions of religion than the crude notions of an anthropomorphic deity and a material heaven which are the inevitable products of the child mind as the outcome of so-called "religious instruction," and which not seldom lingering on into riper years give rise to that negation and doubt so prominent in the world to-day. In one sense, it is true, we are all as little children, confronted as we are by life's ultimate problems, and encircled by the vast unknown which still remains after we have extended to the utmost extent our limited powers of apprehension. But because we do not know all, it does not follow that our knowledge, so far as it goes, is not real knowledge, or that we should speak to our fellow-men in half-hearted and hesitating tones. Yet in their case also it will be mainly through convincing them of the divineness of the world—of the ordinary familiar facts of every-day life and experience—that you will build up the worthiest ideas of God in whom you lead them to trust. Go forth, then, to them with the assurance you here have gained that the spiritual world is no spectre, but the deepest reality of the life that now is—that the visible universe is the embodiment of infinite thought, its growth and development the story of infinite purpose—that man in his onward progress has been led by an infinite ideal, and that in his thirst for knowledge, in his obedience to truth, in his aspiration after goodness, the Word is ever becoming flesh—and may your labour commend itself to Him who seeth the end from the beginning and weaveth the ages as a work upon the loom.

The other examiners also spoke, Mr. Baily laying special stress on the importance of attention to health and the value of familiarity with noble poetry, and Mr. Rawlings commending to the students such books as Bunyan's "Grace Abounding," and Jeremy Taylor's "Liberty of Prophecy." Principal Evans thanked the members of the deputation for their addresses, and the prizes were then distributed by Mrs. Hicks.

BY A MINISTER.

XLII.

It is a surprise to some of us in later years to find how amusing a classical author can be. If we loved the classics in early days, we loved them from afar. The immortals of Greece and Rome were as remote from us as the gods of their own Olympus. A text-book was a book to study, but not to read. Epic and lyric, tragedy and comedy, all were taken seriously; if humour reached us, it was received with faint and incredulous smile. When we had analysed a fable, or parsed an epigram, the wit of it had flown. When we were preparing a lesson, it was too soon to laugh; and, when we had prepared it, it was too late. But now we take up a stray volume, and suspicion steals over us that the writer is saying a good thing, knowing and enjoying it, laughing and expecting you to laugh; you dip between the pages and discover that this fun of his is coming out of a heart very like your own, and belongs to a time not wholly unlike the age in which you live. At last you are convinced that this dead language was once very much alive, and was as flexible a medium as that mother-tongue through which you express your own gaiety of soul. I am bound to add for myself that the warm, human interest of these later writers makes me forget that their literary imperfections mark them off from the immortals themselves.

Lucian, for instance. Here is flesh and blood. Here is a classic with a modern turn. He knows my point of view. He turns his sentences very much as I would turn them, if I could begin them. He seems to be no further away than the eighteenth century. He might be one of the humorists of that Augustan age. He is as pungent as Swift, as polite as Addison. Some of his tales are true Gulliver's Travels, and there are skits and sketches which might have been written for the Spectator. His writings have the true flavour of belles-lettres. He gives you essay or dialogue, burlesque or parody, memoir or romance, as he happens to be in the mood. His themes are those still in vogue—the vanity of human wishes, the fickleness of fortune, the deceitfulness of wealth, the follies of fashion, the miseries of dependence, the airs of patronage, the disappointments of avarice, the abuse of athletics, the use and abuse of friendship, the absurdities of pedantry, the eccentricities of genius, the delusions of ignorance. In one direction he is as good as the best of us, even in this advanced age. He is a higher critic. He questions everything. He spares neither myth, nor ancient text, nor religious rite. There is not a school of philosophy that he does not deride. Gods and goddesses, poets and heroes, kings and sages are quizzed and teased with impartial ridicule. He allows in one place that he had taught severe Dialogue to wear a comic mask, and he certainly seems at times to anticipate the bantering methods of modern comment. Aristophanes is his master, but his touch is lighter, and his drollery less laboured. Even in his overdrawn pictures of "society," the high colouring is more in the vein of Punch than in that of Juvenal, who had flourished just before.

Round the charm of the writer hangs the mystery of the man. Was he a Christian? Did he apostatise? Had he any religion at all? All three questions have been asked, and I am not sure that the commentators do not ask them still. A Syrian who had the tongue, but not the soul, of a Greek could never have quite explained himself, either to the West or to the East; but his age was an age of Apologists, and one would like to hear his own defence. Conversion and apostasy were very fluid terms then, and religion also.

Philetus—of whom I have already spoken—thinks that Lucian, with his modern air, would be a good author for schoolboys, and would beguile them into a love of writers of the golden age. His idea is that a kaleidoscope is better to begin with than a telescope. I cannot agree. Lucian is a scoffer. He lacks reverence. A jester who can poke fun at Homer is not the best of guides to the Iliad, and a sceptic who is always attacking superstition may easily misrepresent religion. The cant of popular belief, the hollowness of philosophy, and the wrangles of philosophers, may have needed exposure then, but the danger of our own day is the danger of studying only to expose. We learn only too soon to satirise what we do not care to understand. The old curriculum may be dull for beginners, but is wiser in the end. Lucian will keep.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare.—Anniversary services were held at the Old Meeting on Sunday and Monday, July 1 and 2. The preachers were the Revs. E. D. Jenkins, Llwynthydown and D. G. Rees, Bridgead. The attendances were large at the four services, and included each time a great number of strangers. On Monday evening the introductory service was conducted by the Rev. D. Rhoslyn Davies.

Aberdeen.—Professor G. Bonet-Maury, D.D., LL.D., the distinguished French scholar, with his Scottish degree (LL.D. of St. Andrews) fresh upon him, spoke on the Broad Hill on Sunday afternoon, in connection with the usual meeting held there by the Unitarian congregation. The day was warm, and the hill was thickly covered with listeners. Rev. A. Webster introduced the professor, and referred to his work as a representative of liberal religion in France. Professor Bonet-Maury, who is white-haired, alert, and gracious, gave an interesting address on the principles of Protestantism as held by the group of Liberals in France, specially emphasising the principle of personal liberty and of personal responsibility. He made allusion to two Scotsmen—William Robertson Smith and Robert Louis Stevenson—as representatives of the application of these two principles, and as men of whom Scotland might be justly proud. He expressed the pleasure he had in speaking to an assembly of Scotsmen of such principles, and trusted that they would always be held dear by the descendants of the Covenanters. The address was listened to with close attention. In the name of his congregation and the audience, Mr. Webster thanked the professor for his visit and address.

Bootle.—On Sunday, the 8th inst., anniversary services were held morning and evening, and a flower service in the afternoon. The services were conducted by the resident minister (Rev. J. Morley Mills), who preached in the morning on "Foundation Principles," and in the evening read a parable he had written bearing on the Religious Education Question, and pointing the moral that the emphasis must be placed on the child rather than on the Church. Special music was rendered, and there was a good attendance at all the services. On the 23rd ult. a garden party and sale of work was held in the spacious gardens of Mr. W. J. Pidgeon, kindly lent for the occasion, when nearly £16 was realised.

Chorley.—Well-attended flower services were held on Sunday last in the old chapel. It was a new departure and most successful.

Chowbent.—The school sermons were preached on Sunday last by Revs. Principal Gordon and J. J. Wright, when there were large attendances, and the collections for the day amounted to nearly £60, being an increase of over £5 on last year.

Denton (Welcome Meeting).—Anniversary services to commemorate the 27th year of the Wilton-street Chapel, were held on Sunday, July 1, the preacher, morning and evening, being the Rev. F. W. Stanley, of Brixton, and in the afternoon the Rev. H. E. Perry. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. Lawrence Scott. On the previous afternoon a very successful garden-party was held in Mr. Scott's grounds to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Perry to Denton. Tea was served in the Wilton-street school, after which a short meeting was held, over which the Rev. Lawrence Scott presided. The chairman and the Rev. F. W. Stanley spoke of their old friendship with Mr. Perry when they were all working together at Nottingham, and the Revs. A. R. Andrae W. G. Price, W. F. Turland, and G. Evans, and Messrs. J. J. Duncan, E. Catlow, and J. T. Walmsley, on behalf of the congregation, cordially joined in the welcome, to which Mr. Perry responded with grateful acknowledgment of the kindness, which had already been extended to him and his wife.

Douglas, I.O.M.—At the annual meeting of the Missionary Conference, the question of promoting continuous services in the I.O.M. was considered. There was a strong feeling in favour of an active forward policy, and the idea of a Unitarian missionary to the Island found favour. The summer services arranged for the present season were approved, but a start will not be possible till July 29, instead of the 22nd.

Halifax.—The annual flower service was held on Sunday afternoon, at Northgate End Chapel, when Mr. J. Williams Sutcliffe gave an address to the scholars; the collection and donation were £3 4s. 9d. for the Scholars' Sick Fund.

Kingswood (near Birmingham).—Anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, July 8, by the Rev. Thomas Paxton, of Newhall Hill. The evening congregation was an overflowing one, people having to sit in the aisles, porches, and vestry. In accordance with the old custom, buns were distributed to the children of the Sunday-school at the close of the morning service. The collections realised a little over £10.

London: Bermondsey.—The annual excursion of the Band of Hope and Mercy took place on Thursday, 5th inst., to Southend-on-Sea, when a party numbering 98 spent a day of unalloyed pleasure. Thanks are due to those kind friends whose generous response to the appeal for funds made this possible.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual choir sermons were preached on Sunday last (July 8) by the Rev. N. Anderton. Special music was rendered, and large congregations attended both services.

Mottram.—Several events of a special nature have happened here during the last few weeks. On Saturday, June 23, a united picnic of the four churches of Ashton, Mossley, Stalybridge, and Mottram was held; nearly 100 had tea in the schoolroom and went a ramble. This was a result of the United Mission of the four churches last February. June 30 was the annual field day of the Sunday-school. Sunday last, July 8, was the scholars' annual walk and prize distribution. A procession of about 230 scholars, teachers, members, and friends walked through the village, headed by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, of Gee Cross, Rev. H. Bodell Smith, and officers. Hymns were sung in the market place, and there was an address by the minister. The Rev. H. E. Dowson preached in the afternoon to a congregation of 350, and at evening service, when the prizes (64) were distributed, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith and Mr. J. H. Elkin gave addresses to nearly 400 people.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The annual Pic-nic was held at Glossop on Saturday last, 120 persons being present. After tea, in the school, Mr. Rigby acted as leader in a ramble round Mossy Lea, and back by Sheffield-road. A halt was made on the way, and several Whitsuntide hymns were sung, Mr. Woolley acting as conductor. A vote of thanks was accorded to the Glossop friends for their arrangements, on the motion of Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by Rev. W. Harrison. Rev. H. E. Perry was present for the first time, and a hearty welcome was given to him by the speakers, to which he fittingly responded. Mr. Sleightam and Mr. Rigby replied for the Glossop friends. The Revs. A. R. Andrae, W. G. Price, H. Bodell Smith, and J. E. Stead were also present. A large party of the Denton friends cycled over. The day was beautifully fine, and the pic-nic was enjoyed by all.

Royton.—A week's open-air mission was started here by friends from Oldham on Monday, the 9th inst. Interest is being aroused and literature distributed both at the meetings and by house-to-house visitation. Good help is rendered by members of the Oldham choir. The speakers include Revs. J. E. Stead, H. K. White, H. J. Rossington, W. G. Price, T. P. Spedding and J. A. Pearson, and Mr. W. H. Jenkins. The venture would have been greatly helped, had it been possible to secure the use of the Unitarian Van, but that is this week so far away as Clitheroe.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, July 8, the 87th anniversary of the General Baptist Sunday-school was held. The morning service was taken by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, and in the evening an American Sunday-school concert service, entitled "Welcome Summer," was rendered. It treated of "The rain, flowers, birds, and fruit of the Bible." Questions asked were answered by the children by responses from the Bible, and there were various recitations and special music. The service, which was well attended and much appreciated, consisted of forty-four parts, and required steady application to carry it through. Collections were in advance of last year.

Shrewsbury.—The 116th anniversary of the Sunday-school connected with the High-street

Church was commemorated on June 24, when sermons were preached by Rev. J. C. Street, and collections taken on behalf of the School Fund.

Whitby.—A considerable number of visitors attended Flowergate Old Chapel on Sunday last, when the minister (Rev. F. Haydn Williams) gave a special discourse on Dr. Anderson's remarkable article, in the new number of the Hibbert Journal, entitled "Why not Face the Facts?" The hymnal (in use for the past three years) at this chapel is the Ethical Hymn Book, compiled by Dr. Stanton Coit and Mr. Gustav Spiller. Dr. Coit's "Message of Man, a Book of Ethical Scriptures," is in constant use as a lectionary, and aspirations, without theological implications, have been substituted for prayers.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Tercentenary of Rembrandt's birth at Leiden, July 15, 1606, was duly celebrated in that city, and at Amsterdam, where the greater part of his life was spent, and where he died Oct. 8, 1669. In the Encyclopædia Britannica, 1607 is given as the year of his birth, but the celebration has kept to the more generally accepted date. One of the world's greatest artists, Rembrandt is the special glory of Holland, being to that country, it has been said, what Shakespeare is to England, Goethe to Germany, and Dante to Italy. The celebration has been marked in this country by the publication of a fine work on Rembrandt, with seventy plates in colour and photogravure, and a study of his work by Emile Michel, Member of the Institute of France. (Heinemann, 30s. net.) The book is also published in America, France, Germany, and Holland.

MONDAY'S Manchester Guardian, in an article on Rembrandt, referred especially to his wonderful portraits, and noted "intense consciousness" as the leading characteristic of all his sitters, something very different from the self-consciousness of one who sits for his portrait. "The latter is of all aspects the least valuable; it is the one which decisively reduces the whole art of Vandyke to second rank; but in Rembrandt's portrayal of men and women we get the least fastidious, and the most convincing version of life and character that the art of painting has ever produced. Here is something far deeper than the sharp and momentary vivacity of Franz Hals, more searching than the bright fleshliness of Rubens, more truly at home with human nature than the exquisite mannerliness of Titian, who brought all his sitters to the court where life was to be as a fine art." Not that Rembrandt is a greater artist than Titian, the writer adds, but "Titian was by nature the painter of aristocracy, Rembrandt of democracy."

THE House of Commons has at last found a clause in the Education Bill over which it is in general agreement. The clause is No. 35 of the original Bill, and gives power to local authorities to provide vacation schools of a recreative character. A suggestion was made to prohibit the use of books in these "holiday tasks," but Mr. Birrell resisted the amendment in order not to bar out the reading of Andersen's Fairy Tales.

THE second part of the clause is of still greater importance: "Power to make such arrangements as may be sanctioned by the Board of Education for attending to the health and physical condition of the children educated in public elementary schools." By the common consent of the House, this clause as amended on Monday night, is the most valuable section of the Bill, and in this matter at least the House may be regarded as representing the country. We are beginning to mend our ways, and it is therefore ungracious to make much of our long and laggard indifference which has left us so far behind other civilised peoples in our regard for the healthiness of the school population.

It will be noticed that the clause as introduced was of the local option type. Education authorities could act. But by the clause as amended the local authorities must take action. Every child is to be medically examined when first it goes to school, and afterwards as the local authority or the Board of Education may direct. The adoption of this clause serves to draw attention to the value of the provision in the Act of 1902 by which the schools were brought under the county or borough councils. It will be possible for the medical inspector of schools to be one person with the local medical officer of health, and the oversight of the health of the children may be linked with the one health policy of the Council. The fresh duties will make it possible to utilise the whole time of the medical officer in many districts where this is not now the case. It will throw fresh responsibility on the Health Department, which should be among the most dignified as it is among the most highly useful forms of local government.

WE recommend this subject to the attention of our readers, and trust that it may serve to stimulate fresh interest in the work of the medical officers. To any who may wish to pursue the subject, we can recommend a deeply interesting blue-book. This is the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Medical Inspection and Feeding of Children (Cd. 2779, price 1s. 3d.). It should serve as a good introduction to the study of social questions, and, taken together with the report of the local medical officer, will be instructive and stimulating reading for those who desire knowledge of the life conditions of their town or city.

THE official or semi-official journalistic organ of the churches now commonly known as Congregationalist has passed through many vicissitudes. At one time it was the Independent, and sold at 4d. a copy. Those were the days when members loved to emphasise their independence, and to speak of their houses of worship as chapels. For some years past we have grown familiar with its present title, The Examiner. In future it is to appear as the British Congregationalist, and absorbs into itself the Christian News, the organ of the Scottish Congregational Churches. We will not pause to speculate what unspoken reasons there may be for the amalgamation, but from the leader in which the policy of the new paper is laid down we cull a sentence which is more open to dispute than its form would suggest: "The experience of the past has proved conclusively that a denominational paper cannot be too strongly denominational, and we hope, under a more strictly denominational title, to appeal to Congregational sentiment, and to serve Congregational interests more thoroughly and successfully, than we have hitherto done." We wish the British Congregationalist all success, while suggesting that denominational multiplied by three may be perhaps a little excessive.

"Young man, keep clean inside," is the title of a leaflet issued by the Knights of the White Cross, quoted in the Chicago Unity of July 5. "Never permit yourself," is one of its rules, "to listen to an improper story you would not care to repeat to your mother or your sisters." And then come the following sentences:—

"Allow no man to drag your mind through a sewer. Do you know there is many a man who would sacrifice much to-day to be able to wipe from his memory some of the things he listened to when a boy.

"The man who will deliberately repeat a risqué story in the presence of a youth deserves no respect. He is an incarnate devil of meanness. He is daubing a coarse picture on clean walls. No gentleman will tell a story he could not tell in the presence of ladies.

"Do you remember what General Grant said to the officer who began to tell a story, remarking, 'There are no ladies present,' whereupon the silent soldier quickly retorted, 'There are gentlemen present.'

"Keep your minds unsullied. A foul suggestion may harden into a habit of thought that will lead you far astray. Keep clean inside.

"It is more a matter of importance that you should keep the dirt off your soul than to keep it off your clothes."

THE current number of the Christian Freeman opens with a portrait of Dr. Estlin Carpenter, and some biographical notes. In the list of his works Fiele is a misprint for Tiele. And in the last paragraph touring should be towing path. The last sentence, "and has at times presided at the organ" in the College Chapel, is new light to us.

THE July number of the Studio has an article on the American sculptor, Charles Henry Niehaus, and among the illustrations, which include the fine head of his Garfield statue (erected at Cincinnati, his native place), is one of his bust of Robert Collyer. The portraiture is decidedly severe. All the Yorkshire grit is there, but not the sunshine of humour and a happy heart, which for us makes up so much of Robert Collyer.

To leave behind the sweet memory of a gentle and affectionate life, with an unstained honour and an ever-helpful kindness; the memory of one worthy of being loved; the memory of a true and faithful friend and a brave lover of righteousness and truth:—this is the supremely worthwhile legacy of legacies, "more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold."—H. W. Crosskey.

THE Kingdom of God does not stand apart from our common life. It is a spirit and a principle pervading and regulating our life. It is not quenching our natural appetites, stamping out our affections, renouncing the ordinary methods of our life, giving up natural aims and occupations and pursuits. It is simply the maintenance among them all of a divine order and proportion and harmony, so that we may do every duty faithfully, seek every object of our desire worthily, and live all our life "as ever in our great Task Master's eye." Religion is not a new sphere of life. There is only one life; and religion is the highest law and the truest spirit, by which and in which that life is lived.—C. J. Perry.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Contemporary opens with Professor W. M. Ramsay's Rede Lecture at Cambridge, on "The War of Moslem and Christian for the Possession of Asia Minor." The story begins with the invasion of Cilicia by the Mohammedan Arabs in A.D. 641, and comes down to the present time, when schools, colleges and railways are the weapons of strife, though the danger of war is by no means past. Speaking of the Moslem triumph in Asia Minor, Dr. Ramsay says: "Nothing in history is so shameful and so contemptible as the brawls of Christian sect against sect and priest against priest, where all alike show that in their struggle for the triumph of their wretched parodies of principles, they have lost hold on the real qualities of Christianity." Another notable article is that by Sir Alfred Pease, on "The Native Question in the Transvaal," based on experience gained during his residence as Administrator of Native Affairs in the Transvaal. Mr. Harold Spender writes on "The Great Congo Iniquity," recalling the article of the Berlin Treaty of 1885, which declares that "All the Powers exercising sovereign rights or influence in the aforesaid territories bind themselves to watch over the preservation of the native tribes, and to care for the improvement of the conditions of their moral and material welfare, and to help in suppressing slavery, and especially the slave trade." Then, having described the actual state of things, he concludes:—

"Whatever the measures of redress, it is not to be believed that good men can remain inactive under the shame of this continuing crime. We are of the race of Wilberforce. In destroying the slave-trade of a hundred years ago our forefathers performed a far greater task than that to which we are called—fought against greater powers, even more strongly entrenched. But the sufferings of the Middle Passage pale before what is going on now in Central Africa. The plantation and domestic slavery of the West Indies and the Southern States, even at its worst, was humanity itself in comparison with the system which King Leopold has established over 15,000,000 human beings. A great cry goes up from that land—a cry for mercy, a cry for help. Are there none to listen?" We note also M. Paul Sabatier's brief article on "Religious Events in France," and Mrs. Caillard's on "The World of Personal Spirit," a study of Lotz's Philosophy of Religion.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. D. C. Lathbury writes on the Education Bill, "Conflict or Compromise?" warning the Bishops that even if they should succeed in wrecking the present Bill they would not really further the cause of religious education, and advocating some such compromise as that suggested by Mr. Chamberlain as the wisest for Churchmen to aim at. Mr. Herbert Paul also writes on "The Prospects of the Bill," with a concluding word of warning to the House of Lords. In this number there is a very interesting article on "Timber-planting on Waste Land," by Mr. John Nisbet, late of the Indian Forest Service. We note also the

"Plea for the White South by a Coloured Woman," and Miss Bradley's article on "'Soft Siena' and Her Children."

In the Independent Review Canon Wilson writes on "The Education Bill: A Lost Opportunity," expressing his views as a Liberal Churchman on the subject of religious teaching, but, as it is pointed out in the Notes on Current Events, basing a very doubtful argument in favour of his view on criminal statistics. Canon Barnett, in an article on "The Press and Charitable Funds," while recognising the great part played by the Press in stirring impulses of charity, deprecates the establishment of special newspaper funds as incapable of observing the true principles of charity. "Press funds," he writes, "created by excitement, and directed in a hurry, will hardly reach such an ideal. They will neither by their genesis nor by their action represent the ways of justice. The Press, I submit, deserts its high calling when it offers itself as a means by which its readers may easily do their duty by the poor. The relief of the poor can never be easy—the easiest way is almost always the wrong way. The Press, when it makes it possible for rich people to satisfy their consciences by a donation to its funds lets them escape their duty of effort, of sacrifice, and of personal sympathy. It spoils the public, as foolish parents spoil children, by taking away the call to effort." Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson writes on "Shakespeare, Ibsen, and Mr. Bernard Shaw." The last message of Ibsen he declares to have been of the meanness of man, a creature with a broken will; but Shakespeare leaves one with a sense of the tremendous worth-whileness of life. "His tragedies do somehow deliver, and elate, and inspire. Why? Not because he has shown us a purpose in the world, but because he has shown us Man, 'noble in reason, infinite in faculty, in form and moving express and admirable, in action like an angel, in apprehension like a god'; and has hung above and about him 'this brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestic roof fretted with golden fire.' It is not he, it is Ibsen, who reduces Man to a 'quintessence of dust,' and Heaven to 'a pestilent congregation of vapours.' After seeing Othello, we feel: 'So it was, and so it is well that it was'; after seeing The Wild Duck, we feel: 'Would that it had never been!' " "Shakespeare," Mr. Dickinson concludes, "was a poet, not a prophet. But what a poet! We need not complain that our modern dramatists are not poets too. But neither need we count it to them as a merit. Their drama is social criticism; and we need social criticism. But we need poetry too; and without it we shall not make much of the new society to which we are moving." The World's Work and Play opens with two illustrated articles on "Who Shall Electrify London?" The first by Mr. McKinnon Wood, M.P., representing the London County Council, the other by an "Ex-Municipal Servant," representing the point of view of private enterprise. Among the other articles is one on "The Women's Movement in France," with four portraits, and another on the Bagdad Railway, by Professor W. M. Ramsay.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from J. A., A. M. B., R. E., E. C. F., J. H., W. J. J., W. S. K., E. W. L., F. L., M. P., C. R., R. R., M. E. W.

LITERATURE.

THE MYSTERY OF LIFE IN PLANT-RESPONSE.

A GREAT teacher who knew at first hand the motions of the Universal Spirit as a child knows the ways of his father's house, bade men take thought of the irises of the field. For there the Eternal Presence, indwelling in the humblest forms of creation, would teach them His care and His love.

There has never been so much considering of the "lilies of the field" as in our day and generation. There has never been so much interest in the beginnings of vegetable existence, in the life-history of plants, as at present. The modern student may lack in reverence and tenderness; he is not wanting in thoroughness and accuracy. He may lay himself open to the charge of the poet:—

"Our meddling intellect

Mis-shapes the beauteous forms of things:
We murder to dissect."

Yet his purpose is not merely probing and analysing for their own sake; what he desires is to know the facts, to understand the truth, to serve the God of things-as-they-are. There may be a more excellent way, but this is the way the modern scientist sees and faithfully treads. And this is the way of Professor Bose.*

The cold and critical acumen, the severity of observation, the patient elaboration which we have been led to expect in the modern scientific treatise characterise every one of the 780 pages that make up his recently published treatise. It is not exactly a book for the general reader, and to secure an absorbed perusal would require considerable acquaintance with three or four sciences.

But the results of the investigations chronicled therein are of wide and deep interest. To sum them up in a sentence, it is not too much to say that they go a long way toward confirming the intuition of Wordsworth:—

"'Tis my faith that every flower Enjoys the air it breathes."

We may, under this head, cite the effect of carbonic acid, an effect which a large number of similar results lead the investigator to regard as the effect on plants in general. A pictorial representation is given of the normal response of the plant to stimulus when in a healthy condition, that is, the pulse of life, the throb of vitality which always beats through every living green thing. Carbonic acid gas is introduced into the chamber where the plant is kept, and we are now shown the effect of half an hour's exposure. A great depression has subdued the activity of the organism, and the responses are reduced to about half their normal value. But see the result of the sudden re-admission of fresh air. The record shows that there is a transient exaltation of the response, which culminates in double its normal height.

This mounting high of the plant's pulse of life testifies to a leap of joy; it is a sign and token of renewed hope and gladness, of a low consciousness—"How beautiful it is to be alive!"

Such signal of exultation upon the quickening of vitality; on the other hand, the shuddering and shrinking that ensue under a douche of ice-cold water; again, the obtuseness and stupidity which fall upon the plant as an anodyne when the effects of poisoning increase, and the last straight movement is made, and the stop, the rigor mortis that follows the ending of the tale of weak existence—all these phenomena seem to teach that here, too, is power of feeling, is sentiency, is consciousness, however dim and undeveloped. Francis Darwin, the first-fruits of whose researches were published twenty-six years ago in conjunction with his distinguished father in "Power of Movement in Plants," declares such phenomena must be regarded as psychological, and are best described in terms of consciousness.

The proof of similar response in inorganic matter, which Professor Bose accumulated in his "Response in the Living and Non-living," of four years ago, may seem to invalidate such a conclusion; not, however, if there is a unity of physical consciousness manifesting in gradations of expression, as the ascent is made from mineral to plant and plant to animal. "What sleeps in the stone and slumbers in the flower, dreams in the animal, and wakes in man."

The object of Professor Bose in the present work has been to further demonstrate the continuity of responsive phenomena in the inorganic and organic world. He has already shown how the similarity of response in tin as in animal muscle, proving that metals can be excited, depressed, fatigued, and killed (facts already known to workers in metals everywhere), erases the line of demarcation between the physical and physiological. By extending his inquiry he is enabled to show that the distinction between "sensitive" and ordinary plants must be abolished, for both classes answer to stimulus. He is now more fully able to demonstrate that all the important characteristics of the responses exhibited by even the most highly differentiated animal tissues are also to be found in plants.

However inconvenient may be this new generalisation, Professor Bose furnishes ample testimony that irritability or molecular responsiveness may exist without a nervous system, or even protoplasm. All methods of mechanical response in metal, amœba, mimosa, or muscle of mammal, he has reduced to a single law, viz., that response is always by contraction of the more excited side. This law he finds universally applicable.

The theory of existence we may build upon this basis will depend upon our predilections. We shall welcome another apparent confirmation of a mechanical view of the universe, or claim it as a further suggestion that life is a principle independent of the organism or inorganic structure through which it manifests for a time, laying upon it its will so far as the capacity of the vessel allows.

Professor Bose writes:—"From the point of view of its movements, a plant may be regarded in either of two ways: in the first place as a mysterious entity with regard to whose working no law can be definitely predicated, or in the second place, simply as a machine, transforming the energy supplied to it in ways more or less capable of mechanical application."

Of these two he favours the second view, on the plea that definite results are more quickly attained by fixing attention on the molecular aspect than by "permitting ourselves to evade each difficulty as it arises by referring it to the inexplicable action of a mystical vital force."

But is there not a third view possible, a golden mean between the two? May not a plant be regarded as the temporary embodiment of a mystical entity, a monad of life which works through it in accordance with discoverable and explicable law? What are these numerous experiments but means of finding out the way in which the mystical force that animates and vitalises the plant, makes answer to the calls made upon it through the plant-form, a force whose operation man may retard or enhance or drive out, but never extinguish nor create?

Why should the mechanical operation of law, the automatism of law be held to abnegate a theory of vitalism? Does not the automatic way in which, as experts, we perform the actions like writing or pianoforte playing, by us painfully and laboriously learnt, suggest that the uniform and mechanically unerring automatism of natural law bears witness to the ways of the "perfect artist, who in his person acts his own creations"?

"Molecular responsiveness is a universal property of matter," says the author. Otherwise, all matter is alive, and matter is but a living robe of the mysterious "something that infects the world."

In the curling of a piece of indiarubber under heat, in the agitation of the element selenium under a ray of light, in the pulsation of a growing plant, in the throb of a frog's heart, we trace the life-breath of that "something far more deeply interfused" whose dwelling is the shingle on the beach, the weed by the wall, as well as the mind of man. The tabulation of the motions of this breath in plants deepens rather than deposes this faith. For in the same manner that the height of a mountain is gauged by the angle registered in the surveyor's telescope, in the same way that the strength of a chemical solution is set down in so many figures in decimals, in exactly the same way Professor Bose enables us to measure the pleasure of the plant when its desire is fulfilled, and mark how low the pang sinks into the depths of pain when its natural joie de vivre is thwarted and denied.

How is it shown. With much mechanical ingenuity, Professor Bose has devised apparatus by which the activities of plants capable of being registered may practically make their own registration. One of the methods is to attach one end of a very delicate lever made of light aluminium wire or the stripped quill of a peacock's tail by a thread of cocoon silk, say, to a motile leaf. The fulcrum rod of this lever rests on frictionless supports, and carries a light mirror. Any movement in the lever deflects the mirror, and when a spot of light is thrown upon it, its image will move with the slightest movement of the leaf. When this point of light is allowed to run over a sensitised film surrounding a drum revolving at a known rate, the film, when developed, will exhibit a record of the pathway of that light. These movements can be magnified from a thousand to ten thousand times.

In the same way as the changes of temperature or barometric pressure during the day can be registered, the growth of a plant at various times of the day and night, with rise or fall of temperature, can be accurately registered and studied. Thus, a certain lily at 30° C. grew so many fractions of a millimetre per minute. By raising the temperature 5° higher the growth was quickened nearly thirty times; by lowering about 5° was lessened some twenty times.

The reaction these experiments will create upon theories concerning the various functions of plant life may be anticipated by the author's modification of existing views as to the ascent of sap and kindred topics. Like Political Economy, botany too, seems to be entering upon the perfect stage of its development, and rising to the rank of a branch of mathematics. How plants behave under a variety of stimuli, mechanical, thermal, electric, and chemical, will henceforth be exhibited in charts; and, may be, gardeners will speak of the comparative hardness of plants in figures representing the volts of electric energy required to register a certain record on the crescograph or the kunchograph, and the amount of drooping will be stated in the number of pulses per minute. It will remain a mark of stupidity to merely say one plant is more sensitive than another, for already the figures exist to show that the stalk of a mushroom upon application of an electrical stimulus gave a contraction of 2 per cent. of the original length, but the filamentous corona of the passion flower as much as 20 per cent. Every plant will be registered for its amplitude of response, its endurance of noxious gases, its phototactic and nyctotropic movements, or its heliotropic response, and the old parable, "Beware, scolopendriums run wild here!" will have to adapt itself to the new and higher knowledge, in terms of turgidity-variations and galvanometric negativity.

THE TESTIMONY OF ST. PAUL TO CHRIST.*

THE great figure of the Apostle Paul can never cease to engage our interest, any more than his spirit can fail to win our reverence and affection. Recent New Testament study has been much concerned with him, and the English reader may find in the pages of Bacon's "Story of St. Paul," or Weinell's "St. Paul, the Man and his Work," the freshest impressions of the critical schools of America or Germany. The work of Canon Knowing on "The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ" is conceived on different lines. The title page warns us that not even a stout volume of 500 pp. can exhaust the subject; it is only "viewed in some of its aspects." The book consists, in fact, of three series of Boyle lectures, delivered in the last three years, 1903 to 1905. The first deals with the documents; the second discusses St. Paul's testimony in relation to the Gospels; the third is concerned with the "Life of the Church." (The title is hardly happily chosen; it is not the inner life of the Church in relation to its heavenly Lord, or its organised expression in offices and sacraments, but the missionary work of the Apostle, which is portrayed.) The arrangement involves some needless repetitions, as in the double treatment of the resurrection; and, in spite of the defence of "popular illustrations" in the preface, allusions to events which happened last week, when no dates are given, strike us as somewhat out of place.

The book is distinguished, in the first place, by the wide range of the author's reading. Hardly anything seems to have escaped his notice. Over the advanced Dutch critics, represented by the lamented Dr. Van Manen, he wins an easy victory. Schmiedel is a severer antagonist with whom to grapple. Dr. Martineau and Dr. Drummond are not forgotten. Dr. Kalthoff is oddly designated "a certain pastor Kalthoff," pp. v., 497. Dr. Knowing's familiarity with the literature of very different schools, his uniform candour and courtesy, and his painstaking citations from writers opposed to himself, enable the reader who has not access to such a good library, to form some idea of the methods of the several critics; and the survey of recent works in the last lecture not only includes the treatises of Weinell and Clement, but even the pungent little book by Dr. Wrede in the admirable Schiele series of "Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher." In this respect it is rather surprising that in a discussion of Matt. xxviii. 19 (p. 342) there is no reference to Conybeare's well-known views. The reply of Dr. Chase, last July, may have come too late for our author's use, though a good deal of last year's literature is employed. It must, however be said that if Dr. Knowing finds that critics "airily repeat the same objection," (p. 326), the bystander may be constrained to remark that apologists no less airily repeat the same replies. When, for instance, it is pleaded that "no modern criticism has discredited" the accuracy of the birth-story in Luke, and it is added that "it would be strange, to say the least of it, if this account, so well known to St. Luke, was unknown to St. Paul," p. 263, the writer makes two big leaps, first, over the enormous difficulties involved in the story itself, and second, over the interval between Luke's companionship with the Apostle, and the composition of the Gospel fifteen or twenty years later.

The first division of the book is devoted to a defence of the authorship of the apostolic letters, including the Pastoral Epistles. On the literary side it is difficult to produce any fresh evidence. Most people know that recent students, like Jülicher and Bacon, have freely conceded the apostolic authorship of Ephesians (though Dr. Moffatt remains unconvinced), while Philipians and Colossians have been long admitted as genuine since the Tübingen attack. But the case against the Pastorals appears too strong to be overthrown by Dr. Knowing's advocacy; and it is a pity that the only alternative offered should be that of "refined forgeries" (p. 123). Different conceptions there must be of what is evidence and what is not. For instance, when the author reads in the first letter of Clement (about 96 A.D.) "let us come unto him in holiness of soul, lifting pure and undefiled hands unto him," he is irresistibly reminded of 1 Tim. ii. 8, "I desire, therefore, that the men pray in every place, lifting up their holy hands, without wrath and disputing." The coincidence is of the slightest; and it is curious that when Dr. Knowing quotes the Committee of the Oxford Society of Historical Theology as stating that the phrase is used by many writers, he does not also mention that they could not admit the parallel into their fourth and most attenuated degree of probability of contact. This tendency to over-emphasise is frequently observable. But it is justly remarked, p. 129, that "if the external evidence was stronger than it is, we are not, of course, justified on this ground alone in asserting the Pauline authorship." The attempt to fit them into the scheme of the Acts is frankly abandoned (just as it is remarked, p. 29, that not even Zahn had succeeded in making the historical circumstances of Galatians and Acts quite clear.) But the difficulties involved in the advanced ecclesiastical organisation, the differences in vocabulary (not by any means accounted for by new topics, but extending to particles and minute turns of expression), and the absence of any confirmation for the theory of the second Roman imprisonment, do not seem to us overcome by Dr. Knowing. He has measured himself against Dr. Moffatt, but the Scotch critic holds the field.

Most interest, perhaps, attaches to the second section of the book, in which the writer seeks to show that the Apostle was familiar with the traditions of the life and teaching of Jesus. The demonstration is spread out over 250 pp.; and again and again loses force by attempting to establish too much. How can the words, "Our passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ," 1 Cor. v. 7, prove that "St. Paul was closely acquainted with the incidents of the Passion?" It is nearly as irrelevant as Resch's recent argument that because the Apostle uses the word "write" he had read the story of Jesus' writing upon the ground. Dr. Knowing's own judgment varies curiously over details. Thus, on p. 289, we are told that "Rom. xiv. 4, with its positive statement," may well refer to Matt. xv. 11; but on p. 316 we read, "if we cannot find, with some able critics, a direct reference in these words to our Lord's own teaching," &c. Feine and Goguel base 1 Cor. v. 4 on Matt. xviii. 20, but Dr. Knowing remarks, "It is not wise to insist too strongly upon this alleged parallel." This is in a note on p. 290, but only two pages later, in the full glory of the text, the words are set out, and we read, "Here we have a close parallel, extending even to verbal identity." It would seem needful to remind the writer of his own caution that "it is not wise to suppose that because St. Paul introduces familiar imagery, e.g., that of building, or of the working of heaven, or of removing mountains, he is in any way dependent upon particular sayings of our Lord" (p. 291).

ultimate aim to justify. He is, indeed, confronted with the difficulty that there are only two passages of which he can affirm that the Apostle "may have" referred to Jesus as God (Rom. ix. 5, and Tit. ii. 13). That the Apostle conceived of Christ as in some sense pre-existent has been long recognised by almost all interpreters. But Dr. Knowling does not examine the nature of this pre-existence in his character as the heavenly man; nor does he discuss the identification of the risen and glorified Christ with the Spirit, which introduces such confusion into the Trinitarian scheme. He fixes on the term "Lord," and on the expected advent in the character of Judge, "a prerogative which, in the Old Testament, belongs to God, and to God only." Doubtless, the application to Christ of passages referring in the Greek version of the Old Testament to the Lord (Hebrew YHWH) shows how loosely the Apostle could interpret Scripture; but it does not impair the fact that this title was regarded as conferred upon Jesus on his elevation after his obedience unto death; it does not describe a pre-earthly dignity. In the language attributed to Peter, Acts ii. 36, Jesus is "made both Lord and Christ" by exaltation at the right hand of God. But in that lofty state he remains a man, and it is in that character, according to the speech on Mars Hill, which Dr. Knowling accepts as an accurate report of Paul's words, that he will judge the world. The argument that the phrase, "His own Son," Rom. viii. 32, signifies a participation "in the essential nature of the Father," appears somewhat strained; the Apostle is not arguing metaphysically. Even in the Fourth Gospel the interpretation of the Jews in v. 18 is implicitly repudiated by the subsequent declarations that the Son can do nothing of himself, and that his very life has been given to him. But in truth, we shall reach no common understanding in this matter until two things are clearly recognised—(1) that the Apostle's view of Christ is closely connected with cosmological and other ideas which most people have now entirely discarded; where are the lordships, thrones, principalities, and the rest of the heavenly powers good and evil? And (2) that it is no less closely connected with the expectation of a speedy return of Jesus to judge the world which has never taken place. Very pathetic is Dr. Knowling's readiness (p. 247) to accept in humble faith and trust the angel's message of hope and joy, "This same Jesus, which was taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." But the experience of history is against him. J. E. C.

THE ENGLISH REFORMATION.*

DR. PLUMMER's four lectures, backed by a full chronological table and provided with a good index, make an admirable little book. Its narrow limits necessarily impose certain conditions on the writer. "The omissions," he confesses in his introduction, "of even important events are very numerous; and many persons who played no small part in those stirring times are nowhere mentioned in these pages. It would be easy to challenge the wisdom of the selection which has been made between what is stated and what is passed over without mention; but it is hoped that the framework of the lectures is constructed of materials that are substantial, and that there is enough detail to give life and colour." The hope here expressed is justified by Dr. Plummer's performance. The book is delightfully readable, largely biographical, and always full of human interest; and we are always able to distinguish between the author's facts, which are sound, and his inferences, which we are, of course, free to contest. The first lecture covers the reign of Henry VIII. down to the fall of Wolsey. The second deals with the separation from Rome, the suppression of the greater monasteries, and the reformation of doctrine. The third gives an account of the "Protestant Failure" under Edward, and the "Roman failure" under Mary. And the fourth traces the evolution of a settlement under Elizabeth. In the course of his survey Dr. Plummer makes considerable use—as indeed everybody must, who touches his period—of the writings of Charles Beard. We have a series of portrait sketches, which may not always be good likenesses, but are always lifelike, of the four monarchs concerned, of Wolsey (to whom Dr. Plummer is very kind), Cromwell (whom he frankly detests), Somerset, Northumberland, Gardiner, Bonner, Cranmer, Cecil and Parker. Dr. Plummer's estimate of Somerset is much less favourable than the verdict of a writer whose knowledge of Edward's reign is unique—Professor Pollard. It looks as if the lecturer had sacrificed the first Protector to an antithesis—Northumberland was undoubtedly bad and shrewd, so Somerset must be drawn good and silly.

The "Church Defence" tendency, which a reader naturally expects in a book by a dignitary on such a theme, is not very prominent. It appears undisguised in the Introduction, and in an epilogue to the last lecture; but elsewhere it shows itself only occasionally in the turn of a phrase. In the second lecture, for instance, after an account of the prohibition of annates, we read:—"Annates eventually came back to the Church as Queen Anne's Bounty in 1703." This is an astonishing statement. Annates had never been paid to "the Church," unless the Church and the Holy See are identical. The Church of England, in Anne's time, after the Toleration Act and the growth of dissenting churches, cannot claim to represent the undivided English Church of 1532. And the identity of annates and Queen Anne's Bounty remains in any case a metaphysical puzzle. We are told in the third lecture that under Elizabeth "the religious position of the English nation took its final shape, that in which it remains in all essentials at the present time." Of the English nation! This superb ignoring of the process by which the Church of England has become but one sect amid many—distinguished indeed, by privilege, wealth, learning and tradition, but still one sect amid many—could only be achieved by a clergyman of the Establishment. An ill-instructed newspaper reader who chanced upon the sentence in an excerpt would suppose that in Queen Elizabeth's time the land was covered with Nonconformist chapels, whose frequenters outnumbered the Conformists, and that all religions from Romanism to Mormonism, enjoyed her equal protection and allowance. A personal preference of the lecturer's makes itself plaintively heard in the word which I italicise:—"She" (Elizabeth) "was by no means enamoured of the kind of Protestantism to which Somerset and Northumberland had reduced the Church of England."

An illustration may be given of Dr. Plummer's argument in the Introduction and epilogue. In the former, he writes:—"On one assumption, and perhaps on only one, can it be logically maintained that the Church of England, since the Reformation, is a different Church from the Church of England before the Reformation; namely, the assumption that it is essential to the existence of a church that it should accept the jurisdiction of the Church of Rome." The logic is at fault. The major here propounded, with the minor tacitly adopted, would prove the non-existence of the Church of England. The major premiss which is really needed is this, that a Papal Church and a non-Papal Church are not the same church. In the epilogue the statement that "the bulk of the English clergy remained in unbroken possession of their benefices all through the Reformation period" requires a narrower definition of the Reformation period than other parts of the argument assume. It is not true of the period which begins with Henry's supremacy and ends with the XXXIX Articles. And against what remains of it we must set the fact that every English see, and every Welsh see but one, underwent a change of presidency at Elizabeth's accession.

In spite of this slight indoctrination the book is a good one, well worth reading and keeping. In conclusion a specimen may be given of Dr. Plummer's vigour and felicity of phrase. "He wished not merely to do what seemed right in his own eyes; he wished to stand right in his own eyes." A searching verdict which applies to others besides Henry Tudor. E. W. L.

SHORT NOTICE.

The Book of Job, in the Revised Version: Edited by S. R. Driver, D.D. It would be difficult to praise this little book more highly than it deserves. The editor sets before himself an object which sounds modest enough, being nothing more than "to explain the Revised Version of the Book of Job in such a manner as to make the poem intelligible to an ordinary educated reader." He aims at no elaborate commentary, suited to the advanced Hebrew scholar, but only at so much of explanation as will help the reader to follow the writer's thought: Only one who was himself a scholar of the front rank could do this well. Canon Driver knows his subject so thoroughly that every page shows the hand of a master in the ease and precision of his treatment. Unlike some others who have undertaken to edit the Book of Job, he does not think it necessary to tear the text to pieces in the interest of a metrical theory, nor to relegate to an appendix of interpolations some hundreds of verses which do not conform to his idea of what the poet ought to have written. All his explanations are eminently sane and reasonable, and the very modesty of them strengthens the reader's confidence in his guide. Without some guidance the ordinary reader will not find the Book of Job easy to understand, or attractive to read. Yet he has heard that it contains one of the greatest poems ever written. He has neither time nor preparation to read through an exhaustive commentary; and even such a handbook as that in the Cambridge Bible for Schools gives him much more of notes than of the poem itself. What he wants is the poem, and not what has been said about it. He wants only so much of notes as will put him in possession of what the poet really said and, in difficult passages, what the poet meant by it. Canon Driver has met this want with the complete success which is only possible to thorough scholarship and fine literary tact, and it is no small praise to say that his edition of the Book of Job is just suited to those who like a pocket copy of a great writer to read for the pleasure of reading him. And why should not the Bible be read for the pleasure of reading it, especially by those who think that for the purposes of religion it is out of date? Canon Driver affords them, in this small volume, an opportunity of really getting to know at least one of the Books of the Bible, and deserves the hearty thanks of all for whom he has written. WESTWARD IN CANADA.—III

Glacier House, British Columbia,

June 7, 1906.

SIR,—The unhappy accident of a wet day gives me the opportunity of inflicting more correspondence upon you.

I wrote last from Banff, a place clearly destined to be one of the great pleasure resorts of the world, where, amid extremely fine scenery, you may combine with all possible luxuries of hotel life the process of being cured by sulphur waters, within and without.

It is in a sheltered valley of considerable size, surrounded on all sides by mountain ranges, which at this time of the year are covered with snow for a considerable distance down, until the glistening white is lost in the dark green foliage of the pine trees, here and there relieved by the more tender green of the bottom woods which clothe the slopes in every direction. From the lesser heights and through the snowy valleys you look up to the higher peaks of permanent snow. Pleasant paths lead through the woods, or alongside the swift flowing Bow river, paths which must in the main be kept to, as progress through the woods is very difficult owing to the extraordinary amount of fallen timber, in all stages of decay. Lovely little orchids (Cypripedium), gold, chocolate, and purple in colour, anemones and purple clematis are to be found, while hosts of "chipmunks" (a kind of small squirrel) enliven your walks, and will eat their suppers within a few feet of you. For Banff is in the great National Park, where nothing may be shot.

Here, too, are carefully preserved the last of the buffalo, a fine herd. You can drive right in among them, but it is not safe to walk. They, with some elk and deer, have a special reserve of some 800 acres.

Perhaps the greatest glory of Banff is Lake Minnewanka, some nine miles away, a great sheet of dark blue waters, shoaling into lovely light blues and greens, lying in the heart of snowy mountains of every kind of shape and outline. This is the home of trout of fabulous size, but none bigger than 5½ pounds fell victims to our attempts.

I have never seen mountains with such varied and fantastic and rugged outlines. It is, I understand, because of their comparatively modern date that they have not yet been weathered into smoother forms.

Banff tends rapidly to become a little town, but being in "the Park," which, by the way, includes some 5,732 square miles, the Government has a hold upon it, and is watchful to see that its beauties are not spoiled. Truly, a great institution is the National Park, bidding defiance alike to the jerry-builder, the advertiser, and the wanton destroyer of beautiful living things.

The journey through the mountains, over Kicking Horse Pass, down to the Columbia River, then 2,000 feet up to Rogers Pass and this place, has been so often described and is so indescribable, that I will not attempt it here. We made it on a perfect day, without a cloud in the sky, standing for the most part of the way on the small platform of the end of a Pullman car, and finding it very necessary to hold on round the corners, while the endless panorama unrolled itself behind us. It was the next best thing to seeing it from the cow-catcher.

Here we are, in the Selkirks, at an elevation of about 4,000 feet, a very wonderful place. No driving road within, I suppose, twenty miles at least. The railway line sweeps in on our right from the Pass, a few hundred feet above, and plunges down again through the forest on the left, forming a deep horse-shoe curve round the head of a valley which is filled with great trees—firs, balsams, hemlocks, and spruce—over whose tops you look away on to snowy peaks ranging from 9,000 to 11,000 feet in height. At the bend of the horse-shoe stand station and hotel, a group of chalet buildings, very picturesque, behind which, through a lovely wood carpeted richly with oak fern and other beautiful growths wherever the light can penetrate, a path leads in about a mile and a half to the foot of a fine glacier, the "Illicilliwaet." Sir Donald, one of the Selkirk giants, rears a rocky summit, with suggestions of the Matterhorn, on our side of the glacier, which terminates in an interesting ice fall. A few trails lead through the forest in various directions, but not many. Many lovely flowers are here also, especially the golden Selkirk Lily, which springs up as the snow recedes, and grows singly or in beds which remind one of "dancing daffodils." Birds are not plentiful, but I note that at Lake Minnewanka are humming birds, and here is one about the size of a thrush, red breasted, which they call a robin. Eagles are occasionally to be seen.

Large marmots, porcupines and squirrels are plentiful, and very amusing to watch. An angry porcupine, climbing a tree to get out of your way and bristling all he can with fear or annoyance, is a very comical sight. Bears also are to be seen. One crossed our trail the other day, in sight of our guide, but not of ourselves, alas! However, we dared not complain, for we had had a perfect day over the Asulkan glacier, to the snowy pass at its head, some 4,000 feet above this place, with glorious views into another group, the highest of the Selkirk mountains, across a valley almost savage in its black depths of 3,000 feet, lying steeply below us. Sun and snow between them sent us back after a nine hours' excursion in a quite unrepresentable state of redness, but with our hearts entirely given to the Selkirk mountains. Very few people are here yet, and few, we understand, ever stay long. They leave the train one day, wander to the foot of the glacier, and go off the next. Four days have not sufficed for us, though there has been much rain. "I guess there ain't any excursions here," said an American to me yesterday, taking his half-hour inspection, while the train stopped. "No sir, unless you make them on your legs." "Ah! I thought so," and he looked at my muddy boots and scorched complexion with an amused contempt. But it would not be fair to take him as typical.

Twice in the twenty-four hours a passenger train groans up or slithers down the track. Just now we are waiting for one that is already four hours late, which is trying, but then it will have come 2,400 miles. So we have to wait patiently under a verandah, rain outside, and Chinese hotel "boys" chattering about us.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JOHN BEVAN.

On Sunday, July 8, at Colwyn Bay, the Rev. John Bevan passed away in his 78th year. Born in Newtown, Montgomeryshire, he was educated for the Baptist ministry, but, emigrating to America in 1862, he was there ordained a Unitarian minister by the Rev. S. S. Hunting, of Detroit. He spent much of his time with the Rev. Robert Collyer, whose pulpit in Chicago he occupied from time to time. His first call was to the Unitarian church at Toronto, but, owing to family reasons, Mr. Bevan returned to England, where at first he undertook mission work in Clerkenwell, London. In 1867 he accepted a call to Middlesbrough, and two years later one to Pudsey, in Yorkshire, where he remained ten years. From 1878 to 1884 he was minister of the Commission-street congregation in Bolton (now Unity Church), but left it to return to his old charge at Middlesbrough. After a period of seven years' strenuous work there Mr. Bevan's health began to fail, and he retired, temporarily, as he then hoped, but he never regained robust enough health to resume regular work. His last wish, to die in his native land, was realised, and he now rests in the little churchyard of Llandrillo, in North Wales.

Mr. Bevan was of a quiet, retiring disposition, and was, in consequence, not widely known among the ministers of the present generation. At Pudsey and Middlesbrough he was always ready to help forward the intellectual, moral, and religious life of the people among whom he laboured. He was one of those thoughtful, high-principled men with whom it was always a joy to come into contact.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

X.—REGENERATION.

THE Kingdom of God is an outward constitution, but it is also a state of heart, an inward disposition. Except a man be "born again," he cannot even see it. If the Kingdom were only a community, he would be born into it, and once for all. To Nicodemus, to be born a Jew, a child of Abraham, was enough. But the Kingdom of God is a spiritual condition—love, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit of God—and must be entered in a spiritual way.

Every advance from a lower level of life to a higher is, in a sense, a new birth. The natural man is what he is by natural birth. Civilised, he accepts certain outward restraints; moral, he acts under an inward law; spiritual, he comes into conscious relation to divine being. In each stage he has been born again.

But it is further said, Except a man be born "of water," he cannot enter the Kingdom of God. If this second statement is a necessary part of the doctrine of regeneration, then the Kingdom of God is entered by a sacrament; man is thereby conveyed into a new order, comes under the action of a new power, is not figuratively, but actually, a new man. The doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration, object to it as we may, has Scripture and ancient tradition on its side.

A counter-theory of entrance into the Kingdom is that of sensible Conversion. By the direct action of the Spirit of God, the heart is suddenly changed. Sensible conversion, as a phenomenon, has been made the subject of scientific inquiry, and is allowed to be an undeniable fact of religious experience. The converted man is suddenly conscious of change, has a sense of fresh control, is himself transformed, is born again.

There may, no doubt, be special modes by which the Spirit finds entrance into human life; but instantaneous conversion can hardly be the one condition of spiritual regeneration; nevertheless, the passage under divine grace from the love of the temporal to the love of the eternal order of things can only be described as re-entrance upon life, a new birth. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

DEAR CHILDREN,—When I had been to Norway, four summers ago, I think I wrote something about it for you. Now I have been again, and I must share my pleasure with you; though the children of four years ago must be now comparatively grown up!

I hope you have a map that will show you at least a few places, so get it out and look at it.

We sailed from Newcastle—a little party of four. The voyage was very calm, and all went well for a night and a day, till we were nearing the Norwegian coast, and making for Stavanger, when a fog set in which hid everything and obliged us to go very slowly or to stop altogether; and this lasted for ten hours. Then the fog suddenly all fled away, and we steered safely among the rocky islands over a sunny sea into Stavanger, lying in bright sunshine beside the fjord, from the shore of which it climbed up the hill, its red roofs and little coloured houses standing out brightly from the high blue mountains beyond.

Here we landed, and stayed till the next morning, when a little steamer took us on northwards, winding in and out among the islands till we came into a narrow fjord, and landed at a little village called Sand. From there our journey was partly driving in little open carriages (called stolkjaeres), with dear little fawn-coloured ponies, or by steamer on a lake. At last we reached a point at which the road turned up the mountains to a very high pass which we intended to cross, and to come down at the other side to the head of the great Hardanger fjord at Odde. But at the Breifond Hotel, at the foot of the pass, we were told that it was impossible for us to go that way except on sledges, as all the upper part of the mountains was deep in snow! So two stout little ponies, with stolkjaeres, were sent forward with our luggage, and as the road, which went up and up in long zig-zags, was much too steep for ponies to drag us up, we walked, scrambling and climbing across short cuts, over the mountain side, to meet the zig-zags and shorten the way. It was a very hard climb for something like five miles, but we had splendid views as we looked back, and a splendid sight of the snow above us, shining and glistening against the clear blue sky.

At last we reached the edge of the snow, where the road vanished into the white waste before us. And there were the two sturdy little ponies, with their drivers. One pony was harnessed to a little sledge, and on the second sledge was the little stolkjaere, with its wheels taken off and lying beside it, and the second pony harnessed in front. Two of us sat on the first sledge, and the other two in the stolkjaere, which was on the sledge. Then came a funny journey. The valiant little ponies dragged us over vast fields of snow—up hill and down hill; sometimes there was a deep hollow, down into which we bumped; and then up again at the other side struggled the little horse and got us up. Sometimes we were all on one side, and felt as if we, the stolkjaere, wheels, luggage and all, would topple over, but the sledge slipped on, and righted itself again safely. Sometimes the little pony plunged in the snow up to its body, and stopped a minute and looked round to ask his master what to do next; then came an encouraging cry from the driver, a struggle, a plunge, the pony's legs appeared again, and we were slipping swiftly along on the snow. One of the ponies had a pair of boots on his hind feet, made of plaited straw, with flat round straw soles; these helped him very much to keep both from slipping and from sinking in the snow. The sun shone dazzlingly on the snow, and the shadows lay beautifully blue in the hollows and under the rocks. You can't think how funny it was to look back and see our companions who usually walk in London streets, with rosy-brown faces sitting on a sledge behind a little pony amongst the snowy mountains tops. If only the Editor could let me put in a little picture you would like it.

The road was so completely buried in snow, and it was so unevenly piled—here in great drifts on one side, and hollows with frozen pools on the other, and there entirely invisible, that we could not go along it at all, but went over the snow just wherever it seemed best for going.

At last we began to go down on the other side, and saw before us a whole land of snowy mountain peaks and glaciers and smooth fields of snow, and far, far below, a lake all frozen over and half covered with snow, and the road winding down again to the valley in another steep zig-zag. Presently we reached the edge of the snow, where the road was sufficiently free for us to be able to walk. The sledge and one pony went back, and the other was left by the roadside, the wheels put on to the stolkjaere, and away trotted the brave little pony that had dragged us across (without his boots now) carrying our baggage in the stolkjaere to our next stopping-place, whilst we walked. In some places the snow still lay across the road, and had been cut through, leaving white snow walls on each side; but by degrees we got below the snow, and only looked back at it, high above, against the blue sky, with awe and wonder at our strange experience.

We had many a memorable day after that; but that ride can never lose its excitement and delight, nor fade from our memory.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

We publish this week a review by the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis of Professor J. C. Bose's book on "Plant Response." It opens out fascinating fields of speculation, but we confess that it seems to us that great caution is required in arguing from such appearances as "shuddering and shrinking" in a plant, and even "fatigue" in a metal, to even the dimmest form of consciousness in either. We cannot say that we are convinced that the poet's intuition that every flower "enjoys the air it breathes" is scientifically established. Joy undoubtedly is there, joy of the Creative Power in all that loveliness, and in all those who delight in it; but can we really say that the flower itself is conscious of joy?

THE CENTRE OF FAITH.

THERE are two articles side by side in the new number of the Hibbert Journal, which admirably serve its purpose of promoting the free movements of thought on fundamental questions of religion, the one supplementary or correcting the other, or at any rate contributing to a fuller survey of the field than would have been possible at the hands of one alone. Dr. FORSYTH writes on "The Reality of Grace," as "A Rallying-ground for the Free Churches," and immediately afterwards comes an article by Dr. ANDERSON, minister of Ward (Congregational) Chapel, Dundee, entitled, "Why not Face the Facts? An Appeal to Protestants."

Dr. FORSYTH's article appears to have had its origin in an address to ministers, or a college address to students and ministers together, at the opening or close of a session. It takes up once more the plea which he has made so often of late, and with a rhetoric of which we confess to being somewhat tired, for a recognition of the Gospel as concentrated in the atoning death of CHRIST, the act of a redeeming God. "His consciousness was part of the self-consciousness of Godhead. His action was God's act." "I say Christ came with God, but I mean that God came in Him, came for a world career, and came to abide at the throne of things." "The real power that is demanded by our actual moral condition, our sinful condition, the only God relevant to it, is the holy historic God in His act of judgment-grace—the God in the Christ we inherit, given us and not discovered, given by Himself and not procured even by a Son, given to meet our moral perdition, and given in the flood of life and action's storm, in the Cross which entered a nation's politics, challenged its government, sealed its dream broke at once its delusion and its history, and in so doing secured mankind's destiny."

"The Redeemer is the Mediator (and the only Mediator) to us of the living, judging God, who works and weaves in all history, and saves it to eternal life through a world-tissue of moral crises centring in the Cross: Christ, in His historic and public work of judgment-grace, is the one ground of soul certainty to us."

On the other hand, read what Dr. ANDERSON says on p. 859, between the two sentences, "How much broader is the New Testament presentation of the matter," and "How foolish, in view of all this, to formulate one exclusive plan of salvation." Dr. FORSYTH's new dogmatism is very definite, and appears, after all, to be based on the old theory of the corruption of human nature. Dr. ANDERSON is not, of course, replying here to this particular article, and yet he does furnish a very salutary corrective to much of its teaching. "JESUS, as recent criticism of the New Testament is enabling us to see Him," says Dr. ANDERSON, "does not belong to the orthodox churches." "Jesus belongs rather to those who speak of the worth and dignity of human nature, of an indwelling Divine power in the soul, of the unlimited possibilities of the individual and the race, of the natural Divine sonship of every man, woman, and child, of the essential soundness of human nature; of faith in the soul; of salvation as mental and moral health through education, culture, enlightenment, training; of God Himself as the indwelling Life and Love, and of the Divine love hinted in the human. 'Jesus alone in all history saw the true greatness of man,' says Emerson. He alone dared utter that mightiest word of encouragement, 'Be perfect, like your Father.' No wonder that the orthodox theologian, in order to get his Gospel that disparages man and exaggerates sin, has to belittle the gospels which give us these sublime hints of Jesus, preferring the Christ of the Epistles to the Teacher of Galilee. It is the voice of Jesus which strongly moves us to require great things of ourselves because great things are expected of us. Here is the ever-vital message of Jesus to the men of His time and to the men of all times."

The trouble with much of the religious teaching of the present day, in Dr. ANDERSON's view, is that its theology has not yet been harmonised with the order of the universe as it presents itself to modern knowledge. "It is true that Copernicus has completely triumphed, but the consequences which follow logically from his new universe are not yet accepted. The result is bewilderment; paralysis of faith, and doubt about the future. The whole framework has vanished in which has been represented the great drama of Redemption as conceived by the mediæval and Reformation churches—from the Garden of Eden to the Second Advent of Christ. But when this is frankly and thoroughly accepted, it is seen that the larger universe is destructive only of narrow conceptions, which the world can do better without. A new age of faith will come when the religious instincts of devout souls turn with joy to the new knowledge. Then faith will be not dissonant with things, as many feel it to be now, but harmonious, because it will take form from the larger universe in which it dwells, and be in sympathy with the logical basis and methods of the living mind of to-day, making religion a vital and intelligible reality to that mind."

But where, then, shall be found the centre of faith in this new universe, to which a man must ever return, as to the source of abiding strength and energy, enlightenment and inspiration? It is within his own moral experience, where he is constantly with God, and God with him. There a man must learn to be alone with God, to hear and to answer to the divine calling of his life. There also must come to him the great appeal of CHRIST.

Dr. FORSYTH, indeed, while acknowledging "the primacy and finality of the moral," as the necessary basis of Christianity, since "neither Christian faith nor theology can do anything with a man who deliberately denies moral obligations and a moral universe," will not acknowledge such divine guidance to be sufficient for "soul-certainty." This, according to his doctrine, is not to be had except in CHRIST, the only Mediator, "in His historic and public work of judgment-grace," so that the centre of faith must be the atoning act of the Cross, where "God appears in history as Holy Saviour of our moral wreckage unto Eternal Life." But we cannot so understand "the reality of grace," nor does such a doctrine harmonise with the facts of human experience in the growing life of man, not in the one line of Christian development alone, but throughout the world. We cannot believe that there was no "soul-certainty" in such piety as is represented by the most spiritual of the Psalms, nor that the noblest of Indian Theists, for example, or devout adherents of other faiths not Christian, are cut off from all deep assurance of the Divine presence in their life. Dr. FORSYTH says most truly that it is in action that we touch reality at last, and in the stress of our moral life we find the deepest truth. But we have to recognise that ours is a progressive life, and that it is God who is leading us all the time. The surest conviction of a Divine meaning in life, and of a strength not our own, is to be found by the way of obedience. Such a declaration may not satisfy the dogmatic theologian, but we are convinced that it is God's way, and therein we find JESUS also to be with us. It was his teaching, it was the secret of his own life.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL FROM THE SCHOLAR'S STANDPOINT.*

By the REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

FROM the scholar's standpoint. Not, you see, from the teacher's standpoint, or the minister's, or the school's, or the congregation's, but simply from the scholar's.

Now, the thought may cross your minds, as it has several times crossed mine, since this subject was assigned to me, that it might have been a good thing to have got the Sunday-school scholar himself (or herself) to stand up here and give this lecture—or rather his own lecture on the topic before us. That would have been a relief and a delight to me. But, if you come to think of it, that course was not very possible. To set forth either what the Sunday-school is, or should be, even from the scholar's point of view, requires a certain amount, not only of actual experience and observation, but of reflection and self-analysis, together with an art of expression which we do not commonly find—and, considering their ages and education, could scarcely expect to find among the scholars of our Sunday-schools. Some few years ago an experiment was made, in our Northern schools, of trying to find out, from the scholars themselves, older and younger, why they came to Sunday-school. Printed forms, containing a short series of simple but suitable queries were given to hundreds, possibly thousands, of scholars, which they were asked to take time over, and fill up at home, together with a kindly invitation to these same scholars to set down on the papers (quite privately) anything they wished to say about the Sunday-school, as to how it affected them, and as to what they thought might affect it, for good or ill. That experiment was scarcely a success! Perhaps, in the nature of things, we could hardly expect it to be so—although it may have been well worth while to have made the experiment. If, from lack of the power of observation, self-analysis, and verbal expression, on his or her part, we did not get much real knowledge of what the Sunday-school is from the scholar's standpoint, at least, we discovered two things, namely, that, for some reason or other, he did really love the Sunday-school, and yet that he could not, for the life of him, tell you how, or even why!

Well, that is quite in keeping with all "love affairs." Has any human being "in love" ever been able to tell the how and why of it all, even to his own satisfaction? No; not even when he rises, or rather "drops" into poetry, can he do it! Neither can the Sunday-school scholar give us, in words, what, perhaps, he feels about his Sunday-school, any more than the best and happiest child can tell us what a home is from his standpoint.

This, then, I suppose, is why it falls to me to represent, if I can, the Sunday-school from the scholar's standpoint. True, I once was myself a Sunday-school scholar, and a little "living back" into my boyhood and youth may help me to interpret the mind of the boy and youth, or the relation of the school to the mind of the boy and youth of to-day, as he himself cannot, and as I myself could not at his age. And, although in the sense in which Dr. Crothers will speak to us to-morrow, I trust I am still "a learner" in the Sunday-school, yet my feeling is that the many years of my connection, as teacher and worker with the Sunday-school, since I was a scholar, have shown me most of anything I may say to-day as to what the Sunday-school is to the scholar.

Last Sunday, as we stood up in our school to sing the hymn, I could not but ask myself once again: What brings this multitude of children here—those many infants, these numerous boys and girls, yonder goodly number of young men and young women? There are said to be some seven millions of such scholars in the Sunday-schools of England—a larger number than in the day-schools. Of course, scholars continue longer in the Sunday-schools than in the day-schools. But why? Why do they come to Sunday-schools at all? The attendance at day-schools is compulsory. The attendance officer, armed with all the terrors of the law, to say nothing of the financial interest of the teachers, is a sufficient reason for the fairly large percentage of attendances at day-schools. But there is no force or influence whatever, of this sort, to account for the attendance at Sunday-school. True, the percentage of attendance in day-schools is far better than the percentage in Sunday-schools—the one probably being 80 or 85 in every 100 on the day-school books, the other probably being 65 or 70 in every 100 on the Sunday-school books. But the attendance at day-school, as we have seen, is easily accounted for. The wonderful thing to me is the attendance of so many children and young people at Sunday-school. Say that, on any Sunday, you have only some two-thirds of the scholars on the books actually in your Sunday-school—let us say, for instance, that, out of the seven millions on the books, only four and a half millions of children and young people were in the Sunday-schools of England on Sunday last—still, the question is: What brings them? For the most part they are practically free to come or not? Why do they come? Why do they come at all?

Well, if we begin with the little ones, I believe they largely come from imitation. That is one of the beautiful uses of the imitative faculty in children. Their brothers and sisters come to Sunday-school, and so the little ones want to come. The fact is that almost every Sunday-school is more indebted to its scholars for bringing new scholars than perhaps it ever realises. Anyway, the little ones largely come because of the coming of their older brothers and sisters, under the influence of their parents.

To be sure, in a very few years, these same little ones, now grown to be the boys and girls, may require some amount of parental compulsion to keep them coming regularly to Sunday-school. There could easily be next Sunday a considerable rise in the percentage of attendances at Sunday-schools if parents only did their simple duty in this respect. Many parents have always done so by all their children, and the results are seen in their sons and daughters to-day being some of the best fruits which our Sunday-schools have produced. I have known working men, for the sake of their children, and in order that none of their boys and girls might miss the Sunday-school or ever be late, take upon themselves, by way of helping the mother, many household duties on Saturday evening and Sunday morning. They made it possible for their children to get to Sunday-school, even if they themselves could not get to morning chapel; and, in my heart of hearts, I have felt that they were thereby doing divine service. Their children had to go to Sunday-school without fail; and thousands of people to-day devoutly bless their parents for the careful compulsion thus put upon them. From the scholar's standpoint the Sunday-school would never have been to them what it became to them, had it not been for their parents' insistence.

But imitation and compulsion act only for awhile. Two other influences naturally come into play. These are habit and attraction. There is a Sunday-school habit—just the good habit of attendance which, with some scholars, becomes almost second nature. They would be uneasy if they did not attend. And, besides this, there grows up in the scholar's mind a sense of attraction to the Sunday-school. He belongs to it, and it belongs to him, as much as his Sunday clothes—nay, more, almost as much as his home! Now, I had reached this point in the preparation of my lecture when I happened to speak to a lady who herself, I knew, had, long ago, been a Sunday-school scholar. It was a country school, and many scholars had such distances to walk to it that, starting off in the early morning, they carried their lunches with them, in order to be able to stay at school all day. Said I to this lady: "What was that Sunday-school from your standpoint?" And instantly she replied: "The place of my greatest happiness as a girl." She seemed to feel that, more than any other word, the word "happiness" summed up what that Sunday-school was to her; for in it, and connected with it, as a girl, she experienced happiness in greater measure and with deeper intensity than in any other way or place. As she said: "It was not so much the actual instruction we received, though that was important, but it was more what the Sunday-school somehow did to draw out and enlarge our better natures, in ways that were joyous as well as in ways that were serious. Why," she added, "even to think of the Sunday-school during the week, gave me thrills of pleasure; to look forward to next Sunday's meeting, and especially to one of the rare week-night gatherings, was a real delight; and, indeed, she added, there were some few special occasions, in the school, when one literally lived in what I can only call a dream of bliss!"

So said my lady friend, and I am certain that every word corresponded with her actual experience as a girl, because I can personally confirm it from my own experience as a boy; and, though they live in very different times, I believe that there are thousands of boys and girls to-day who still find their Sunday-school the centre and source of their largest and deepest measure of genuine happiness. Nor is that the end of it. As Sydney Smith said long ago: "Mankind are always happier for having been happy; so that, if you make them happy now, you make them happy twenty years hence, by the memory of it." And you may remember how R. L. Stevenson puts it: "A happy man or woman is a better thing to find than a £5 note. . . We need not care whether they can prove the 47th proposition (of Euclid), they do a better thing than that—they practically demonstrate the great Theorem of the Liveableness of Life." Yes, the Sunday-school, from the scholar's standpoint, more than any other public institution I know, has proved, in making millions intelligently happy, the liveableness of life. A while ago it was my privilege for some weeks to visit a dear old man who was quietly and peacefully dying of old age. He had had little, if any, advantage of day-school in his boyhood, and his life had been a fairly hard one. Yet I learned that there had always been about him the grace of gratitude and a touch of joy. And here, on his death-bed, he was contentedly happy. And what was the secret? It was the Sunday-school, he said, nearly seventy years ago when he was a boy. And he told me, in his homely, unaffected way, how the influence of the Sunday-school had gone with him all through life—through shower and shine, thorn and flower. One could have smiled, if it had not been so beautifully pathetic, as he requested, each day, that I would hear him "say his hymn"—as he used to say it (and sing it) in Sunday-school seventy years before. Three of the verses were:

"Lord, how delightful 'tis to see
A whole assembly worship Thee!
At once they sing, at once they pray,
They hear of heaven and learn the way.

I have been there, and still would go,
'Tis like a little heaven below;
Not all my pleasures nor my play,
Shall tempt me to forget this day.

O write upon my memory, Lord,
The texts and doctrines of Thy Word;
That I may break Thy laws no more,
But love Thee better than before.

Yes, and by and by the old man died serenely, saying his hymn—"They hear of heaven and learn the way." Think, then, of the value of the Sunday-school from his standpoint?

One other illustration on a larger scale. I am old enough to remember, though at the time I was not old enough to realise, the sufferings of Lancashire during the "Cotton Famine" in the early sixties. The civil war between the Northern and Southern States of America stopped the supplies of raw cotton from coming to Lancashire, and the mills of Lancashire had to be closed. Many hundreds of thousands of cotton operatives and their families were thrown out of work for years, while the war went on; and, though they were much tempted to side with the South which grew the cotton, but held the slaves, they were staunch to the North, because they believed that it meant to set the slaves free. But that is not my point. It is this: the distress was terrible and widespread and long-continued. It really, I suppose, affected millions of men, women, and children. And amidst it all, and through it all, the indomitable pluck, the determined courage, the grand endurance, the gentle patience, yea, and the quiet spiritual resource of those suffering cotton operatives called forth the admiration not only of England, but of Europe, and even a wider world. And see! Where was it that this simply splendid moral fibre of these cotton operatives had been spun and woven? Why, it was in the Sunday-schools of Lancashire. Contemporary history records that these heroic cotton operatives were Sunday-school products. In fact, large numbers of them, in those hard days, went back to the Sunday-schools, though they were married men and women, evidently feeling that the Sunday-school had been the source of their moral power. Can you wonder that, to a rousing tune, Lancashire, with its ringing voice, should in those and later days, often sing:

"Sabbath-schools are England's glory, Let them spread o'er every land."
(To be concluded.)

LIKE GRASS OF THE EARTH.

A SUNDAY MORNING ADDRESS.

BY THE REV. H. M. LIVENS.

"There shall be abundance of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: And they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth."—Ps. l. xxii. 16.

THIS is a fragrant, grassy Psalm. Grass is here taken as the emblem of prosperity—"They of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth," which springs up with a leap, full of sap after the rain—a host, a vast host of countless spears and plumes. And the king of all the grasses—wheat—is the emblem of bountifulness. "There shall be abundance of corn in the earth, even upon the top of the mountains."

This Psalm is an ode of praise to a King on his accession to the throne, or to Messiah, the hope of Israel.

All its sentences express the various hopes of the poet for the good things that shall distinguish his reign and the noble qualities of his character. May he be powerful and splendid, but may he also be just and pitiful. "Kings shall fall down before him," yet "he shall deliver the poor that hath no helper." "Justice and compassion are the two most kingly virtues for all time." "He shall have dominion from sea to sea," may he also be so thoughtful in charity, so delicate in chivalry that his ways and words shall fall upon the lives of men like the brief showers in haytime which fall upon the mown grass but hurt it not—only make the fields all fragrant and grateful. So it is from end to end a sweet grassy Psalm—made in the summer—fit for the summer. There is just one thought in it that I want to speak about this morning—"The fruit thereof shall shake"—no, I do not think that is the right word—"shall sway and rustle like the cedars of Lebanon." Trees do not shake; grass does not shake; they both sway in the wind, and as they sway they rustle together, stem to stem and leaf against leaf. "Look!" said a friend to me the other day, as he grasped my arm and turned my attention to a hillside, gazing himself as though some strange living creature were there at large. "Living creature" one well might say. All the slope seemed alive. It rose and fell, it slid along in serpentine curves. Not a square foot, not a corner but was moving, curling and bounding, flowing like water, heaving and sinking and advancing with graceful haste like waves of the sea, and like the sea whose waters still keep their appointed bounds. It was the wind flowing over the grass, flowing over the corn, and as it did so, every stalk swayed, every head and plume bent, and forthwith raised itself erect again.

Some 2,500 years ago—about the time when this Psalm was written—a wise man of another land and one of the wisest the world has ever had to correct its follies, was fond of watching the grass, the corn, the reeds swayed by the wind. He noticed how they bent down to the earth or down till their tips touched the water in which they grew, but reared themselves again, frail as they were, unbruised, unbent, while, at the same time, great trees had their branches torn from them, or were dragged up by the roots. And so he wrote his fable of the oak and the reed. And when the strong oak tree, blown over by the storm and floating down the stream, wondered why the thin green rushes were still growing uninjured by the water's edge, one of these made answer and said, "You were blown down by fighting against the storm, while we were saved by yielding and bending to the least breath that blows."

My least of hearers this morning could tell me what sage Æsop meant by his fable of the oak-tree torn up by the wind, and the reed that only went on pleasantly rustling. He meant to remind us, did he not, that it is often wiser even for people with strong limbs and clever brains not to oppose, not to fight against what they do not like; above all, not to get into a blustering passion, but to yield, to let it happen, to give up what they want, and to lose what by right belongs to them. To do it all as though they did not mind, however much they do mind. To give way, and then be as though nothing had happened at all. That Æsop was right we know. It often is best, most right as well as most wise, to give way instead of stoutly resisting, to obey instead of rebelling. This is wisdom, not cowardice.

It is not cowardly counsel, because it is more often harder to be compliant than it is to resist; harder to keep one's temper and to make that temper go under, than it is to show fight and stand up for ourselves and to speak our minds.

I was on the platform at a station one day. A new month had commenced, and with it had brought some alterations in the trains. As I waited I noticed a passenger come up the steps, bag and parcel in hand, to catch the train, but it had just gone. Its time had been altered. It started a minute or two earlier than last month. The disappointed traveller did not let his mind yield and bend like the grass under what had happened, and then right itself and be none the worse. He stood and stormed at the vanishing train. He abused ears that were not listening and facts which he could not alter, so that in half a minute, as one could see, he, like the oak that opposed the tempest, was himself overturned, or, as we say, using exactly the right word—he was completely upset. When we are upset we are no more use to ourselves or to other people than if we were an upset tree, a log floating down the stream.

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

A hard task for some of us, is it not?

I almost wonder whether it must not be a difficult thing for the grass itself to manage its beautiful bending without injury, when the wind suddenly sweeps down upon it—the more so, seeing that it is dressed in its own buckram of custom, the finest coat of glass, which makes its stem shining and hard.

But to carry on our consideration of the matter a step further. There are two moods, two methods for meeting the perils, the trials and enigmas of life: the one is the mood and the method of defiance; the other is the mood and method of sufferance. Both are good in their respective times and places. What is the occasion that calls for defiance, and what that which is best endured by submission or sufferance, can hardly be laid down in any general terms. The tragedy of Hamlet turned, you remember, on his perplexity and indecision:

"Whether 'tis nobler in the mind, to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune;
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
And, by opposing, end them."

And the reason why Hamlet's career led up to disaster both to himself and others was because while he knew that the opportunity for retribution was placed in his hands if he would only act with swift decision, his passive, idealising nature inclined to leave vengeance to God, and for itself be perfected through suffering. Between these two paths he halted—now purposing to act, now rejecting the responsibility of action—until

"The native hue of resolution

Was sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought."

Either course had been manly if fearlessly adhered to; and the more passive course might have led to heroic endurance, nobler than the courage displayed in painful action. So, while we may agree with the sturdy sense of the saying that the best way to avoid danger is "to meet it plump," not less true is it that the finest influences are sometimes to be won from peril by letting it come in its own way, and by accommodating one's mind to its passage. Hardship is not always deserved, suffering is not always just; yet from the hardest lot, and the unjustest chastisement, mellow fruits may be gathered by the spirit which is not agitated by them. Indeed, as Peter says, if in the providence of God we are to suffer at all, "it were better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing"—better, that is, so far as merit goes, to suffer unjustly than to suffer justly. For he who is justly afflicted has had the misfortune to be a captive to the sin which brought about the affliction, from which sin this bitter medicine may deliver him. But he who is afflicted without culpability, has only his trouble and not his sin to bear—and may, if he endures it manfully, be all the stronger for his ordeal in the end.

The whole matter may be regarded as a question of essentials and non-essentials. What, on the one hand, can a man put up with or do without; what, on the other hand, must he imperatively have and hold? How much can he allow to sweep over him unheeded—a mere wind that sways him—grass-like for the moment? How much must he grasp ere it passes, and hold as his dear life? One man feels that he must have this or that object. He sets his mind and life in train to acquire it. It becomes his all-engrossing passion—yet, sooner or later, we needs must relinquish all things—things we need about us for the time—food and clothes, houses and furniture, books and pictures. But these, as estimated by the highest gauge of life, are not individually essential. It is only needful for us that these things come and go with sufficient nearness to us to supply our daily tax upon them. But they are not the life which is more than meat and raiment.

Over and against these things stands that something of which the Apostle Paul spoke when he said, "Lay hold of eternal life." This is no indifferent concern. This is essential. The practical meaning of it is—our getting into our minds as much of the truth of God as we can understand, and into our hearts and lives as much of His grace or goodness as we can realise.

Possessing these things we can let some of the other things slide—if it be their tendency to slide. At any rate, we can do without fixing our minds upon them, and depending altogether on them. Moreover, the Kingdom of Heaven is not only the art of doing without, but the art of being happy without many things.

There is another matter which we do well to allow to glide innocuously over us—I mean the vexations we are so liable to feel at the foolishness and the meanness and malice of men. We are prone to feel these things too acutely—to shut the vermin thoughts in our hearts—to watch their loathsome ways—until we imagine that we cannot get rid of them, and, indeed, if we are not careful, these bitter recollections—these brooding aversions may become parasites which it is almost impossible to shake off.

But why should we harbour them? "Fret not thyself because of evil-doers," says the Psalmist. The world has plenty of such, and they do manage their course with insolent skill and success, but why should we fret ourselves over the ugliness of base and jealous natures? They are ugly—they are base. And the reeking mire is ugly, yet the sunbeams that play upon it are not. Every man has a mind of his own. Let him abide in his own proper mind. Let him be gracious still, though all the world be ungracious—let the chords of his spirit be melodious, though every spirit round him be discordant. Cannot sweetness of nature and graciousness of temper be independent of other natures and other tempers? Oh yes, let the wind blow; it shall not break the grass, it shall not bruise it. Every depression is but a momentary undulation. That moment over, it is stalwart, and proud, and free as ever.

The soul of a man is as the grass. We raise strong appeals for the freedom of the will—for the liberty of the conscience. Is it not as important for us to raise the plea for the independence of the heart? This was one of the great pleas of Jesus; and he showed how gracious and beautiful may be the heart's life in itself, despite all ungraciousness and evil around it. And he who to-day meets indifference with pleasantry, aloofness with a cheerful spirit, rancour with sweetness and suspicion with trust, is proving the independence of the heart. He embodies the grace of the grass and displays its supple patience.

WORDSWORTH—YET ONCE MORE!

THERE is always something more to be said concerning Wordsworth, because there is always something fresh to be discovered in reading him. He beheld the glory of the world with such clearness and childlike wonder; he looked with such boldness and reverence into the depths of the human mind, that the full significance of his life and his message is never exhausted for those who have once felt his power.

I have been reading again, on these great days of June, the "Prelude" and the "Excursion," and musing on the personality of the man confessing and revealing himself, and yet, withal, more than half eluding us, there. I think I have read no other long poems so many times as these; yet now, in this latest English summer, reading them once more, I have found so much in them which I had not hitherto recognised or responded to, that it is almost as if I read them now for the first time. Hence I am daring to write some words about him, hoping thus to meet the wish of a solicitous friend, and perchance also to suggest to some "gentle reader" that it would be well for him to turn again to these great unworldly poems and try them under the great unworldly skies and in the summer air, when leisure comes to eye and heart. And yet I dare thus, not as one who thinks to say some new thing about Wordsworth. For to rediscover him, or to see there, in his life and its ministry of song, what hitherto has, in part, escaped one, may not be to have something fresh to say. An impulse is not always an inspiration. But the familiar form of the great Recluse, and the voice of the Poet, heard so often sounding along the grave sonorous lines—these have made their appeal once more, and the heart has been stirred, and thoughts come which it would be a joy to put into words, if words would serve.

"William will be great for good or ill," his mother had said of him; yet he was only eight years old when she died. His was a bold and passionate nature. The balanced calm of later years came of self-mastery—the control of strong impulsive desires by a disciplined will. The man who wrote the poem of the nightingale and the dove, to tell his preference for the gentler song, had lived through a great experience before he wrote it:

"O Nightingale! thou surely art

A Creature of a fiery heart;

These notes of thine—they pierce and pierce:

Tumultuous harmony and fierce.

I heard a stock-dove sing or say
His homely tale, this very day ;

He sang of love, with quiet blending,
Slow to begin and never ending ;
Of serious faith and inward glee ;
That was the Song—the Song for me."

Wordsworth had known the "fiery heart," the "tumultuous harmony"—and the discord too. The wild enthusiasm with which he entered into the boyish sports of school days ; the mingled delight and terror of his early feeling for Nature ; his enthusiasm for the revolutionary struggle in France ; his anguish and despair because of the failure of that struggle ; these things reveal a nature of extraordinary emotional power. The mother's prophecy of greatness for good or evil, latent in the eight-year-old boy, came, doubtless, through her discernment of this ardent, passionate spirit in him.

And Wordsworth was a man of extraordinary courage, too. The career of this lover of the stock-dove's voice and of "flowers that prosper in the shade" has something of heroic daring about it. As a boy he knew what it was to be afraid. Nature, he said, disciplined him by beauty and by fear. The huge dark form of Wetherlam, looming up behind the "craggy steep," as he rowed on Esthwaite Lake in the moonlight, filled him with terror ; and for days afterwards his brain "worked with a dim and undetermined sense of unknown modes of being." But his was not the coward's fear ; and the boy still took his lonely walks, by night as well as day. The mystery awed and subdued him, and conscience sometimes made him tremble. But his was a daring and self-reliant spirit ; and in this the "Child was father of the Man." It was lack of means, not lack of courage, that sent him home from Paris at the critical moment, when he was about to take sides in the struggle for liberty there. It is probable that the author of "Character of the Happy Warrior" and of the great political sonnets had in him the making of a leader of armies or even in civic strife ; and amid the turmoil of party conflict in Paris, in 1792, he had serious thoughts of attempting to control the fierce passions of men and to bring order out of confusion in that turbulent city. He was there between the time of the September Massacres and the Reign of Terror. But no thought of personal safety seems to have occurred to him. He came home because his friends in England stopped supplies.

"Dragged by a chain of harsh necessity—

So seemed it, : : : :

To England I returned, else : : : .

Doubtless, I should have then made common cause

With some who perished ; haply perished too,—

A poor mistaken and bewildered offering."

(Prelude, Book X.)

But the prowess of soul in Wordsworth is seen at its greatest in the steadfast adherence to his own ideal, when, after those dark days, the light of that ideal shone clear for him. He put aside the chances of worldly success held out to him by friends who wished to save him from his "idle dreams." He accepted poverty for the sake of freedom to live the life and do the work his genius called him to. That needed some courage, and not of the common sort. Once or twice, it would seem, his heart failed him—as on that morning when he met the Leech-gatherer on the lonely moor. At the time he wrote the poem which that old man inspired, the little legacy of money left him by his friend was almost exhausted. The thought of poverty and its distress had come upon him :—

"The fear that kills :

Cold, pain, and labour and all fleshly ills ;
And mighty poets in their misery dead."

But the Leech-gatherer, who was both poor and old, yet cheerful, courteous, and of "so firm a mind," restored his courage, and made him fearless to face the worst which life might bring.

The daring spirit of Wordsworth puts forth its greatest strength in the poems which he offered to the world. I suppose that many people still think of him as one who wrote a lot of childish verses about daisies and daffodils, about a cottage girl who had a little lamb, and another who said : "Nay, master, we are seven"—about an idiot boy, and a butterfly, and a spade. They do not know that before he wrote of these homely matters he had pondered the great problems of human life and destiny, had discussed many theories of political and social reform, had sounded the depths of human sorrow and despair ; they do not reflect that to write such poems then—that to be simple and natural, and to deal with the plain, everyday realities of human experience in homely verse, in the face of ridicule and scorn, meant courage and heroism of exceptional quality.

Perhaps, with Coleridge for companion in the venture, and Dorothy, the beloved sister, as friend and counsellor, the publication of "Lyrical Ballads" required no special daring. It was the work of two young men of genius, put forth, doubtless, in hope of winning attention, possibly approval and applause—as well as a little money. But to go on writing such verse, to keep to a chosen literary method and ideal, with the public indifferent, and the whole force of literary criticism turned upon it in scathing rebuke or scornful rejection, and only a few friends to approve and appreciate—to adhere steadily to the method of naturalness, and the principle of facing the plain realities, and finding in them the material and the inspiration—this is courage such as in the field of literature has rarely, if ever, been surpassed.

It was, we may say, only a question of being true to his own genius—of following the light that shone within. But what an "only" that is ! How much of life's real greatness turns on that ! And it is just here that Wordsworth becomes the exemplar and friend of all who would be and do their noblest, in any calling. If the youth of to-day could hear the word which his life speaks—the message of those early years of choice and decision, it would be full of great meanings to them. It would appeal to the finest within them to assert itself. It would claim for the soul of each the right to follow its own genius, to ply its own bent, to find its own path. It might spoil the chances of worldly success ; it might lure the youth away from those attractive walks of life where fortunes are made or fame is won. For Wordsworth's early career is itself that protest and appeal which found a voice in the great Sonnet, with its grave opening lines :—

"The world is too much with us ; late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers."

That Sonnet is the poet's challenge to his own age, and still more to ours—his gauntlet flung in the face of Society which was and is making acquisitiveness its ruling purpose, and luxury its god. He had earned the right to make that challenge, and his life is a call to the heart of every youth to dare be true to its own high instincts, scornful of mean ambitions and that vain world in which "Plain living and high thinking are no more."

Yet Wordsworth, be it remembered, was not lacking in ambition. No man ever set before him a more exalted aim, or proclaimed it to the world with more dauntless resolve. The daring of his spirit reaches its highest intellectual expression in the lines which tell of that great theme which is to be the burden of his song. He makes his appeal to "Urania," or that "Greater Muse, if such Descend to earth or dwell in highest Heaven," because his task is of such stupendous significance :—

"For I must tread on, shadowy ground, must sink

Deep—and, aloft ascending, breathe in worlds

To which the heaven of heavens is but a veil.

All strength—all terror, single or in bands.
That ever was put forth in personal form—

Jehovah—with his thunder, and the choir
Of shouting Angels, and the empyreal thrones.

I pass them unalarmed."

And if, wondering what all this means, and where those heights and depths he must explore are, we ponder the lines which follow, we shall find it is no other world that he is seeking—no far-off region of visionary dreams and fancies ; it is this world which is the world of all of us ; it is our own mysterious being—it is the living human spirit, moving here amid the wonders of the living universe. Nothing which the unbridled imaginations of men have fancied or conceived has, for Wordsworth, such deep significance as this actual everyday world of human interest and feeling.

"Not chaos, not

The darkest pit of lowest Erebus

Nor aught of blinder vacancy, scooped out

By help of dreams, can breed such fear and awe

As fall upon us when we look

Into our Minds, into the Mind of Man,

My haunt, and the main region of my song."

And then follows the calm prophecy of the golden age, which needs for its fulfilment only that "the discerning intellect of Man" be "wedded to this goodly universe In love and holy passion," and the fearless assertion of his own duty and resolve to proclaim it:

"I, long before the blissful hour arrives,
Would chant, in lonely peace, the spousal verse

Of this great consummation:—and by words

Which speak of nothing more than what we are,

Would I arouse the sensual from their sleep

Of Death, and win the vacant and the vain

To noble raptures."

Few have ever dared with greater prowess of soul than this:

It is when we remember these things that even the homeliest of his lays begin to have deep meanings for us, and make us feel that there is "a grandeur in the beatings of the heart," a heroism in the humblest life. He writes of little things and makes them great—shows us that they are great, that in and through them we may discern revealings of the divine reality of the world, the knowledge of which can give us wisdom and strength and hope and joy. The old Leech-gatherer told him his simple tale of endurance and of toil—told it with cheerfulness, and

"With demeanour kind;

But stately in the main; and when he ended,

I could have laughed myself to scorn to find

In that decrepit Man so firm a mind.

'God,' said I, 'be my help and stay secure;

I'll think of the Leech-gatherer on the lonely moor.'"

EXPEDIENCY is a word that lends itself to a higher and a lower use. The expedient is, properly speaking, that which is serviceable, but it is often made to stand for that which is merely profitable. "It is expedient for you that I go away" is an instance of the first use; "It is expedient that one man should die for the people," of the second. When St. Paul says that things which are lawful are not always expedient, by expedient he means that which is generally helpful; when he says that he does not seek the expedient, by the expedient he now means that which is for his own private advantage.

It is clear, then, that we ought not to speak of moral or religious expediency, unless by the expedient in such cases we mean that which aids purpose, and not that which simply brings gain. The motive and the means must be considered before we can determine whether a proposed action, or course of action, is, or is not, morally or religiously expedient. Immediate results must not be allowed to obscure ultimate effects, nor must the temporal be separated in thought from the eternal. Vivisection, for instance, would never be justified on the ground of utility to humanity, if there were clear and lofty conceptions in our minds of utility and of humanity. Slavery has been defended on a plea of progress, torture in the interests of truth, duelling as a means of justice, through lack of imagination of the injury done to progress and truth and justice when served in unworthy ways. Lynching may have a deterrent power beyond that of the law, but lynching is not the less an insolent negation of law. Yet it is not easy to draw a strict line between the serviceable and the profitable. The decimation of a mutinous regiment, for example, would hardly be approved now, but I am not sure that the granting of free pardon to an accomplice accepted as witness is, morally, much more defensible.

Cases of religious expediency are those,
I imagine, in which no religious principle is involved—action would then be imperative, not expedient—but, on a calculation of ways and means, certain measures become advisable. The observance of days and seasons, the dedication of places, the consecration of things, rite and ordinance, order and degree, rule and discipline, all rest upon religious expediency. Things indifferent in themselves acquire a positive value by association with things essential.
Danger creeps in when the adoption of an expedient is justified as a choice of evils.
There is warning in the very sound of such contention. We know too well the familiar excuses by which devices for raising money for building churches, maintaining them, making them "attractive," are supported.
It is forgotten that such expedients strike at the very root of that spirituality which churches are intended to cherish and protect. The plea that a little evil may be done that good may come shocks us inexpressibly when it is thought to have ecclesiastical sanction, but we are wonderfully tolerant when it is commended by fashionable custom.

Compromise is another of the disguises in which false expediency steals upon us.
Compromise is born of desire for peace, but is also the child of timidity. We have a constitutional shrinking from real issues and logical conclusions. Our "settlements" have brought, not peace, but a sword. Three centuries of bitter controversy have followed the attempt to make the English prayer-book susceptible of two interpretations, and the Church of England at the same time both Catholic and anti-papal; whilst thirty years and more of educational strife have been the fruit of the endeavour to provide religious teaching at once Biblical and undoctinal.
Nor, apparently, is our fond belief in the least shaken, that compromise is a virtue, and one of the special virtues, of our race.
Too often it is only an expedient blindly clutched at for the relief that it may bring, and not for the service that it should render.

The speech of the unscrupulous Caiaphas is the typical example of the depth to which expediency may fall. To him it was the simplest of maxims that, if in any emergency a convenient victim could be found, one should be sacrificed to many. This is vicarious sacrifice at its lowest level of statement; yet to a mind trained to think of sacrifice as an expedient there would be no higher; the innocence, the helplessness of the victim, the absence of consent, of voluntariness, would be irrelevant. The wonder is that a doctrine which inspires horror in connection with religion inspires none in connection with science and scientific research. Caiaphas now is not a priest, but a physiologist.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—Mr. Dowson's frank and illuminating rejoinder to my letter of a fortnight ago makes his position perfectly plain.
He is an advocate of State-paid instruction being confined to secular subjects, but only on condition that denominational teaching is admitted to all schools impartially. As he admits, it is a misnomer to call this a secular system. It would transfer the act of religious teaching from the present teachers to representatives of the churches. But it would not exclude State payment for such instruction. Instead of disestablishing and disendowing two or three denominations it would establish and endow all alike, providing buildings in which their agents could, at stated times, give such religious instruction as they thought proper. It would be a new sort of concurrent endowment.

Mr. Dowson's plan differs from Mr.
Chamberlain's only in this, that the one provides for denominational instruction outside the period of compulsory attendance, and the other within the ordinary school hours. Would this slender wall of partition survive a single session of a Conservative Parliament? I do not think so. The removal of Mr. Dowson's restriction would make little demand upon Parliamentary time, and would leave us in a far worse position than that which we occupy to-day.

Experience during the past thirty-five years shows the unreality of the supposed popular demand for secular schools. In most of the towns where the secular system was adopted after 1870 undenominational religious instruction is now given. Under the present law (which the Education Bill does not propose to alter), schools attended by about half the children of the country could be made completely secular if the people desired it. There is no indication of such desire; and until there is Parliament cannot reasonably be expected to pass a Veto Bill.

What does Mr. Dowson mean by "secular"? Would he leave any place for the Bible in a secular curriculum? If "secularists" generally would answer this question in the affirmative we might not be far off a system which could be applied to all the schools except those of the Jews,
Roman Catholics, and High Anglicans.
A fourth clause for these is surely better than sectarianising the whole of the schools as, in his despair, Mr. Dowson proposes.

And I wish some of our friends would ask themselves what they mean by "religious."
Unitarians, at any rate, ought not to use the term as if it were synonymous with sectarian or ecclesiastical. "Pure religion and undefiled" we all want in the schools, and any system of education, State or voluntary, would be a poor, miserable, truncated thing without it.

A wholly secular system is impossible; I am glad to notice that Mr. Dowson does not desire it. The general right of entry, outside school hours, would, I believe, inevitably result in a worse form of denominationalism than that which exists to-day. Cowper-Templeism, then, holds the field; and if that is conceded Mr. Dowson agrees that Clause 4 is necessary. As a Unitarian I cannot approve much that is embodied in undenominational syllabuses; but I regard these as the least objectionable alternative, and think it is wisdom to work and wait for an improved application of the principle.

W. W. HADLEY.

Rochdale, July 16, 1906.

P.S.—I read with pleasure Mr. Dowson's assurance that he does not desire "contracting out" for Roman Catholic schools. But I am convinced that that would be one of the evil results of the adoption of his plan.—W. H. H.

THE MARRIAGE SERVICE.

SIR,—The Bishop of London, according to report, has affirmed that the marriage service of the Church of England is "permeated with the Trinitarian doctrine." If he who made this assertion were not a bishop one would be tempted to ask whether he had ever read the service, for, as a matter of fact, Trinitarian doctrine is never once declared in it from start to finish. The nearest approach to such doctrine is contained in the blessing uttered by the minister: "God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost bless, preserve, and keep you," &c.

This is not Trinitarian doctrine, for there is not a word to say that the three are one. A Tritheist, a Sabellian, even an Arian could say "Amen" to that blessing.

But even if it could be contended that in this solitary instance we have a declaration of Trinitarianism, it does not entail any obligation on the part of those who are thus blessed to agree with the phraseology. Nothing that the man and woman have to say contains the slightest tincture of Trinitarian doctrine, but then so many ardent Trinitarians do not know what Trinitarian doctrine is.

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

100, King Henry's-road, N.W.

THE London Education Election Committee, of which Lord Stanley [of Alderley] is president, has issued the following programme, in view of next year's County Council Election:—

(a) No candidate to be adopted or supported unless pledged: "To support by vote and petition to Parliament the recreation of a separate education authority for London directly elected for the purpose without disqualification of candidates on the ground of sex, residence, or ratepaying."

(b) To secure that the Education Acts be administered as follows:—

(1) To provide as soon as possible ample school places; and not to reduce the number of places to be provided by altering the established method of estimating accommodation.

(2) Not to take over Voluntary school buildings permanently which fall short of the standard of good Board school buildings; and not to maintain permanently many small schools when new schools of a suitable size with playgrounds can be provided.

(3) To press forward provision of higher grade and secondary schools under public management; and training for the defective children, the teaching of cookery, woodwork, and other special subjects.

(4) To maintain and develop a liberal curriculum in all schools.

(5) To extend evening schools and, as far as possible, to make them free.

(6) To secure adequate halls and playgrounds and appliances for cleanliness and health, and do all that is possible for the physical development of our child population. In connection with this to have adequate medical inspection of the schools and sufficient school-visiting nurses.

(7) To give fuller publicity to the work of education, by allowing the Press and public to attend the meetings, and by conceding to ratepayers the right to inspect documents, reports, and papers in the custody of the Education Committee; and to publish as soon as possible all reports in a cheap and convenient form, and to sell them at a reasonable (cost) price.

(8) To check the present tendency to officialism and to associate more directly the representatives of the electors in the daily work of administration, and to bring them more in human contact with the schools and teachers.

(9) To improve specially the infant schools by securing (a) That for children under five no class shall exceed forty on roll; (b) That such class shall have at least 15 square feet per child; (c) That the teachers shall be trained; and (d) That curriculum shall be directed to the development of infant activity and initiative, not so much seeking to give direct instruction as to awaken powers of observation, and help the mental and physical growth of the child.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Chesterfield (Appointment).—The Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, M.A., has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation of the Elder Yard Chapel to become their minister, and will commence his ministry on the first Sunday in September.

Congleton.—On Sunday, the 15th inst., special services were held in connection with the re-opening of the organ, after complete renovation and insertion of three new stops. The afternoon service was almost entirely choral, including organ solos, sacred songs, anthems, and hymns, with a short address by the minister, Rev. G. H. Smith. In the evening a similar programme was followed, Mr. Smith preaching on the part assigned to music in the public worship of God. The congregations were good, in the evening especially, the church being quite full. The collections were encouraging.

Dudley (Presentation).—On Wednesday, July 11, Mr. and Mrs. George Bean entertained the members of the Old Meeting congregation at a garden party at Oakham Lodge, when the occasion was taken to make a presentation to Mr. H. A. Lewis, who has been for 27 years secretary of the congregation. The presentation, which was made on behalf of the congregation by Mr. Bean, in the absence of the Mayor, consisted of a purse of gold and an illuminated address, in which it was stated that Mr. Lewis became secretary towards the close of the ministry of the late Matthew Gibson, and had since then served under four successive ministers. Warm tribute was paid to his personal qualities, and the services rendered to the congregation were gratefully acknowledged. The Mayor arrived before the proceedings were over, and both he and the Rev. Alfred Thompson joined in the tribute to Mr. Lewis, who responded with much feeling. Tea was afterwards served in a marquee, and a cordial vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Bean for their generous hospitality, proposed by the Mayor, was passed. Mr. Bean, in responding, mentioned that Oakham Lodge had been connected with the Old Meeting for a period of 184 years. He hoped that their coming effort to secure a new organ, which was greatly needed, would be crowned with success.

Glasgow: Ross-street.—The Rev. E. T. Russell has passed the B.A. Examination of the Royal University of Ireland.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—The Sunday-school is closed for a summer vacation and will re-open on Sunday, August 12.

Lancaster.—On Sunday last the annual demonstration of the local branch of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants was held, in behalf of the Society's Orphan Fund. Headed by the Lancaster borough band, the members of the society and other trade unionists paraded the principal streets of the town, and then made their way to the St. Nicholas-street Chapel, where a special service was conducted by the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, and a collection taken in behalf of the Orphan Fund. The entire service was of a most inspiring character, and the hearty singing of the hymns by the crowded congregation will long be remembered. The members of the society have usually attended the parish church, or some orthodox Nonconformist place of worship, on occasion of this special service. It was therefore felt to be a sign of the times when they asked permission to come to the Unitarian Chapel, and it is gratifying to learn that they regard the service (including the collection) as amongst the most successful and helpful of any they have ever attended.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday, the 15th, the new oak sounding-board and carved panelling, presented to the church by Sir John Brunner, were seen in position for the first time. The work covers the lower part of the eastern walls of the church on each side of the apse, and is carried into the chancel to meet the reredos. The sounding-board is octagonal in shape, with a richly-carved vine frieze and winged cherubs' heads at the angles, and is suspended from the angle of the wall by massive twisted rods of beaten brass. The frieze is carried back along the wall to crown the oak panelling, in which is set a large brass tablet with the "Two Commandments" of the New Testament in raised lettering. In niches on either side of this are angels representing "Song" and "Meditation," while the angel of "Prayer" stands on the side wall of the chancel looking towards the altar. On the south side of the church part of the wall is occupied by the organ case, a former gift by the same donor, and the panelling is repeated on the remainder of the surface, with an angel of "Praise" playing on a harp in a position corresponding to those on the opposite side. The new vestry doors have long decorative hinges and handles, and there are two large brass cases enclosing the hot water coils, with embossed panels of vine leaves and grapes, while the old pulpit lights have been replaced by two lanterns hanging from the angles of the sounding-board. The designs for the work were made by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, the church secretary, and the whole has been executed with admirable skill and taste by Messrs. Hatch, of Lancaster, and the Artificers' Guild of London, who also, together, carried out the memorial font dedicated last year.

London: George's-row.—The 27th annual Flower Show was held at the Domestic Mission on Tuesday, July 17. The schoolroom was made gay with 400 plants sent in for competition by 104 exhibitors, men, women, and children, all of whom had cultivated the plants in their own homes for at least some weeks previously. The committee of the Window Gardening Society is once more indebted to Mr. Frederick Nettlefold for kindly allowing his head-gardener to judge these exhibits, and also for a beautiful gift of various plants which are awarded to successful competitors, in addition to a number of other prizes. In the evening Mr. Enos Howes, ex-Mayor of Finsbury, presided as chairman over a very pleasant gathering. Before the distribution of prizes by Mrs. Howes, all present much enjoyed some songs from Mrs. Teasdale, and a bright, encouraging address given by Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, of Highgate.

London Guilds Union.—The annual excursion of the Union was held on Saturday last, July 14. A party of about fifty, representing Essex Church, Mansford-street, Stratford, Stepney, and Walthamstow, took boat from the Old Swan Pier to Greenwich, where they partook of tea, visited the park and observatory, returning by boat in the early evening. By special arrangement with the L.C.C., reserved accommodation was provided for the party on the boats. The next meeting of the Union will be held at Essex Church, at the end of September or early October, and will take the form of a religious service.

London: Stratford.—The annual Sunday-school excursion was held on Saturday, July 7. The party went by brakes to High Beech. The superintendent and teachers wish to express their best thanks to the many friends who contributed towards the expense.

Newport, Mon.—The church here is greatly indebted to Dr. Bhimal Chandra Ghosh for a series of four deeply interesting addresses on Indian religious thought, which he delivered on July 1 and 15. Despite the fact that mid-summer is a season when attendances are liable to dwindle Dr. Ghosh's visits attracted the largest congregations that have yet assembled in the Charles-street church, and the impression made among both members and strangers is bound to be fruitful in good results. On July 1 Dr. Ghosh's subjects were "Hindu Conceptions of the Deity" and "The Meaning of Religion," while on the 15th inst. he spoke on "The Hindu Doctrine of Works" and "The Harmony of Religions." The first three addresses led up to the declaration made in the fourth, that every religion stands for some phase of truth, and all are parts of one great universal revelation, which must ever be progressive. On July 8 the services were conducted by the Rev. Arthur Golland, of Essex Church, who preached to good congregations with much acceptance. Altogether the work at Newport is full of vitality, and shows most encouraging progress.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street (Presentation).—On Sunday, July 15, special services were conducted by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, and after evening service a meeting was held in the vestry, when the presentation of a silver tea-service was made to Mr. T. Bond, in commemoration of the completion of 20 years of service as minister of the congregation, a period during which a mortgage has been paid off, and much has been done to improve the property. In the afternoon Mr. Brinkworth gave the address at the Portsmouth P.S.A., as he does every half-year when he visits the town.

Southend-on-Sea.—Since the commencement of June, especially, the Sunday evening services at the little church in Darnley-road have been well attended, the collections having been more than double those for the corresponding period of last year. On July 15 the sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Mummery, the octogenarian minister of Unity Church, Wood Green, who delighted a congregation of between sixty and seventy with a beautifully helpful discourse on "Loneliness," full of quaint humour and instruction tinged with a little pathos. Last Sunday evening there were over seventy present. The congregational and Sunday-school excursion took place last Saturday, the party being conveyed in brakes to the Bull Wood, a charming spot at Hockley, seven miles from Southend. Here an excellent tea was provided, at which thirty children and over forty adults sat down. The day was ideally fine, and was thoroughly enjoyed.

Sunderland.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday, July 8. Mrs. Blues, of South Shields, preached at the morning and evening services, her subjects being "The Children's Garden," and "The King's Way." In the afternoon Mr. Kay, of Sunderland, gave a very interesting address on "The Building of Character." At all the services special hymns were rendered by the children.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that during*August all correspondence may be sent to the office of THE INQUIRER, and not to his private address.

WE publish this week a report of the annual meeting of the Southern Association at Newport on July 18. A report of the Eastern Union annual meeting at Diss on the following day we must keep for next week.

BARON F. DE SCHICKLER, President of the Délégation Libérale, has sent a letter of warm thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the grant of £100 recently made to help during the present crises in the support of the Liberal Protestant churches in the Cevennes, composed largely of very poor but devoted people.

"A CRUEL disappointment has befallen our expectations." So speaks the Tsar, or some other in his name, in the manifesto by which the Duma, the youngest of the Parliaments of the world, the first to voice the will of the mighty Russian peoples, has been ruthlessly dissolved. Of the monarch we say nothing. He has spoken with so many voices that none can tell who is the real author of this last proclamation. But the manifesto itself is in its historical résumé a tissue of falsehoods. The Russian Government has not devoted itself to the removal of the ignorance of the people or to the removal of their burdens. It is itself the one intolerable burden upon them, and by its vacillation, no less than by its oppressions, has corrupted the springs of social and national life.

"THE Duma is dead; long live the Duma." Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's phrase had an instantaneous response from the members of the 22 Parliaments who are sitting at Westminster in the Peace Conference. They leapt to their feet to do honour to the Russian delegates, the Duma, and the Russian people whom the Russian Government has challenged to mortal conflict. "Long live the Duma." The response comes again prompt and strong from the whole English people. It sums up into memorable words the aspiration of the peoples of Europe. For the cause of the Duma is the cause of Europe. The Duma is dissolved. It is to reassemble. Even the rescript of the Tsar says so much, and forces beyond his control may compel him to redeem the promise. "In dissolving the Duma we confirm our immutable intention of keeping this institution, and . . . we appoint March 5, 1907 as the date of the Convocation of a new Duma."

BUT March 5 is far distant. What is to happen in the meanwhile? The Duma is dissolved. It is no longer an official and integral member of the Government of the country. But is it dead? The Duma no longer speaks as a legally constituted authority. But, though formally dissolved, it is still a social and a moral force, and it has issued a counter-manifesto:—"Until the popular representatives are summoned, do not give a kopeck to the Throne or a soldier to the Army. Be steadfast in your refusal. No power can resist the united and inflexible will of a people." Thus is the gauntlet taken up. In everything but name Russia is in a state of civil war. We know not how soon the name may be added. Suffering will certainly descend like a hailstorm on this devoted people in their heroic struggle. Already the prisons are full. Gangs of convicted and unconvicted prisoners pass daily by that terrible signpost which points back to Europe, forward to Asia and exile. In the towns there will be strikes, in the country flames. Bielestok is a symbol only of the coming woe. The days that lie before the Russian people are days of terror. If those days be not shortened, who can be saved? But this people has endured through a long generation of strife. To doubt their triumph were to despair of humanity.

THE Inter-Parliamentary Conference on Peace and Arbitration held in London this week has been rendered specially notable by the speech of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and by the direct message of welcome from the King, which he was authorised to deliver. The Premier's speech was refreshingly frank and courageous, and noted with great satisfaction the progress of their cause. "If," he said, "we hold with the late Mr. Hay that war is the most futile and ferocious of human follies, what are we to say of the surpassing futility of expending the strength and substance of nations on preparations for war, possessing no finality, amenable to no alliances that statesmanship can devise, and for ever consuming the reserves on which a State must ultimately rely when the time of trial comes, if come it must—I mean the well-being and vitality of its people?" Then, as a sign of hope for the future, he bade them remember, the people are on their side. "The bonds of mutual understanding and esteem are strengthening between the peoples, and the time is approaching when nothing can hold back from them the knowledge that it is they who are the victims of war and militarism; that war in its tawdry triumphs scatters the fruits of their labour, breaks down the paths of progress, and turns the fire of constructive energy into a destroying force."

THE Conference concluded on Wednesday with a luncheon in Westminster Hall, and very cordial speeches, followed by a visit to Windsor. The Lord Chancellor presided at the luncheon, with the French and Russian Ambassadors on either hand. Count Apponyi, who was one of the speakers, recalled the fact that in the work of peace the lead had been taken by the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race; and Mr. Bryan, who followed, said "it ought to be one of the objects of the Union to present to the world an ideal consistent with peace, and it should be remembered that while man shared physical courage with the brute, in moral courage he stood alone. He could not love a God that made his progress dependent upon taking his brother's life, nor could he revere a God who made it necessary in the plan of the universe for men to fight and kill each other in order to reach the highest stage of human progress."

THE following is the text of the British Memorial to the Duma, initiated by a number of London editors, and now being very widely and influentially signed:—

"To the President of the Duma.

"Sir,—We, the undersigned members of Parliament, representatives of municipal and educational bodies, and other British citizens, desire at the close of the first session of the first Russian Parliament to convey to it a direct message of sympathy and respect. Our own history has taught us that representative government and personal liberty are the only sure foundations on which a nation can hope to base national progress and national prosperity, and our good-will to Russia has caused us to watch the creation of the Duma, and its struggle for power, with deep interest and ardent hope. We have learned to admire the genius of the Russian people; the heroism of its sacrifices for freedom and its sufferings in a long and painful struggle have touched the heart of every generous man. The complete triumph of liberty in Russia, to which we look forward at no distant date, will at length make it possible for the English and Russian peoples to give formal expression to the friendship already uniting them, a friendship based on community of ideals, which must help to realise the aspiration of all good Europeans for a civilisation devoted to peace." Among the first to sign were the Editors of the Daily Chronicle, Daily News, Tribune, Morning Leader, Liverpool Post, Manchester Guardian, Spectator, and Speaker, the Bishop of Hereford, Canon Barnett, [Rev. Stephen Gladstone, Dr. Horton, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Sir John Gorst, George Meredith, William Watson, Frederic Harrison, and Dr. Spencer Watson. Among the many signatures since received have been those of the Dean of Ely, the Revs. C. Silvester Horne, J. Munro Gibson, J. Scott Lidgett, Mr. Percy Bunting, Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, M.P., Mr. Passmore Edwards, Mr. I. Zangwill, Dr. Furnivall, Mr. Walter Crane, and Mr. Thomas Hardy.

THE Annual Meetings of the Unitarians of Hungary will be held at Kolozsvár, Transylvania, on October 28. Bishop Ferencz has written to the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association stating that he will be very glad if any English Unitarians who are visiting Hungary at the time would attend the gathering at Kolozsvár. He assures anyone who can attend of a very hearty welcome.

THE Rev. W. S. Key, formerly of Boston, Lincolnshire, but for many years settled in America, is spending the summer in this country, and will be glad to preach during August and September. He may be addressed at Essex Hall. Mr. Key has recently been active as the agent of the Unitarian Women's Alliance, in the religious and educational interests of the poor white folk of North Carolina.

LET any who mourn think of others; let them treat with generous kindness the men, women, and children round about them, and their sorrow will be glorified. The "doing good" will bring them into closer communion with the Everlasting Love; and as they are drawn nearer to His love, His peace will fall upon them.—H. W. Crosskey.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.]

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—I have no intention of replying at any length to a letter so satisfactory to me in its interpretations of my previous communication, and so fair in its comments as Mr. Hadley's of the 16th inst. But he asks me a question which it is only courteous to answer, and I will do so in the fewest possible words. I would not find a place for the Bible in a secular curriculum, but leave it to the churches to give their own Bible teaching. They would, under right of entry, have the opportunity of doing this in schools which would be common to all sects, instead of being denominationalised as under Clause IV. I am in absolute agreement with Mr. Hadley that what we want in our citizen schools is "religion" pure and undefiled; and I look for this to the influence of religious men and women on the teaching staffs, although no so-called religious instruction be intrusted to them.

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

Gee Cross, July 21, 1906.

A WARNING.

SIR,—A man named Aston, in applying to me for assistance about a week ago, claimed acquaintance with Mr. Bloor and produced a letter by Mr. Jupp. I find that both these ministers have tried hard to put this man on his feet, but with most unsatisfactory results. They consent to my stating these facts in this public way that other ministers may be warned.

H. RAWLINGS.

33, Knightland-road, Upper Clapton,
July 25, 1906.

MANY friends will join us in warm congratulations to Miss Mary Ann Lewin on her ninetieth birthday to-morrow (Sunday, July 29). Miss Lewin was born in the year in which her grandfather, the Rev. Robert Lewin, of Liverpool, resigned the pulpit of Renshaw-street Chapel, having been its first minister, and for forty-one years before that minister of its predecessor, the Benns Garden Chapel. She herself has always taken a deep interest in the cause of education, and was for more than forty years the devoted superintendent of the Hope-street Sunday-school, in which her sister, the late Miss Sarah Lewin, was also for many years a valued teacher. As a district visitor she served for so many years that she saw the babies of her people grow up to be themselves grandparents, and she still maintains a keen interest in all matters pertaining to education and social progress.

WHEN some affection higher than your want has dawned upon you and claimed you with its divine appeal, if you simply recognise the call, and cost what it may, go whither it leads, though the feet may bleed, and the strength may droop; your mind is clear with a new serenity and repose.—Martineau.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

I STOPPED short the other day when my pen would have run on willingly, and although I know that it is an unpardonable fault for an essayist to be prolix or dull, I am inclined to take the risk in the case of a book like "the Imitation." People who make it part of their religion to avoid religious books can save themselves from annoyance by the simple expedient of refusing to read, while a few persons of open mind will be ready to believe that a book of devotion may be also a book of extraordinary human interest.

But it is not only a fashionable dislike for the more pronounced forms of Christian piety which has thrown some discredit upon the classics of devotion. They belong, as a rule, to the individual type of religion, and they reflect, amid much that is permanent, ideals of life which have grown a little dim. The Imitation has nothing modern about it. It was written by a man who believed in the retirement of the cloister and practised the ascetic life. It contains many passages which, in the severity of their tone or the attitude which they encourage towards worldly pleasures and pursuits, seem to be more suitable for the monastery than for the cities of men. Like many other great works of genius, it is intensely personal both in its excellences and its defects. It deals with religion almost exclusively on the individual side, because it was the solitary soul and God which were the two supreme realities for its author. It has even been described as a manual of sacred selfishness, but with only the small proportion of truth which is the usual fate of clever critical negatives. For there is no necessary antagonism between the individual and the social aspects of Christianity. In the day when the message of corporate life and common duties and social sacrifice is filling our ears, we need to remember that we can only follow Christ in this way when we tread the "royal road of the Holy Cross" in the power of self-knowledge and of inward grace. To despise the voice which speaks to us of the interior life, and reveals us to ourselves, is to go into the Christian warfare with battered armour and a broken sword.

But enough of so obvious a truth! Let us come to this book in the only way in which it will declare its secret to us, not as critics to magnify our points of difference, but as lovers to learn its secret. It is a book of human experience. It is rich in deep and intimate knowledge of the human heart. The writer has felt as we feel; he knows our temptations and weakness; he reveals us to ourselves. And he does it so graciously, that all anger and self-excuse die away beneath his quiet, calm gaze, and we are left with the one desire of holier service and finer achievement in the following of Christ.

The Imitation is one of the few great religious books of the world. If you ask for the evidence for this statement I need only point to the story of its influence. We wander with reverent tread through the rooms of the house where a great man has lived and worked. We go on pilgrimage to the places which are consecrated by noble memories, where martyrs have died or victories have been won for truth and freedom. As we turn the pages of this book we may have a similar experience, for here are words which have come to men with the power of the Spirit. They have rebuked and inspired them. They have given them patience in their sorrows. They have strengthened them for sacrifice. They have filled them with a sense of the tenderness and compassion of God. Just as the spiritual authority of the Bible must be looked for not only in its original inspiration, but hardly in a less degree in the human experience, the long record of man's sorrow and triumph, which for centuries has gathered round its words, so this little book, by what it has done for men, has drawn to itself a story of influence almost scriptural in its sacredness, and the reverence which belongs only to our greatest benefactors.

Of Thomas à Kempis himself there is not much to tell. He lived far from the life of the world and its public events. The story of his life is in his writings. He would have the same significance for us if we knew nothing about the outward man at all. His greatness is all within, in the unseen world of thought and desire. And yet the few particulars which we can glean appeal naturally to our curiosity. Thomas Hamerken was born, the son of poor parents, in the small town of Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, in 1380. At the age of thirteen he went to school at Deventer, and for the next seven years lived in fellowship with the Brothers of Common Life, earning some reputation for himself by his proficiency in learning, and as a skilful writer of beautiful books. Captivated by the spirit of the religious fellowship in which he found himself, by the charm of its quietness and its lofty devotional feeling, he was not content to remain as a lay-brother subject only to vows, which he might renounce, should he desire to return to the ordinary ways of the world. He resolved to accept a severer form of consecration, and at the age of twenty he began his novitiate in the Monastery of Augustinian canons at Mount St. Agnes. Here, in the house of his training, after taking the full vows, he settled down to spend the remainder of his long life in meditative retirement, broken only by the simple charities and the active duties of benevolence which the rules of his order prescribed. He died in 1471.

No better description could be given of the temper and quality of his own religious life than in some sentences from the rule which Thomas à Kempis promised to obey. He bound himself under solemn vows:—

"To observe the fundamental law of love; first towards God, then towards our neighbour, according to its just extent, and to imitate the example of the Mother Church of Jerusalem in union of heart, and sharing with others the goods we possess.

"To learn the lesson of humility according to the most perfect pattern set forth in the life of Christ, and in that of his nearest and most faithful followers; and especially in this, that the greatest among them should be as the youngest, and he that is chief as he that doth serve.

"To take charge of the sick and infirm wherever they be found, and so far as we are capable, and to do all the service in our power for their bodily and spiritual welfare.

"To be without any affectation or singularity in dress, and in all other externals of life; and to regard above all things the acquisition of internal purity, and the fashioning of our lives into a conformity to the will of God.

"Humbly and affectionately to give and receive fraternal correction and admonition from one another, meekly to confess our faults one to another, gladly to submit ourselves to the reproof or chastisement of our superiors, and resolutely keep up the true discipline of the Gospel.

"To do all we possibly can for the general good and interest of the community; to be diligent in our duties and callings; never to be idle or to wander curiously about, and to be content with the distribution of the common funds, though not altogether so favourable to ourselves as might be expected.

"Not to neglect outward cleanliness and decency, but to look to the due discharge of outward things for the sake of the inward, and to take proper care of the body for the sake of the soul, both in health and sickness."

What a wonderful sobriety and orderliness there is in those sentences. With a fine instinct for sincerity, they avoid the besetting snares of the ascetic life, morbid introspection, delight in mortification, false contempt of the world. It is the ideal of Christian perfection which Thomas has enshrined in the Imitation.

The book itself is his personal record. He did not invent it. He lived it first, and wrote it down afterwards. It is the confession of his own soul in its weakness and struggle and victory, as he seeks to imitate Christ in his holy obedience to the Will of God. It is divided into four books, each with its descriptive title: Book I., Admonitions useful for the spiritual life; Book II., Admonitions leading to the interior life; Book III., of interior consolation; Book IV., A devout exhortation to Holy Communion. Each book is divided in turn into a number of brief sections, and consists of meditations, prayers, devout exhortations, and sometimes of colloquies between the soul and its Divine Lord. It has none of the splendours of rhetoric or the lustre of brilliant thought. It is the eloquence of simplicity and truth which makes sentences like these, culled almost at random from its pages, linger with a rhythmical cadence in the memory:—

"No man safely goes abroad, but he who willingly lies hid at home. No man speaks safely, but he who willingly holds his peace. No man rules safely, but he who is willingly ruled. No man safely commands, but he who has learnt well to obey. No man safely rejoices, unless he have within him the testimony of a good conscience."

"If thy heart were right, then every creature would be to thee as a mirror of life and a book of holy teaching. There is no creature so little and contemptible as not to manifest the goodness of God. If thou wert good and pure within, then wouldst thou see all things without hindrance and understand them aright. A pure heart penetrates into heaven and hell."

"That man has great tranquillity of heart, who cares neither for praises nor dispraises. He will easily be content and in peace whose conscience is clear. Thou art not more holy, if thou art praised, nor worse, if thou art dispraised. What thou art that thou art, nor canst thou be said to be greater than God sees thee to be. If thou considerest well what thou art within thyself, thou wilt not care what men may say of thee. Man looketh on the outward appearance, but God looketh on the heart. Man considers the actions, but God weighs the intentions."

"When a man stands upon himself, he easily falls off to human consolation. But a true lover of Christ and a diligent follower after virtue does not fall back on consolations, nor seek such sensible sweetnesses, but is rather willing to bear strong trials and hard labours for Christ."

"Oh, what might there is in the pure love of Jesus, when unmixed with any self-interest or self-love. Are not all those to be called hirelings, who are always looking for consolations? Are not they proved to be rather lovers of themselves than of Christ, who always think of their own profit and gain?"

It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the moral insight of passages like these, or to defend their confidence in the worth of the interior life. Thomas à Kempis had enough Christianity in his heart to believe that God is as real as the world, and that to imitate Christ is more worthy of human nature than to please ourselves. There is in all that he wrote, veiled in a rare delicacy of feeling and phrase, an invincible sternness. He knew that to obey is to renounce, and his own feet were set in "the royal road of the holy cross," per crucem ad lucem.

P.S.—If any readers have felt the fascination of the subject which has been touched upon briefly in this and a previous essay, the following books may be recommended:—"Thomas à Kempis and the Brothers of Common Life," by S. Kettlewell, a long history in two vols.; "The Story of the Imitatio Christi," by L. A. Wheatley; Dr. Biggs's introduction to his translation of the Imitatio in the series of devotional classics published by Messrs. Methuen, and the same writer's lecture on Thomas à Kempis in his recent volume, "Wayside Sketches in Ecclesiastical History."

A HYMN OF LIFE.

God! Thou hast given us life,
Life—and a work to do;
Seedground and harvest rife,
Hearts beating brave and true.

Sunlight to rule the year,
Souls that through night shine far,
Earth-sorrow, deep and dear,
Hope from an unseen star.

Holier than time or things
The Voice beyond the known,
Waking on cosmic strings
Music our inmost own.

Man has the will of God,
Child to a house of death,
Love to our low abode,
Born with immortal breath.

HEBREW RELIGION.*

THE fuller title of this book is "Hebrew Religion to the Establishment of Judaism under Ezra." Mr. Addis drops a hint of a following volume in which the story will be carried down to the Christian era. The excellence of this first portion will ensure a welcome to the second, when it shall appear. The task which Mr. Addis set himself to perform was not an easy one. It was "simply to provide the general reader with a clear statement of fact on the history of Hebrew religion, down to the middle of the fifth century B.C." But it is by no means everyone who is competent to sift out the facts of that history and present them in their natural relations. The difficulty is two-fold. There is, first of all, the legendary element which forms a background for the history; there is the result produced by the play of imagination upon tradition, whereby the original form of the event, or the original type of character, is transformed into something very different. It is often impossible to say with any certainty what, if anything, really lies behind the tradition as recorded in its latest form. The Old Testament contains plenty of material for the study of early Hebrew history, especially on its religious side. But how much of that material can be relied on as historically true, is a question which only an expert student can safely attempt to answer.

There is, further, the difficulty created by the mass of material produced by modern study of the Old Testament, the various theories as to the relation of its several parts, implying various conceptions of the history recorded there. From the old belief which frankly regarded Moses as the author of the whole of the Pentateuch, except the last few verses of Deuteronomy, and accepted Adam as a real person, to the theory which makes confusion of all previous notions of Hebrew history, and inscribes over the ruin the word "Jerahmeel," there is a very long step. And he who would present a clear statement of fact upon the history of Hebrew religion, must know his way amongst these conflicting theories. Mr. Addis modestly disclaims all originality in what he offers to the reader. It may be that he announces no new discovery of his own, nor solves any famous crux of the interpreters. But it is by no means every scholar of the Old Testament who could show such easy mastery of his subject, nor such skill in presenting it. The general reader for whom the book is intended, and who, we hope, will read it, will find in it little indication of the long and thorough study which alone has made it possible. Its style is so clear and so free from technical jargon, that it might be taken for a mere hasty sketch instead of a very carefully drawn picture, where every line means something. The general reader has probably heard something about the criticism of the Old Testament, and has got the impression that the critics are all at variance amongst themselves. If he reads his Old Testament, he has the suspicion that what he finds probably means something quite different from what it seems to mean, and was almost certainly not written by the person whose name is associated with the book in which he finds it. Mr. Addis offers him most valuable help, by putting clearly before him the generally accepted results attained by students of the Old Testament up to the present time. What strikes us most in the book is its moderation, and its saneness. There is none of that tendency, which appears in some critics, to bring down as much as they can of the Old Testament to a date after the exile. It is refreshing to find that Moses is recognised as a historical personage, and not only that, but an extremely great one, whose existence it would have been necessary to assume if no tradition about him had been handed down. Neither is there the imperious tone which bids the reader accept some startling statement on the mere word of the writer. Of course, in the small compass of this book, no detailed discussion of theories and evidence is possible, but what is said, is said so reasonably and so temperately, that the reader gains confidence in his guide as one who really knows.

Coming now to the contents of the book, we would call attention especially to the chapter on the primitive forms of Semitic religion, the general character of the worship common to all the Semitic peoples. This is very well done, and so far as we know, has never been done in popular form in any book on the Old Testament. It serves to bring out the marked individuality of the Hebrew religion, its wonderful development as a moral and spiritual religion, by contrast with the immoral and unspiritual elements from which it grew. And it is interesting to see how those primitive elements remained, as it were, embedded in the later Hebrew religion, and were either disregarded, or made to serve the purposes of a nobler faith. It is interesting, too, to note how gradual was the process of development from the lower plane to the higher, and how, while unmistakably under the control and influence of God, the changes took place in purely human ways, through agents who did not cease to be men for all that they spoke and acted "as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." The story of the Hebrew people, as it is here set forth, is convincing by reason of its naturalness; the persons described there act as real men act in common life, and are recognised to be of the same flesh and blood as ourselves. Many a reader will gain from Mr. Addis' pages a much clearer idea of what a prophet was, than he had before, and what was the part which men like Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel severally played in the development of the Hebrew religion.

The substantial excellence of Mr. Addis' book is evident to all readers who know what underlies it; and if we note one or two points which are at least open to criticism, we trust that that will not be held to diminish our cordial recognition of its merits.

Throughout the book, except in one place (p. 65), the God of the Hebrew religion is referred to by the name of Jehovah. In a note on that page it is stated that "the form of the name is not absolutely certain, but the pronunciation given in the text [viz., Yahwê] cannot be far wrong. Jehovah is certainly wrong, and has no support in antiquity." We do not understand the grounds on which Mr. Addis constantly uses the form Jehovah, if it is certainly wrong, as it undoubtedly is. The Jews have never at any time used the form Jehovah. That name is not even a Hebrew word; it is a device of the Jewish grammarians to indicate that where the name "YHVH" occurs it is to be left unread, and the word "Adonai" (Lord) read in its place. The ancient name "Yahwê" was a distinctive name, like Zou, or Chemosh, and could only serve in times when more than one deity was recognised as existing. It passed out of use when Judaism rose to the belief in one only God, when therefore distinction of deities was no longer necessary or possible. It would seem, therefore, that in "a clear statement of fact about Hebrew religion" the Deity should be referred to by the name which the Hebrews themselves used, and not by a form which only Christians could imagine possible. If it be said that the form Jehovah is consecrated by the custom of Christian devotion, then the answer is that a history of Hebrew religion is not a book of Christian devotion; and further, that a distinctive personal name for God is quite as much out of place in Christianity as in Judaism. No one now would dream of addressing a prayer to God as "Yahwê"; but the real reason for not doing so applies equally to Jehovah. And while the one is at least a real name, the other is a linguistic monstrosity.

This is really the only point on which we seriously differ from Mr. Addis; the others are of minor importance. It is stated in a note on p. 244, that "the custom of marrying a deceased brother's widow, if he died childless, had become practically obsolete long before our Lord's time. See Edersheim's Life of Jesus, II. 400." It is certainly true that some of the Rabbis in the time of Jesus, and afterwards, discouraged the practice. But they debated the subject as one of more than merely academic interest. And the editor of the Mishnah, at the end of the second century A.D., not only approved of such marriage, but in one case enjoined it. It is true that Edersheim, in the passage referred to, says he regards the story as legendary. But that is rather Edersheim's way. We see no reason whatever to doubt that the story is true.

Our last criticism we offer with some hesitation, and it refers to the occasional references to a completion in Christianity of what was imperfect in Judaism. As to the degree, and the manner, as also the fact of such fulfilment, everyone has a right to his own opinion; and we do not for a moment presume to question Mr. Addis' right to believe that "the light, faint and dim in its beginning, grew more and more till it reached the perfect day in Him who is 'Light of Light, very God of very God.'" (Pref. p. vi.). We only venture to submit that the Hebrew religion, if dealt with at all, is entitled to be judged by what it contains, and not to be depreciated for what it does not contain. If this book were written not to set forth history but to compare Judaism with Christianity, then such references would be in place; as it is, they seem to confuse the point of view from which the subject is regarded, and to add nothing to, but rather to diminish its value. It is only fair to add that such references are extremely few.

But we do not want to end on the note of fault-finding. The few points to which we have drawn attention, by way of criticism, do not prevent us from saying that the book is solid and good, and that we have gained much benefit and pleasure from reading it. We heartily commend it to the general reader, if he can be got to take the trouble to read anything about "those Jews."

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

THE July *Hibbert Journal completes the fourth volume of this "Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy." It is an admirable number, full of varied interest, with two articles of special importance, the fourth and concluding article on "The Working Faith of the Social Reformer," by Professor Henry Jones, and the article on "Japanese Character and its probable Influence outside Japan," by Professor R. H. Smith, formerly of the Imperial University, Tokyo. But first we come to the opening article by Sir Oliver Lodge on "First Principles of Faith: A Basis for Religious Teaching." It concludes with an interesting catechism, a form adopted for the sake of brevity (and not, we imagine, as being expressed in terms adapted to the minds of children), to show what are the truths which most trained teachers, irrespective of religious denomination, would now naturally, and perhaps even unconsciously, seek to impress upon their pupils. The catechism is throughout lucid in statement, except at one point near the end, in reply to the question, "What do you understand by Prayer?" where after describing prayer as "filial petition," it is added, "and we may strengthen our faith in its efficacy by pleading the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ"—and we are left wondering what Sir Oliver really means by those words. The article as a whole is a plea for the maintenance of general undenominational religious teaching in the schools. "The old attempt to partition off a region where divine action is appropriate from another region in which such action would be out of place, the old superstition that God does one thing and not another, that He speaks more directly through the thunder of catastrophe or the mystery of miracle than through the quiet voice of ordinary existence—all this is beginning to show signs of expiring in the light of a coming day. Those to whom such a change is welcome regard it as of the utmost importance that this recognition of a Deity immanent in history and in all the processes of Nature shall be guided and elevated rather than curbed and frustrated; but curbed and frustrated it would be by a legal enactment distinguishing secular from sacred, definitely forbidding the admixture, and reserving the sacred for specifically doctrinal or ecclesiastical treatment alone." (P. 725.)

Professor Henry Jones's article, of which "The Coming of Socialism" is the sub-title, should be carefully read by Individualist and Socialist alike. The exposition of the moral implications in the holding of property is of the highest value, and those especially who dread coming social changes as destructive of that which is of most worth in human life, will do well to consider what is implied in the statement "the displacement of the individual is but the first step in his re-installment," and the further assurance that "all legitimate State or civic enterprise means the organisation rather than the elimination of individual wills; and this, in turn, means not only more united action on the part of the whole, but more efficient action, a deeper individuality, on the part of the members." (P. 775.)

In many ways the changes which point to the "coming of Socialism" are teaching us how much nobler "Ours" is than "Mine," and how much richer it really makes the individual. Our immediate duty, Professor Jones points out, is to moralise our social relations as they stand, and his own fundamental faith as a social reformer is declared in these words:—"The criterion of State action is the effective freedom of its citizens. There remains in the moral life of the citizens an intensely individual element which the State must never over-ride. The rights of personality can be wisely sacrificed to nothing nor its good postponed to either city or State or humanity. But, on the other hand, the sovereignty of the individual's will and all its sacredness come from its identification with a wider will. His rights are rooted in the rights of others; and all the rights alike draw their life-sap from the moral law, the universal good, the objective rightness, of which no jot or tittle can pass away." (P. 781.)

Professor Smith has clearly had unusual opportunities of studying Japanese character, and utters a useful warning against exaggerations, both of its strength and weakness. The Japanese, he says, are "the veriest children of wild nature," but, at the same time, in decorative art and in landscape gardening stand at the head of the nations. What is said of the old Samurai chivalry should be specially noted, both of its ruthlessness and of its high standard of honour and devoted patriotism. On the subject of the low esteem in which Japanese women are said to be held, we are reminded that the Japanese mother is certainly more kindly treated than the average British wife, and that no woman in Japan was ever reduced to the utter degradation of thousands seen daily in London. In reply to the question, "May we hope for some betterment of the world through Japanese influence upon it?" Professor Smith says:—"The immediate material work of Japan for the next 100 years lies wholly in the reformation of China and the Malay Peninsula; perhaps, also, of the Philippine Islands. The whole historic genius of China being radically and essentially peaceful and condemnatory of war, and the Japanese being still intellectually, if not morally, the pupils of China, what is called the Yellow Peril, in the sense in which it is commonly understood, is a senseless bogey. But if it be taken to mean that European bullying and robbery of Eastern Asia is to be made to cease, and that the opium traffic will soon be stopped, then I, for one, rejoice at that result. This triumph for humanity is probably even now virtually won. There will certainly be an industrial struggle between East and West; but Europe must now fight fair in that struggle, and will be forced to allow it to proceed peacefully and quietly. Perhaps even the example of Japan and of a reformed China may shame our Indian Government into stopping the consumption of opium within the borders of our own Empire." (P. 819.)

To the two articles by Mr. Forsyth and Dr. Anderson we called attention in our leading article last week, and this week have referred to the article by Miss C. E. Stephen on "Signs and Wonders in Divine Guidance." Many of our readers will turn with special interest and sympathy to the article by Miss Edith Gittins on "The Suffering of the Saints," while the philosophers among them will enjoy Mr. Macgregor's article on "The Great Fallacy of Idealism," and his demonstration of how great a virtue there may be in a comma. Professor Bacon, of Yale, writing from Jerusalem, contributes an interesting article on "Gospel Types in Primitive Tradition," and Mr. H. A. Garnett "An Anglican Layman's Plain Plea for the Separation of Creeds from Worship." The repetition of the creed he declares to be contrary to the true spirit of worship. "Faithful service, according to Christ, is the measure of a faithful servant. Frequent verbal utterances of belief by him would arouse suspicion in a master. It seems strange therefore that it should be deemed acceptable to God that we should say twice daily that we believe in Him." And again, since every service begins with a solemn confession of sin, and all sin is practical unbelief, "it seems to me premature that, during the same hour of devotion, we should make an equally solemn affirmation of belief before we have had any opportunity of proving by 'a godly, righteous, and sober life,' that we do really believe in God." Another article we have read with much sympathy is that by Dr. Branstetter Gray on "Religion in Public Schools," but why does the Headmaster of Bradfield, in urging the concrete and picturesque teaching of history, speak of "Luther himself nailing his protest to the doors of a German village church"? The University Church at Wittenberg can hardly be so described.

HOWEVER great may be the difficulty of realising God, of maintaining personal relations with Him, it can be overcome through efforts that be within the power of us all, for they are spiritual efforts, and are subject to the direction of the will; not through genius, not through imagination, not through philosophic depths, but through childlike reverence for all holy impulses, through hearkening to what we all spiritually hear, and trying to discern what we all spiritually feel.—John Hamilton Thom.

OBITUARY.

MRS. JOSEPH WOOD.

MANY friends will hear with deep regret of the death of Mrs. Wood, wife of the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, which took place early on Saturday morning, July 21, whilst on her way home in the s.s. Republic, from the United States. Mr. Wood exchanged pulpits for two months with Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass., and had been absent from Birmingham for ten weeks. The sad event was announced on Sunday morning at the Old Meeting Church, and after a prayer and the singing of the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," the congregation, many of whom were much affected, dispersed. It was decided to close the church in the evening.

During the last week of her stay in America Mrs. Wood was taken seriously ill, but rallied sufficiently to justify the doctors in giving permission to start for home as had been arranged. It was thought that the sea air might possibly be helpful towards recovery. But after the vessel sailed Mrs. Wood grew rapidly worse.

The funeral took place at the Crematorium, Birmingham, on Wednesday. The Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, gave the address. Dr. Crothers offered prayer, and the Rev. C. M. Wright read the Scripture lesson. The anthem, "Crossing the Bar" was rendered by the Old Meeting Church choir.

Mrs. Wood's death was a great shock to the congregation, and to the large circle of her friends, by whom she will be greatly missed. Profound sympathy will be felt for Mr. Wood in his sorrowful home-coming.

WILLIAM COLFOX, J.P., D.L.

THE death of Mr. William Colfox removes one of our fellow-worshippers whose loss will be deeply felt, especially in the West of England, and most of all in our congregation at Bridport. In this town the family has lived for very many generations; the fine old borough records preserve traces of the name as far back as the time of Edward I., and when, some years ago, the bells of the parish church were taken down to be recast, the name William Colfox was found on one of them. Naturally, the owner of the name was asked if he would represent his probable ancestor, and with genuine pleasure this was done, Mr. Colfox defraying the expense of the recasting and providing a suitable inscription. During the early part of the last century the family were engaged in a wool business, and a story, told comparatively recently, indicates a strong hereditary characteristic. A local tanner related how the inspector of weights and scales had just been round and had pronounced his scales the best he had ever seen. "And these scales," said the narrator, "I bought many years ago from the Colfox warehouse." William Colfox was the younger brother of Thomas Colfox, and both were sons of William Colfox, of Rax House, and grandsons of Thomas Collins Colfox, one of the sturdiest upholders of the name Unitarian at a time when it was subject to more obliquity than now. He was responsible for placing the word on the porch of the chapel, the earlier name having been "The Old Meeting," and he left to his descendants an earnest attachment to the cause, along with considerable doubt whether this particular application of the name was justifiable.

William, the subject of the present notice, was born May 4, 1826, and had therefore completed eighty years when he died July 18, 1906. He had his schooling partly under the tuition of the Rev. Philip Harwood, minister at Bridport, partly at Dr. Wreford's school at Bristol. Then he went to University College, London, and graduated B.A. at the University. A picnic to Stonehenge led to weighty consequence, and perhaps the most important event in his life occurred in 1855, when he and his brother Thomas married two sisters of the family of Wansey, who had long been the main support and ultimately were the sole survivors of our little congregation at Warminster. Let it be remembered to the credit of these smaller congregations, which one by one become extinct, that during the days of their struggle they produce very precious types of character.

On his marriage Mr. Colfox settled first in West-street, but soon moved to a house just outside Bridport, known as Westmead, which had belonged to his aunt, Mrs. Lee. This was ever after his home, the house which was destroyed by fire in 1897, being rebuilt, with enlargements, on the old foundation. His family consists of two daughters, Miss A. L. Colfox and Mrs. Oliver Lupton, and one son, Mr. T. A. Colfox.

Mr. Colfox's interest in the town of Bridport was keen and helpful. He was one of the original directors of the Bridport Railway, and one of the Harbour Commissioners. The Burial Board, the Cottage Hospital, and the Public Baths, owed him obligations second to none. And it meant much in every way when he was willing to take a leading part in furthering some good object. The family scrupulousness, which had provided the extra good scales for business, took the form with him of a conscientiousness which was not easily satisfied. Never was there a man who took more pains to be absolutely just and fair, and it cost him much before he would take decisive action. He seldom acted independently of others. He desired the support of their co-operation; but, when he joined, his support made all the difference. Both he and his brother were much interested in archaeology, and the Dorset Field Club and County Museum, and the Bridport Literary and Scientific Institute reckoned him among their ablest supporters. He was also much interested in the Dorset dialect, and to hear him read aloud the poems of William Barnes was a treat almost unique in its delicacy of intonation and expression. He was appointed to the County bench in 1879 and was a regular attendant at Quarter Sessions, and, more recently, was a member of the Standing Joint Committee. In 1899 he was High Sheriff of the county, and was also made a Deputy-Lieutenant.

In politics, Mr. Colfox was a strong Liberal-Unionist, and one of the last occasions when he left his house was to vote for the Conservative candidate at the recent election.

All his life he was a most regular worshipper at the chapel until illness confined him to his home. In earlier days he was also an earnest worker. Two of his services deserve special commemoration. For many years he was a Sunday-school teacher, and, together with his brother Thomas, taught a large class of young men. Most of these are scattered and gone, but some remain in Bridport, and the foremost thought in their minds as they gathered for the funeral, was of the teacher in whose class they had received deep and lasting lessons.

The other service was rendered during the many years when he was chapel warden. The pains he took in collecting the numerous small subscriptions of the poorer members of the congregation was probably unique for a man in his position. He knew the value of these smaller sums for maintaining an independent spirit and a widespread interest, and was rewarded for his trouble by the length of the list of names on the roll.

For the last two years illness confined him almost entirely to his home, but the previous six years were particularly full of helpful activities in which he found much happiness. He was President of Manchester College, Oxford, for three years, 1900-1903, and the Committee greatly valued the geniality and courtesy with which he presided over their meetings. Other positions of leadership in our body he many times declined, for he was slow to believe how much he could do in such a capacity. But wherever our co-religionists were striving zealously to meet their difficulties they had his practical sympathy, and he was one of a small group of men who make it possible for us to maintain our associations and carry on the work we do as an organised branch of the Church of Christ.

The funeral took place on Saturday, July 21, and was marked by the perfect simplicity which he desired. But some 400 friends were gathered around the graveside, and these included many who had come considerable distances, his fellow-magistrates, a large deputation of the police, eight Church clergymen, members of the Corporation, his tenant farmers, and, of course, inhabitants of the town and members of his own congregation. The bearers were his fellow-teachers and old scholars. The chapel choir led the singing of two hymns, otherwise the service followed the usual order. The next day a memorial service was held in the chapel, where the communion table was beautifully decorated with flowers. The hymn beginning "The Lord is just" had been specially selected by Mrs. Colfox for the occasion, and preceded the sermon from the texts, "The memory of the just is blessed" and "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God." The preacher referred to the scrupulous conscientiousness which was the foundation virtue in the character of Mr. Colfox, to the kindness which his personal sympathy and knowledge made so valuable, and to his simplicity of life; and concluded "Would there were more like him! England would be a different country if her men of wealth took pains as he did to be just; if they were always kind and courteous as he; and if they found their happiness in a simplicity of life which values things at their real worth, and therefore sought to walk humbly with their God. These are the characteristics which we recall to-day. In them shall his memory be blessed."

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XI.—DOGMA AND TRADITION.

In the stricter sense of the word, dogma is authoritative statement of that which is to be believed. In this form it may reasonably be resisted. But dogma, in a looser sense, is the positive statement of unhesitating though undemonstrable belief. When, in the Fourth Gospel, it is said, "We speak that we do know, and bear witness of that we have seen," a dogmatic statement is made, for that which is spoken of is the unseen action of the Spirit of God in a man's heart; the knowledge claimed is the knowledge of intuition, the witness borne is the witness of experience; and outward proof is in such case impossible. But assertion without proof is dogma.

There are those who would have religion without dogma, and think that they find it in the Lord's Prayer. But the two first words of the Lord's Prayer are as strongly dogmatic as words can be. They involve three affirmations—that God is, that He is Father, that He is our Father. Not one of these affirmations can be proved to demonstration; the Fatherhood of God, stated positively, is dogma. The first sentence on the first page of the Bible is also a dogmatic statement.

It is no answer to ecclesiastical dogma to scoff at it. That which is said with conviction easily becomes a dictum, and a dictum widely accepted easily passes into enactment. Ecclesiastical authority, in its origin, seems to have been the blending of the power of the State with the teaching of the schools; and obedience to it the blending of the submission of the citizen with the assent of the disciple. Great is the power of settled opinion, and so long as infallibility is claimed for the Living Voice by one section of Christendom, and for the Written Word by another, so long will religious dogma continue to justify itself in the face of contradiction. It is for those who are opposed to the dogmatism of unproved assertion to take care to avoid the harder dogmatism of unproved denial.

Tradition is a word dear to many who have no liking for dogma. But the woven web of custom may in effect be quite as binding as the iron fetters of authority. An unwritten law of conformity to type may become in time as grievous a yoke as written articles of belief. Nor should it be forgotten that disbelief also is sometimes only traditional—something which has come to us by unthinking habit, rather than something at which we have consciously arrived.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

MISS RAWLINS lately wrote to you about the King of Norway, who was crowned at Trondhjem on June 22. Well, after a beautiful sail, first from Odde to Bergen, and then in and out of nearly all the fjords between that and Trondhjem, we arrived there a few days before the coronation. The people were very busy decorating the town. It is a good-sized town, with all the houses built of wood; some are coloured and some white, and the streets are wide, with trees growing in some of them, and there are gay shops, and a busy market with stalls under awnings or wooden roofs. Men were putting up great flagstuffs along both sides of the streets, and festoons of flags fluttered between these, all up the streets; and the fronts of the houses were decorated with coloured cloths and flags and wreaths.

Some distance up the town from the harbour stands the beautiful cathedral, where the coronation was to take place. It stands in the midst of a pretty garden with large trees, and under the trees is the graveyard. The little mounds that cover the graves are quite small, and there are flowers growing all about, and seats beside the graves; and the stones with the names on them are usually only just small slabs of white marble, about the size of a school slate, set up sloping as you might set a photograph on a table.

The cathedral is very beautiful and stately; part of it which was ruined is being rebuilt, but it was not finished, so they put a canvas roof on that part, and let it be used at the coronation time. We were not allowed to go inside the cathedral on that visit, as they were so busy decorating it; but when we came back there again a few days after the coronation we went in. Crowds of the country people were flocking in to see the decorations, and how it had all looked when their new King and Queen were crowned there; and lots of little children came too. Seats had been arranged all along the sides of the cathedral, in many rows, and a wooden floor had been raised above the stone one up the middle of the church, all the way to the altar steps, so that the King and Queen and all the procession could be seen by everyone as they walked to the altar. In front of the altar was a row of velvet chairs, where the Royal party must have sat, and a place in front of these where I think the King and Queen knelt during part of the service. There were banners and coloured hangings all about, and the beautiful church looked very festive; and on the pair of crimson and gold doors by which the King and Queen had entered were gold letters H. & M., for "Haakon" and "Maud." I am afraid they had not a very fine day, for we heard that it had rained. In almost every shop window were prints of the King and Queen and their little boy, surrounded with Norwegian flags. Afterwards, when we were in the harbour at Bergen, on June 30, we were almost deafened by the firing of cannon shots close to where our steamer lay, and we heard that it was in honour of the little Crown Prince whose birthday it was, and he was four years old.

Well, after Trondhjem, one thing we did was to cross the wide sea called the Vestfjord to the Lofoten islands: We stayed at a curious little town built on an island; the little wooden houses were red, and yellow, and green, and white, and most of them stood on little legs of wood or stone so as to be open underneath; and around, and in and out, came the sea with its rising and falling tide; and above the town towered immense steep mountains, some rocky with grass and ferns, and some with great fields of snow upon them: The broad-faced, blue-eyed children crowded round us as we sat to sketch, and sometimes a little hand held out an offering of wild flowers; but they were very well behaved, and very much interested in our drawings, which they seemed to understand better than English country children do; and even the smallest understood that they must go behind us and not in front. Pretty goats and dear little kids came too, bleating round us, and it was pretty to see the kids and the children romping together. The Norwegians are very kind to their animals; and goats and kids, sheep and cows, all follow their owners, instead of being driven by them.

One thing we did in these far-away islands which was very delightful. We went for two days and nights round amongst a number of the islands in a coasting steamer, calling at about thirty different places. We came to little villages with perhaps only half-a-dozen little scattered wooden houses—red and yellow, and pink and white houses—as we turned round some promontory into a beautiful calm bay; great hills and peaked blue mountains with snow on them rising behind or round the bays. Our steamer blew her steam-whistle to give notice of our coming, and off from the shore came a big fishing boat with a high prow, often full of peasants and of great boxes of salmon packed in ice, which had to be taken on board by a crane and put into the hold: Our steamer had all sorts of things on board: five large new boats, which we delivered at different places; a cart, tables, chairs, chests of drawers, cradles, and all sorts of baskets, pots and pans, &c., and crowds of people.

All through the night as well as the day, these calls went on, for it was broad daylight, with the sun shining all the time; and, night or day, the boats and people were always ready. And then the boat slipped back silently over the quiet water to the village, often taking people from our steamer ashore, as well as bringing some to the steamer; and we steamed off to go on to the next place.

One night, at midnight, we saw the sun quite high above the horizon, through a gap between the islands, pouring a splendid flood of golden light across the water, and gilding the mountains with a wonderful glory. Was it any wonder that it seemed impossible to creep down into our narrow beds below?

And in many such wonderful ways our time in wonderful Norway passed; and then again we crossed the Vestfjord, seeing our islands gradually vanishing and being wrapped in mist, above which their rocky and snowy peaks peeped out as if to wish us farewell. And southward we came again by Trondhjem and Bergen, and then made straight for England, and our glorious trip was over. And so farewell to Norway.

THE REALITY OF GRACE.

THERE is another article in the new number of the Hibbert Journal, besides the two of which we spoke in last week's leading article, that may help us on the way to a deep conviction of the "reality of grace," to that "soul-certainty" which we all desire, of our life held secure in the abiding love of God. It is the substance of an address given to the Sunday Society at Newnham College, by Miss CAROLINE E. STEPHEN, on "Signs and Wonders in Divine Guidance." Many of our readers will remember Miss STEPHEN'S "Quaker Strongholds," and will welcome any fresh word from her.

"As far as we can have any knowledge of the unseen world of spiritual existence," Miss STEPHEN says, "so far, I believe, do we find the old distinctions between good and evil, weighty and trivial, clean and unclean, holy and unholy, helpful and harmful, and so on, running through everything. In the invisible as well as in common daylight we need the exercise of spiritual discernment, and the deeper and more central the power, the more essential is a 'single eye' in meeting or in wielding it. That single eye can, I believe, be preserved only through obedience to the innermost and central light which shines through conscience, through a resolute 'seeking first the kingdom of God and His righteousness.' But ample experience proves that in that search we are often aided and prompted by impulses springing from depths we cannot fathom—nay, I believe that it is in obedience to such impulses that the greatest heights of spiritual life and blessing have been attained. Who can fathom the sources of inspiration, and who will dare to say that we could afford to forego them?"

* * * *

"My own belief, then, is that it is right and reasonable for us to expect that we should be able to hold some immediate communication with the Father of our spirits; that He in whom we live and move and have our being does in fact exercise in various ways some degree of guidance towards all His creatures; a guidance which, as we have faith and patience and courage to yield ourselves to it, becomes more and more perceptible and clear and satisfying, until at last life may be altogether transfigured by it." (P. 867.)

Those are quiet words of one who knows the reality of grace, and there are more, which we must not quote, concerning the way in which a man may learn in very truth to "walk with God," and be aware with a great gladness of the Divine presence in his life; and also concerning wise precautions to be taken as correctives to self-importance and self-deception.

But what we are most concerned here to point out is, that the beginnings of this true life of communion with the Highest are in the simple things of daily duty. A child may begin to walk in the way of obedience at the word of another, and may not know at first that it is God's way. But there comes a time when a man chooses for himself to do a thing, or to suffer, simply because it is right, and in that self-determined act of obedience then and there gets a hold upon the unseen things which are eternal. The joy of that doing of the right, the sense of fearless and rejoicing strength in it, is a touch of the Divine grace in his life, God with him. It is his first step in the true life with God, and he is happy who comes to understand the full meaning of it. His part and God's part, if he is wise, he will not seek to separate. The great fact is, that he is not alone, he has become aware of the deeper meaning of his life, and that there is Another who cares. Those who have the true insight help others to understand. Those who have taken the first steps in the onward way, tell the others that they also must begin. Their example kindles the desire of others, or puts to shame their disobedient and rebellious will. Loving sympathy will reach out a hand to those who find it hard to begin. He who helps us most to understand, and has kindled the most steadfast flame of aspiration and desire in the hearts of his brethren, is JESUS of Nazareth, who said: "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." "Not everyone that saith unto me, LORD, LORD, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL FROM THE SCHOLAR'S STANDPOINT.*

II.

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

Now, omitting many details, I want to state, if I can, what seems to me to be the root of the whole matter as regards the Sunday-school from the scholar's standpoint. I am thinking not of an abstract principle, but of concrete cases, when I say that, from the standpoint of the scholar, the Sunday-school is, first of all, an effective socialiser of his otherwise too individualistic nature; it is also a practical revealer to him of many right and dutiful relationships which should exist between him and his fellows, between him and the Christian Church, between him and the human life outside, and between him and the Higher Life in greater men and in God; moreover, the school is so suitable an environment to his social, mental, civic, moral, and spiritual nature that, if he only has "the will to respond" to the environment, the school will exercise, and thus unfold for him, some of the best possibilities of his character. It is difficult to put what I mean into a sentence, or even into simple language, but all that I have just tried to say, I have seen exemplified—have not you seen exemplified?—are we not seeing it every day?—in scores upon scores of scholars in our Sunday-schools? I am thinking of young men and young women who have grown up in the Sunday-school, whose natures responded to its instructions and influences, and who therefore, at this moment, are among the best characters one knows. Nay, more, if one looks at older men and women one finds, in Sunday-school districts, that some of the best and most honoured workers, not only in our Sunday-schools and churches, but on Friendly and other societies, on educational and philanthropic committees, in social and recreative movements, on municipal and other councils, received the impulse in the Sunday-school towards these good and useful things, and also learnt therein the art, the happiness, and the duty of associative life. That grand old man of America, Edward Everett Hale, whose "Harry Wadsworth" mottoes have inspired so many millions "to look up and not down; to look forward and not back; to look out and not in; and to lend a hand," has also told us, later, that the lesson for the world now to learn is included in the word Together—the lesson of "Togetherness." And, in George W. Cable's story of "Bonaventure," the charmingly sagacious old curé tries to give a hint of this to the rather self-centred nature of a little boy whom he loves, and who loves him. They were in a South American garden; the little self-assertive boy in a wilful mood was being let alone a bit, while his good tutor sat under a tree playing Solitaire and thinking. By and by, the kindly old curé calls the boy and says: "Bonaventure, I have a riddle for you. It came to me as I was playing Solitaire just now. It is this: If everybody could do just as he pleases; if he had, as the governor would say, all his rights—life, liberty, pursuit of happiness—if everybody had this, I say why should we still be unhappy?"

The boy was silent.

"Well, I did not suppose you would know. Would you like me to tell you? It is because happiness pursued is never overtaken . . . But would you like to do something for me?"

The boy nodded.

"Here, sit down in my place, and write in my pocket-book what I tell you, while I walk about and stretch my legs. So; never mind whether you understand or not. I am saying it for myself; it helps me to understand it better. Now, as I walk, you write: 'Happiness pursued is never overtaken, because'—have you written that?—'because, little as we are, God's image makes us so large that we cannot live within ourselves, nor ever for ourselves, and be satisfied.' Have you got that down? Very well—yes—the spelling could be improved, but that is no matter. Now wait a moment; let me walk some more. Now write: 'It is not good for man to be alone, because—because—' let me see: where? ah yes!—'because, rightly, self is the'—ah, no, no, boy; not a capital S for self—ah! that's the very point—small s—'because, rightly, self is the smallest part of us. Even God found it good not to be alone, but to create'—got that?—'to create objects for His love and benevolence.' Yes—'And because, in my poor, small way, I am made like Him, the whole world becomes a part of me'—small m—yes, that is right! My boy," proceeded the curé, "God is a very practical God—no, you needn't write it; just listen a moment. Yes; and so, when He gave us natures like his, He gave men not wives only, but brethren and sisters and companions and strangers, in order that benevolence, yes, and even self-sacrifice—mistakenly so called—might have no lack of direction and occupation; and then He bound the whole human family together, by putting everyone's happiness into someone else's hands. I see you do not understand; never mind; it will come to you, little by little. It was a long time coming to me."

Yes, but it is just something of this which does come even to the average scholar in the Sunday-school—and much more to those other scholars, not a few, who by nature or nurture rise above the average. As, perhaps, I may express it, the Sunday-school has so schooled them, or rather the Sunday-school has enabled them themselves so to school those elements in their character which have fitted them to link their otherwise poor little thoughts to the larger thoughts of man; to link their otherwise feeble individual efforts at well-doing to the united service of humanity; and to put their otherwise rather puny personal life into the great Fellowship of Mankind and of Him in whom all mankind lives and moves and has its being.

Many illustrations will easily occur to all your minds as to how the Sunday-school you know has done this, in varied manner, and in various degrees, for some of its scholars, not only by its lessons, discipline, and direct aims, but quite as much by the comradeships for life it often gives; by the undying friendships it not seldom affords; by the sense of duty it tends to cultivate; by the co-operation in unselfish work which it certainly practises; by the ideals of character which it holds forth; and by the reverences for sacred things which it seeks to foster. Actual proofs of these effects of the Sunday-school upon many a scholar I need not offer in your presence. Three interesting facts I may usefully mention. (1) In a certain Sunday-school, the young men have, on the wall of their class-room, a fine large picture of Hoffman's Christ—the manliest figure of Christ I know—and, in certain spaces underneath the picture, they record in order the name of each member of the class who dies. Thus, as they look at the picture on any Sunday, they are reminded of their comradeship—that they are linked together—the living and the dead—and all linked on to Him who reached man's highest ideal. (2) A body of such young men once came to their minister and said: "We have received so much good ourselves, we want to do some similar good to others. There are many poor people about here who never get a service, and we think we could give them one, in their own homes with a few neighbours; may we go?" And the minister said: "Go, and God bless you!" And they went. And God did bless! That was what the Sunday-school had done for them. (3) Some sixty young people last winter read Robert Elsmere—about forty of them made a real study of it, meeting fortnightly with their minister, and fairly thoroughly discussing the theological and religious bearings of the questions arising out of that book. They did the reading at home. This was the minister's way of exercising these young people's minds, and of enabling them to come to some decision as to their own religious needs and duties. To his great surprise but still greater joy, at the close of the winter season, twenty-six of these young people came forward and desired to become members of the congregation. They entered into their membership on Easter Sunday.

Who, then, can measure the value of the Sunday-school from the standpoint of such as these?

Let me now conclude by citing to you a little dialogue which once took place between a wise old teacher and a disheartened young teacher. I should say that he had previously been a boy in the old teacher's class—and a rather "lively" one, at times! But for some while now he had been a teacher, and had somehow perhaps, forgotten the scholar's standpoint. So he was in the "blues," which the genial heart of the wise old teacher sought to remove.*

THE DIALOGUE.

Don't you think you are disheartened because you expect too much?

But I don't expect too much. If I spend my time, and take no end of trouble to teach these boys, Sunday after Sunday, the least they can do is to attend to what I say, and behave themselves. I call them downright ungrateful!

And yet the Association's visitor was struck with their attention, and praised you, to me, as a most promising teacher!

* The following dialogue is by the late Richard Pileher, and is reprinted, with some slight alterations, from the Sunday School Helper of April, 1886.

No! you don't say so? I'm glad to hear it. It's a crumb of encouragement.

I should call it a good thick slice! And so would you at another time! My dear fellow, do be more reasonable! Now, look here! let me put it to you as it seems to me.

Oh! you always get round a fellow so.

Not when he's on the square! Tell me! do you not spend your time Sunday after Sunday, because you have a deep sense of the good which knowledge and kindly influence have been to you, and you want to pay back some little of the debt, if I may so say, by teaching your lads?

Yes (hesitatingly, then more readily), yes! I suppose that is about it! But I should never have thought of putting it in that way!

Nevertheless, is it not the true way?

Well! yes! it is.

You and I know well that knowledge is a "possession for ever," whatever be the subject we have on hand. You and I know that if knowledge is not exactly power, it is that which enables us to use power and direct it aright. Come now! Has it not lifted us up on to a distinctly higher level of thought and feeling, and would we go back to the time before we had it, for any money?

No, that I am sure we would not! what then?

Surely, it is just this strong sense we have of its value that has kept us up, and still keeps us up to the mark; so that ease and comfort and leisure and so forth have been as nothing in our eyes, in our struggles to get knowledge.

Ah, I wish I could claim half the fine things you want to credit me with!

We won't stay to discuss the much or the little. You have felt something of what I have just said! I know you have, for I have watched you as anxiously as I have watched myself.

We have always been good friends.

And always shall be, I hope and believe. Now, I suppose you will admit that if you had not this deep sense of the value of knowledge, you would have had still less to show!

There is no doubt about that!

And yet you wonder at your lads, who cannot possibly have any such idea of the beauty of knowledge, or any such sense of its value to them in afterdays; you wonder at them, I say, because they sometimes flag in its pursuit, and cannot always keep up their interest in its drier details and harder grind.

You always side with the lads, as you call them.

No! not always! but, I own, very often I do, because I was once a lad myself. It was a long time ago, no doubt, but I have not forgotten how puzzled I used to be at the continual grind. You remember the story of the little boy who learned the alphabet, and remarked that it was going though a great deal for very little. Do you know I rather sympathise with that lad!

Ridiculous! I do hate to be put off with a joke. I'm in dead earnest, I am!

So am I! But a joke will, sometimes, help truth amazingly! Put yourself in the place of your lads, and try to look at things from their point of view. They are either at work or at school from Monday to Saturday. If they are at school, they have had a surfeit of learning, and hate it for the time being. If they are at work, they have forgotten much, and so, recovering it is doubly irksome, especially when they find that the little they remember is not often needed in their daily round. I'm not overstating my case? Am I?

No! there's a method in your madness so far! go on!

They have comrades they love, "pals," I dare say they call them. These go off on Sundays for long walks into the country, which your lads would dearly like to join. Every day seems to free our scholars from some control of either father or mother. Yet they come to school regularly—I must say that your class does you credit in that respect—they come Sunday after Sunday. You do not imagine that a day's outing in the summer, and a tea party at Christmas, will explain their coming regularly all the year round?

Well! no, I suppose not.

Then surely they must share some little in your respect for learning, and must have some idea of its value, or they would soon drop away. I don't think we older ones give the youngsters all the credit they deserve. Do you know, I positively grudge coming to school on a fine hot summer's day.

So do I, for that matter!

How much more must they then, undisciplined as they are, when compared with us? I tell you, my friend, that when I see my young men coming every Sunday, and call to mind all the ease and pleasure they forego, I feel that they deserve far more honour than I do, for they cannot know, as I do, all that is at stake.

Well! I must say that there is a good deal in what you say.

Oh! you regular John Bull you! I would not give in all at once, if I were you. I tell you again, that when I think of the sweets of liberty, the enticements of companions, the little force our counter attractions must have in comparison, owing to our scholars not being able to grasp the full value of what we give them; when I remember all this, I wonder, not that so few, but that so many scholars come to us, and come so regularly.

You're turning the tables on me with a vengeance!

Yes, and I'm going to turn them still more! What, then, brings them; after all, seeing that their sympathy with our aims is of necessity so weak?

I'm sure I don't know, since you put it in that way.

Ah! but I know! it is partly yourself! They may talk to each other in class, and exchange curiosities of the most wonderful simpleness. They may suck toffee, and give each other sweets. They may even laugh and be inattentive. I doubt not they are all that, at times. Lads are queer inventions. The best you can say for them is that, give them time, and they will grow up into men! But, depend upon it, they have a sneaking kindness for their teacher, underneath it all!

I wish I could think that!

Would they come at all if they had not. Would you in their place?

No-o-o, I suppose not.

Then "think that." Believe it! Trust them. Do not expect too much. Try them again. Do not let them see that you are vexed, it only tempts them into fresh unruliness. Do you remember how it was we first came together?

Do I? Don't I? I am fit to thrash myself every time I call it to mind. You had wonderful patience with me, and I have often wondered why.

"And Jesus looked upon him and loved him," said the wise old teacher, as he turned away, gently pinching the younger one's ear as a parting salute. Friend! follow the Master. Trust Love! and Love will see you through!

WORDSWORTH.

THE GREAT YEARS OF SONG.

WE may date them roughly from the year which produced the Lines composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey, July 13, 1798, to the year in which the Ode on Intimations of Immortality was finished, 1806. Very little of Wordsworth at his best belongs to any earlier time, and very little of Wordsworth at his worst occurs during those few vigorous years. A few great things occur later—some books of the Excursion; the White Doe of Rylstone; that fine sonnet, The Power of Armies is a Visible Thing; the beautiful stanzas To a Skylark, and some others. But it will generally be conceded—and it is surely very significant—that this poet, who lived to be eighty, and who continued to compose verses till within three years of his death, achieved nearly all the work whereby he is great within a period of eight or ten years.

But the calmness, or, as we may call it, the comparative dulness of the last forty years, should seem no longer strange to us when we consider the passionate intensity and vigour of the earlier time. For the boyhood and youth of Wordsworth, through which he was disciplined for the achievement of his golden prime, were full of an extraordinary eagerness and ardour of spirit. In the long school time at Hawkshead, besides the keen excitement of boyish games and sports, he knew that strange inward disturbance of mind which a feeling for Nature, at once realistic and mystical, tends to produce, but which is so rare in early life. Visitings from that mysterious realm which, he tells us, was even then so much more real to him than outward and visible things, created emotional excitements very difficult to understand or control. He lived these two lives—the life of vigorous animal activity, and the life of keen spiritual interest—with almost equal intensity. Nature touched him—took hold of him through her "forms and images," with a resistless power of enchantment; spake to him "rememberable things," disciplined his mind "by beauty and by fear"; "all my thoughts were steeped in feeling";—"even then I felt gleams like the flashing of a shield." The "presences of Nature," the "visions of the hills," the "souls of lonely places" haunted him "among his boyish sports":

"Impressed upon all forms the characters Of danger and desire; and thus did make The surface of the universal earth With triumph and delight, with hope and fear, Work like a sea."

His three years at Cambridge were probably the least exciting time of his early life.

His lonely communings with nature and his own heart, had given him a strength of independence and self-mastery which the new conditions assailed, for the most part, in vain. He looked upon those rather tame studies, and all the turbulence of university life, with somewhat of indifference, if not disdain. Nothing appealed very strongly to him. "I was not for that hour nor for that place." Life there was not very real, and human beings lacked substantiality, like forms in a vision. "I was the dreamer, they the dream." Rambles abroad and visits to familiar scenes and people among his native dales, in vacation times, were more to him, even as education, than the routine or the rowdiness of college days. London, where he spent his twenty-first year, does not seem to have moved him deeply—did not arouse his human sympathies in their strength; it was the twelve months in France which did that. He came back from Paris, at the end of 1792, a fully awakened man, a "Republican," a "Patriot of the World," to use his own definition of himself. He came back to England a political enthusiast, full of fire for the people's cause, but also full of doubts, which, as he was compelled to inaction, turned to bitterness and despair. A foiled revolutionist, a moral sceptic, he seeks, long time in vain, for any foothold in the world, or any outlook for himself as an actor there.

When at last peace returns to him, won through that long strife, and the clear vision of what his work must be shines full upon him, he is no longer young. His years are only twenty-five, but they have been intense and passionate years. Emotionally, his life has been a strenuous one, and though, except in the last four years, it was excess of joy that most disturbed him, this may not mean that the strenuousness was less exhausting. It is probable that joy, when passionate and deep, and felt, for the most part, as with Wordsworth, in solitude, is even more exhausting to genius than pain. A significant contrast is presented to us in the discipline through which the poetic powers of Wordsworth were perfected and that through which Shelley's were called forth. Both lived, from childhood, an intense and eager soul-life; but the latter knew little of joy; by "wrong" and "suffering" he was "cradled into poetry." How strikingly different, again, is the experience of both these poets from the leisurely way in which, for example, Tennyson and Browning climbed the heights, reserving their strength, and so retaining it almost to the end of a long life.

It is not strange, then, that Wordsworth's inspiration remained to him, in its fulness of power, but a few short years. But what glorious years they were! What riches of human experience and insight they enshrine! Nature and Man are his themes—the mystery and loveliness of Nature, the depth and grandeur and inexhaustible interest of the mind of Man. We have missed so much by thinking of Wordsworth as exclusively or even chiefly the poet of Nature. Nature, he has told us, was all in all to him, in boyhood and early youth. But he was wrong even there; his own records of that time, as given in the opening books of the Prelude, prove him wrong. His love for his old schoolmaster, his interest in some of the boys with whom he roamed the woods and hills and lake shores near Hawkshead, above all—his tender affection for the old dame, who mothered him there, are proofs of the "human-heartedness" that was ever native to him. The opening pages of the fourth book of the Prelude, which tell of his return to Anne Tyson's cottage, in his first college vacation, reveal a tenderness and reverence of heart for that good creature hardly surpassed by any ordinary boy's feeling for his own mother. Yet, doubtless, Nature was supreme in his thoughts, and held him, by the enchantment of her sights and sounds, through those early years. Then, as he comes to know more of the lives of the dalesmen who dwelt among his native hills, the interest in man deepens and grows strong. He becomes more fully conscious of a "human-heartedness" about his love. But it is love for man as seen in close relation with Nature, not as he saw him in Cambridge or in London.

"For me, when my affections first were led From kindred, friends and playmates, to partake

Love for the human creature's absolute self,

That noticeable kindliness of heart

Sprang out of fountains, there abounding most,

Where sovereign Nature dictated the tasks
And occupations which her beauty adorned,
And shepherds were the men that pleased me first."

But it was sympathy with the great struggle for liberty in France that awoke the passion of humanity within him, made him a "patriot of the world," and made the love of man to be a mightier influence in his life than love of Nature. And in the calm of spirit which follows those tumultuous times he is able to perceive the unity and harmony of man with Nature. Henceforth nothing shall be "common or unclean" to him—or rather the common is found to be charged with great meanings for the eye that sees in love. Henceforth the lowly interests of human life, the joys and sorrows of mankind, set against the solemn background of Nature—"man suffering amid awful forms"—will afford material and inspiration for his song. Henceforth he must live to "chant the sponsal verse of that great consummation," when all shall enter into the fellowship of these and find the peace which he has found.

In the Lyrical Ballads, which appeared in the autumn of 1798, Wordsworth has one supremely great poem, and in that poem the full clear note of all the best work to follow is heard, perhaps for the first time, in its strength. In the Lines composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey we meet the poet who has now returned to his first love, but who is conscious of another love which, however it has chastened, has in no sense lessened the first. The world has widened to his vision; his own heart has been enlarged by sympathy and sorrow. And as he stands there, on the banks of the Wye, and looks again on that fair scene which he had beheld five summers before in such different mood, he is aware of some great loss, but also of greater gain:

"For I have learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth; but hearing often—times

The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh nor grating, but with ample power

To chasten and subdue."

And, in the few great years that are to follow, it is this "music of humanity" that will be heard beating through all his nobler verse—sometimes "still and sad," but sometimes exultant with joy. And though Nature is still his solace and support,

"The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,

The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul

Of all my moral being,"

this is because he has felt a Presence which is not only there, but in all human life—whose dwelling is the "light of setting suns," but also "in the mind of man."

And when, nearly seven years later, the long poem, which tells the story of his experience from childhood to middle life, comes to an end, its closing lines proclaim his faith that the mind of man may become "A thousand times more beautiful than the earth

On which he dwells, above this frame of things

In beauty exalted, as it is itself
Of quality and fabric more divine."

It is not possible to express in words the secret of a great poet's power over us. But no one who walks much with Wordsworth can doubt that he had an intense feeling for the ideal life towards which man must aspire, and yet also a passionate appreciation of the actual everyday life which he saw men living—which he lived himself. He believes in a golden age that is to be; he prays that his own life may "Express the image of a better time,

More wise desires, and simpler manners." Yet this present time is also good, and the people he meets on the common road are full of interest. A homely tale of suffering or of brave endurance, an incident of simple country life, the faith or fancy of a child, the death of an old pauper, the gratitude of an old huntsman, the song of a Highland lass at her reaping, the sight of an aged beggar on the road—these things, as well as the Simplon Pass or the vision of London in the dawn of an autumn morning, have for him strange, deep meanings, and kindle his soul into impassioned poetic utterance.

The Ideal that was ever with him—an impassioned hope, a "faith sublimed to ecstasy"—did not blind him to the significance or the charm of the real. He tells us that in his dark days of unrest and revolt he had thought to sever the future from the past, that a new race would arise unrelated to such mean and paltry beings as hitherto had lived on earth:

"Dare I avow that wish was mine to see,
And hope that future times would surely see,

The man to come parted, as by a gulph,
From him who had been."

But now, so deeply is the ideal enshrined within the actual, so vital is the unity of all in the living present, that he needs to speak "Of nothing more than what we are," in order to "arouse the sensual from their sleep," or "win the vacant and the vain to noble raptures."

When he is recovering from the confusion and despair of those dark years I spoke of, and peace of mind comes back, it is not through any surrender of ideal hopes, but through seeing them in "true proportion"—in their relation to that which is to-day:

"I sought
For present good in life's familiar face,
And built thereon my hopes of good to come."

Here is the clue to the secret of Wordsworth's power. He reveals it to us there, as clearly as words can, in the last three books of the Prelude. It has been given him to see "among least things an under-sense of greatest." He has found "high service" wrought "when all the external man is rude in show"; and he will speak of life as he has found it thus:

"Making verse
Deal boldly with substantial things; in truth

And sanctity of passion, speak of these,
That justice may be done, obeisance paid
Where it is due: thus haply shall I teach,
Inspire; through unadulterated ears Pour rapture, tenderness, and hope—my theme

No other than the very heart of man,
As found among the best of those who live
In Nature's presence: thence may I select Sorrow that is not sorrow, but delight;
And miserable love that is not pain
To hear of, for the glory that redounds
Thencefrom to human kind.

It shall be my pride
That I have dared to tread this holyground,
Speaking no dream, but things oracular."

Again and again, in returning to Wordsworth, I have been amazed to find what sources of fresh strength are in him, what living fountains of peace and gladness seem to flow from his heart. I think that the secret of that strength lies in his firm hold of the actual, whilst never losing sight of the ideal. He ceased not, in an age of reaction and political aridness, to hope for the good glad day, when man should be at one with Nature and with his fellow and with himself. Yet he had learned that not by ignoring, but accepting the facts of the present, and working through them to the ideal of the future, progress toward that future must be made, and the beauty and joy which the present enshrines realised to the full. And obvious as this may be to us now, he was not wrong in thinking that he had gained "clear sight of a new world." It was the freshness, as of a spring morning, in which he saw that world, and the depth of his passionate contemplation thereof, which gave such strength to the utterance of those best years, and made that utterance to be a means of solace and delight to those who read and love and apprehend in other days.

COMMONPLACE circumstances often make even more strenuous demands upon our moral energy than do exceptional events. It is more wearying and tedious to walk along a dusty road than to climb a mountain height.—H. W. Crosskey.

IMPRESSIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

S.S. Empress of Ireland,
July 14, 1906.

SIR,—Since I wrote to you last—was it not from our beloved Glacier House more than a month ago?—events and interests have so crowded upon us that there has been neither time nor inclination to write again. Now that, alas! it is all over, the dream come true and passed again into dreamland, the Rocky Mountains already 3,000 miles behind us, and this great new ship rushing at 20 miles an hour towards home along the fog smitten shores of Newfoundland, pictures of what has been arise in long succession before one, and may, perchance, form suitable material for some "Impressions of British Columbia."

At the outset, however, let me put in an excuse. Should there be among your readers any who have experiences of serious climbing, canoeing, or camping, let them pass over with a kindly smile the enthusiasms of middle-aged amateurs, remembering that what would be very small things to them may be interesting experiences to less accomplished and able persons. All such matters are, after all, relative; and one man may as properly rejoice in his 9,000 feet of mountain or 20 miles of riding, as another in his 15,000 feet or 40 miles. Nor let anyone expect profound reflections on social or economic matters. One forms his opinions necessarily as he goes along, but equally necessarily learns to distrust the opinions formed on such short experience. But to my pictures.

Few scenes rise before me more delicately yet grandly beautiful than the Asulkan Valley and Pass, some 4,000 feet above Glacier House. Yet, I think, I touched on it in my last, and must only hint again at its dense lower woods, springing from ground strewn with big boulders and carpeted with thick growth of tender oak fern, and made lively by whistling marmots and chattering squirrels, and slow moving, ungainly porcupines—its rushing glacier stream—its wider rock walled parts with lofty waterfalls making music down its precipitous sides—its beds of golden Selkirk lilies—its steep and long moraines skirting the ice tongue of its glacier, and on which the ptarmigan run tamely on before you—its great white snowfield, leading up to a very perfect little col, over which grow up to meet you, as you climb its shining slopes, the fine mountains of the Dawson Range. Once more one lies in the hot sunshine on its summit, gazing down into the purple depths of the Fish Creek valley more than 2,000 feet below. Across it to Mount Dawson and a score more rocky heads, or back over our route to Sir Donald with his rocky peak, the solid mass of "Cheops" and the Roger's Pass—far below us—what a noble panorama of the Selkirk giants springing from out wide-spreading seas of forest! Not a single dwelling-place, not an acre of cultivated land can be seen. You know that the wild goat and bear are at hand, if they would but show themselves. You feel that you are in a land where, after all, man and his little railway, which he thinks so big, are still on sufferance, and where it is by accident only, the sad accident of casual fires, that up till now he has made his biggest mark.

* * * *

It is Sunday noon as, under a blazing sun, two somewhat overheated persons pull in their rather heavy boat to a little rocky bay. As there is almost certainly no kind of a church within twenty miles they may be this time held excused—perhaps not, however, for the line and minnow that have vainly tempted the big trout for some miles along the lake. And what a lake it is: one arm of the great Shushwap chain of lakes, that octopus-like spreads itself in many directions, in stretches of 20 to 30 miles, among dusky woods and mountains, trodden only by occasional parties of lumber men, and still full of the creatures whose native haunts they are. As we land a delicious perfume greets us, from bushes of red wild roses, fragrant as those of our English gardens. Just above runs the single line of the C. P. Railway, skirting the lake on its way to the Pacific; above that, steeply rising forest that promises a welcome shade. Out with the luncheon basket, and tie up the boat, up among the trees. It looks simple enough, but proves anything but so. Everywhere under the living lies the dead, clothed again with fresh life of moss and fern and lichen. Logs in every stage of decay, some that afford a foothold, some that as promptly crumble and let you through; tangle of bush and briar that catches and holds you back. It takes but a few yards of it, so strangely contrasting with the smooth railway track below, to make us realise the difficulties of pioneers in such a land.

So the first shade is taken, and we camp there, and take stock of our surroundings. These bushes bearing sheets of pure white flowers we have been taught to call thimbleberries, there are the red roses, that splotch of orange and scarlet proves to be a magnificent columbine—samples only those of the colour and beauty which glow under the hot sun. Very large butterflies, sulphur and black, chocolate and white, flit round about, and now and again a sky-blue dragon fly shimmers past. The lake sleeps peacefully in the sun at our feet, with now and again a little flight of wild duck or other water fowl plashing along it, or the swoop of a fish-hawk breaking its surface. Across it some two miles away the thickly wooded hills rise to the sky line for a couple of thousand feet; away to the right another arm begins its windings and passes out of sight. And the hot sun beats down and the hum of many insects rises up, and from the woods behind comes from time to time a strange call of some creature we cannot name, till at length the solitude is broken by the roar of a great train from the East, which thunders past our feet, passes and leaves a deeper peace, and seems, strange to say, not to have been so incongruous with the scene as according to all orthodox preconceptions it should have been. Specially interesting is this train, as being the first for three days. Somewhere far off on the prairie there has been a storm, much rain, and a consequent wash out of half a mile of line, with a three days' suspension of traffic. Such are the little incidents of travel in these parts.

A deceptive lake, that smiles so amiably at us this Sunday morning, and yesterday, catching us a mile from shore, lashed itself into fury, drove us to make for land with no little difficulty, and shelter in a swampy wood; and there treated us to an exhibition of thunder, lightning, hail, rain, and wind, that swayed and cracked the trees above us in an almost alarming way. But if the rain wets, the sun soon dries again, and it is all in the day's work.

And as we come away is there not here more matter of interest—a great raft of logs, the outer ones chained together, the inner floating loose, surely nearly an acre in extent, temporarily moored on the lake side on its way down from the lumber camps in the mountains to the river, and the saw mills. There in a little white tent among the bushes lives its custodian, and from time to time paddles across to it and does a little stray fishing from it. A somewhat lonely man, who is glad to pass the time of day.

How to get to this paradise of wood and water! Leave your Westbound train, where it crosses an arm of the lake, and sends off a branch to the south, at Sicamous Junction, where is a comfortable hotel, the railway track, but no other road or even tolerable path to walk upon, and plenty of good boats wherefrom to catch big trout, if you can.

* * * *

What manner of railway is this, that provides along its sides such parterres of lovely red and blue—red roses sending their fragrance into the dusty carriages, tall blue lupins exquisitely mingling with them. And here and there tall orange martagon lilies, masses of white thimbleberry, glowing splashes of red Indian Paint-brush, pale purple sage, delicate rose champions—all set in the tender green of young ferns and backed by massive pine woods. Only the C.P.R.'s lazy-going branch line to Vernon, much more intent on goods than on passengers, caught at the right time of year, and in the right places, compensating for its exceeding slowness by its exceeding beauty.

For 60 miles the Okanagan Lake ("lake of the storms," well named) stretches its comparatively narrow length among the hills of British Columbia, and towards the American frontier. Wooded, but not very densely, the mountains rise around it, range beyond range, to heights of two, three, or four thousand feet. Here and there fertile valleys open up from its shores, very warm, rather too much beloved of mosquitoes, the home of a fast expanding fruit culture. Thirty miles down from its head an antiquated steamer drops you at the entrance to Mission Creek Valley, where stands the bright little town of Kelowna. City rather, one should say, for is it not duly incorporated with Mayor and Council, and full 800 inhabitants. Very bright is its long main street, with mostly wooden and often coloured and tasteful houses, and several most excellent shops. It begins on the wharf, and runs, like several beginnings of side streets from it, quickly into the green trees and shrubs and fields in which the whole is set. Enough of town to swear by, and to have made a mild beginning of a public debt, to support a couple of hotels and a club, and divers churches, from the old established Catholic Mission, which was the beginning of things in these parts, to the more modern forms of Dissent, it is yet clearly only of secondary importance compared with the agricultural and horticultural districts which lie around and behind it.

The little town focuses and depends upon the life of the surrounding country. A bright and active life it is, too, both in town and country. Clearly on closer acquaintance a place where no man need starve who is willing to work; also where any man may do any kind of honest work without losing caste socially. You shall hire a "rig" (carriage) from and be driven by a gentleman whom it is a pleasure to meet and talk with, and see other such handling the "cultivator" (small plough) for hire on a neighbour's land. It may be your good fortune to be most hospitably entertained in a delightful house by another who has known what it is to work upon the roads. Far more here than in the old country does a man rank with his fellows according to his native worth and breeding. All this and much more is as it should be at Kelowna and elsewhere in British Columbia. There is also a happy mingling of work and play. In the town is much business activity; on the fruit farms, especially in their early years, much hard work is necessary. Yet time is found for polo and picnics, shooting and fishing, dinners and dances. Life flows freely and strongly, and, above all, hopefully and brightly in many directions. Of course, there are the drawbacks and dangers also. Not all the young men—and there are many young Englishmen there—know how to hold the balance between work and play wisely. Some there are whose manliness runs to billiards, cards, and whisky; others who underestimate the amount of assistance nature will insist on before she allows their trees to yield their fruits. But to the man who will work hard and wait patiently it is a kindly nature, granting a generous return in the end, and the opportunity of a healthy life in beautiful surroundings in the meantime.

The older orchards—of apple, cherry, and peach mainly—now in full bearing, are a fine sight, and in their orderliness are evidence of constant scientific care, a standing rebuke to the slovenly places bearing that name in England. The output of fruit increases yearly, and finds a growing market in the expanding districts of the Canadian North West. I abstain from figures and estimates, but a liberal discount on those given leaves a reasonable assurance of prosperity for this bright and active little community. One leaves it with the murmured regret, "If only I were younger." Then, perhaps, one might have tasted a different kind of life in a town lapped by the waters of a great lake, ringed round by noble hills, with rushing streams, and rich meadow land, fine woods, and lovely wild flowers close at hand. There we found the brilliant sunflower, large gaillardias, roses, lupins, yellow cactus, branching pink asters, and many another flower. It was there too that the cottonwood trees showered their soft falling down about us like a gentle snowstorm as we drove along.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held at Newport, I.W., on Wednesday, July 18, when there was a good attendance of ministers and friends from the churches of the district. The Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., and the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, F. K. Freeston, and C. E. Pike, of London, were also present.

After a Committee meeting in the school-room there was luncheon in the Masonic Hall, followed by the business meeting, at which the President, the Rev. C. C. Coe, took the chair.

Mr. F. PINNOCK, the senior secretary, read letters of apology for absence from Dr. Cunyngham Brown and others.

The Rev. E. J. WILKINS read the Committee's annual report, which congratulated the members of the Association on a general revival of hopeful activity in the churches of the district. Four pulpits which were vacant last year had all been filled, and good and useful work was being done in each place, thanks largely to the untiring energy and resourcefulness of the President. The help of kindly friends outside the district, and the generous aid of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were warmly acknowledged. In October last the Rev. H. M. Livens was cordially welcomed. At the recent quarterly meeting the Rev. T. R. Skemp was welcomed to Southampton, and finally at Ringwood Mr. C. E. Reed had been welcomed into the ministry at a special induction service. The general report concluded: "Thus, in one way and another, a variety of work has been done, though the workers have been but few. But the main objects of our churches are and must be the building up of themselves, so that they may the more effectively assert the great foundation truths for which we stand, not minimising the differences between ourselves and other churches, but rather seeking to show that with the faith that we possess Christian lives may be faithfully lived and Christian work faithfully done."

Miss E. J. SPENCER presented her report as treasurer. The general account showed a total on the receipts side of £217 3s. 10d., and a credit balance of £16, as compared with £42 last year.

The reports were duly adopted, on the motion of the President.

Mr. E. CHATFIELD CLARKE proposed the re-election of the president, with an expression of their deep thanks to him for his services during the past year. Mr. Coe made an ideal president, who gave most generously of his great abilities and equally generously of his purse in the interests of the Association. The Rev. H. M. Livens cordially seconded the resolution, which was carried by acclamation, and the President returned thanks for the renewal of confidence.

The other officers were re-elected, and the President then offered a very cordial welcome to Dr. Crothers, both for his own sake and as a distinguished representative of their American brethren.

Mr. E. CHATFIELD CLARKE seconded the welcome, and, having spoken of their indebtedness to Dr. Crothers for his Essex Hall Lecture, dwelt eloquently upon the close ties which unite England and America together. In conclusion, he spoke of the Unitarians of the Old and New Country being united in standing for a free and unfettered Christianity, and said surely no time was more opportune for presenting the simple and all-satisfying faith of Unitarianism, not in any pharisaical spirit, but with all toleration, and an endeavour to spread the great traditions of free truth handed down to them by those who had gone before.

Dr. CROTHERS, in responding, said that one of the surprises that awaited him on his visit to the old country was that he found he had over-estimated the position and strength of the Established Church. He belonged to a country of free churches, and he expected to find the Established Church dominating and actuating as the backbone the religious life of the country. He found that the Established Church was one of many churches, and only differed from the others in power and influence, because of the fact that it was State supported. On this side, as on the other, he realised that liberalism in religion had more scope than it had ever before had, and things were going on to make civilisation better, more free and unfettered than it had been in the past. He protested against that evil which had grown up in a hurry in America—the millionaire, the man in a hurry to get rich—being accepted as the American type of citizen. The typical American was not nervously excited, given over entirely to haste, as they might have imagined when they landed in New York and went up the street in the rush and hurry of the business part of the day. The Americans recognised fully the evils which had grown up in their midst, and which had been exploited for private gain. In America, as here, they were a scattered church. They required a closer organisation. He had entered the Unitarian Church from the Presbyterian fold, and he had large hopes of doing greater work than in the past, because prominent men in the orthodox churches were pronouncing themselves absolutely in favour of the new thought. Things were happening now that would have led to the withdrawal of ministers in the past which were now only received with disaffected grumblings by the few. Unitarian work was as necessary now as ever it was, and in the future they should have less cause to say that the movement lacked public understanding.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE followed with an able address on the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in various parts of the world, and commented on a letter from Lord Hugh Cecil on the education question, the effect of which was that if they read the Bible in the schools without creeds and without dictation from any priest the people would drift into Unitarianism. That was probably right, and he thought it a very happy harbinger, though Lord Hugh Cecil called it a shameful gambling in souls. They, as Unitarians, wished to save their children from the kind of religious experience that some of them, as children, had to go through. He was not discussing the political question, though he held a very clear and emphatic view that the present Education Bill, although it probably satisfied the general feeling of the community, was not, and could not be, a final settlement of the question. But he urged that they, as Unitarians, should realise far more deeply and earnestly than they had done what a great mission in the world they had in doing something to save the children from identifying the religion of Jesus with formularies and dogmas, and to save their souls from doubt and fear.

The Rev. H. M. LIVENS and Mr. LESLIE CHATFIELD CLARKE offered a warm welcome to the visitors, and the Rev. C. E. PIKE, formerly minister at Newport, responded.

After tea a religious service was held in the church, when Dr. CROTHERS was the preacher. The great problem, he said, which the churches had to face at the present time was not opposition, upon which they would thrive, but indifference. They asked themselves, Was the time coming when the men and women doing the great work of the world should be so busy and full of interest in other things that religion should be crowded out, and when they should say—not scornfully, but as a simple statement of fact—“Here is something, excellent in its way, and we acknowledge its value, but we have no time for it”? If they were to rouse men from the indifference into which religion had so largely fallen, they must make them see that a religious life was not a luxury of the few, or something which belonged to this or that respectable body of men, but something which was as necessary to human life as the bread they ate day by day. He warned the churches against growing careless, and said their success lay in the simple recognition of what people needed. The great cry of men to-day was “What must I do to be saved?” and that was where the gospel of the 20th century must begin. They must find out what men dreaded. They might have a word of courage for those despondent, a word of help, to triumph over disease and pain, a word that came from faith in an ever-living and loving Power that worked for good. They could not allow the enemies of religion to say that religion had ceased to be a universal need, a divine necessity, and had become a mere luxury of the few. If they were to get the working men of the world, who were doing the vast labour of necessity, to be interested in religion and the church, they must themselves be more profoundly and more seriously interested, and understand the nature of the struggle of those men and their desires, and bring to them the living water. He knew of no greater joy than to be allowed to join in that work, to be consciously and gladly, of their own choice, fellow-workers with the Eternal in building up what they believed should yet be the universal Church, lofty as the love of God, ample as the needs of men.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberystwyth.—Mr. D. J. Davies, B.A., who was the second secretary of the Unitarian congregation, and a very loyal supporter during his three years' course at the University College of Wales, has just obtained the degree of Ph.D., cum laude, at Marburg.

Birmingham: Moseley.—On Sunday, July 22, the Sunday-school Anniversary was held in the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute, the preacher being the Rev. T. A. Gorton. Special hymns and anthems were rendered by the children, assisted by augmented choir and instrumental band under the conductorship of Mr. Hughes. There was a good attendance, and the collection proved satisfactory.

Chester.—The Sunday school anniversary services were conducted at Matthew Henry's Chapel on the 22nd inst. by Mrs. Broadrick, of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, Fristol.

Cirencester.—The anniversary services were held on July 8, anthems being well rendered by the children. In the evening there was a large congregation. The sermons were preached by the minister, the Rev. H. Austin.

Crumlin.—Vigorous efforts have been made recently to bring the church property into thorough repair. The meeting-house has been re-fenced, the work being voluntarily done by some sixteen stalwart members of the congregation, and a careful map of the graveyard has for the first time been similarly prepared. The meeting-house itself needing renovation, at an estimated cost of £100, a special service was arranged for July 22, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie was the preacher. It was a flower service, and a special train brought a considerable number of visitors from Belfast, Dunmurry, and Glenavy, while other neighbouring churches were also represented. The choir of All Souls' Church, Belfast, helped in the music of the service. Mr. Bowie preached an impressive sermon from Mark i., 17, “Come ye after me.” The collection amounted to £80 2s.

Dudley.—On Saturday, July 21, the third annual flower show was held. Eight different classes of plants had been given out in the spring, and were now brought back after cultivation by the children. An effective show was the result, and prizes were given for the best plants in each class. Mrs. Geo. Bean distributed the prizes. A musical sketch entitled “The Queen of Choice” was given by some of the children, who were dressed to represent flowers. On Sunday, July 22, the Rev. Wm. C. Hall, of Birmingham, preached the Sunday-school anniversary sermons. Special hymns were sung by the children, good collections were taken, and the services were altogether most successful.

Great Hucklow Holiday Home.—The present season at the Holiday Home commenced, as usual, in Whit week. Since then the Home has been regularly occupied every week, and it is fully booked up to nearly the middle of September. The usual parties are made up of the younger scholars of the different schools in the Manchester district, the full complement of the Home being one hundred. Last week, however, was an exceptional one, the Home being given up to a “mothers'” party. The mothers were drawn from four Manchester centres, viz., Willert-street, Renshaw-street, Lower Mosley-street, and Bradford. That it was a “mothers' party” was put beyond all doubt, for most of them had brought at least one baby with them. Fifty-two mothers and thirty-one babies was the actual composition of the party. And a merry party it was. All the worries and anxieties had been left behind, and they were as light-hearted as a party of school girls. The week was very much enjoyed, and some confessed they had never known there were such sights in the world as the lovely Derbyshire moors and dales had afforded. The mothers followed the custom of the Home, and gave a farewell concert on the Friday evening, to which the villagers were invited. The Chairman of the Homes Committee, the Rev. C. Peach, presided. The mothers sang, both in solo and chorus, in excellent style. Saturday, the day for returning, was beautifully fine, and many of the mothers stayed to meet their children, who were coming out in the afternoon from Renshaw-street. The incoming party numbered about one hundred teachers and scholars, in charge of the Rev. A. W. Timmis. These in turn will leave to-day, and a further hundred scholars will come into residence for a week, and so on to the end—the Home affording thus a happy week for some twelve hundred, or so, scholars, teachers, and mothers.

Lewes.—On Sunday, July 22, Sunday-school anniversary services were held, and the congregation again had the pleasure of welcoming friends from Brighton, Ditchling, Horsham, and other neighbouring churches. The services were conducted by Mr. F. Lavson Dodd, of Tunbridge Wells, whose sermons were greatly appreciated, his subjects being “The Divine Prayer” and “Simplicity in Religion.” At the close of the evening service the choir rendered a selection of vocal music in addition to the anthems at both services.

London: Blackfriars Mission.—The annual Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition took place on Tuesday and Wednesday, July 17 and 18. The plants were judged by Mr. Anderson, head gardener to Mr. F. Nettlefold, who spoke very highly of the marked improvement both in the quantity and quality of the exhibits. Mr. Nettlefold, as in former years, sent a number of beautiful plants for the encouragement of exhibitors. Mrs. Copeland Bowie, Miss Pearson, Mr. W. H. Ballantyne, and Messrs. Gimson and Oakshott kindly acted as judges of the industrial section. The prizes were distributed on Wednesday evening by Mrs. Arnold Lupton, wife of the member for the Sleaford division of Lincolnshire, who was introduced by the chairman, Mr. C. F. Pearson. In an interesting address Mrs. Lupton spoke on some of the lessons to be learned from a careful study of plants and flowers. Hearty votes of thanks were accorded to Mrs. Lupton, Mr. F. Nettlefold, the judges, the chairman, and hon. secretaries, Misses Fry and Dunn.

Manchester Association: Garden Party.—Ten years ago the Manchester District Association of Churches held a most successful bazaar to finance its forward movement work. About ten thousand pounds was raised as a result of the effort, and from that sum the greater part went to build new churches at Bradford, Urmston, Chorlton, and Heaton Moor. New churches, however, cannot become self-supporting all at once. In the natural course they have to be assisted for some years, and when, in addition, the Association has other and older responsibilities towards some of the other churches, as well as constant missionary efforts to be made on behalf of all, it soon becomes obvious that the proceeds of even so great a bazaar as that of ten years ago cannot last for ever. This, then, is the present position in Manchester. The ten thousand pounds has been practically all spent. There are four new churches to show for it, all of them doing good work. The money has been well spent, and now more is needed. The associated churches are therefore about to hold another great United Bazaar, and November, 1907, is the time fixed upon for it. To inaugurate this undertaking a united garden party was held last week. The free use of the beautiful grounds of the Home Missionary College was readily granted by the Committee, and the members of the various churches gathered therefore at Summerville on Saturday last. The afternoon was beautifully fine: although the evening was a little broken. Various attractions were provided, including the band of the Barnes Home, glee singing by the Longsight Church choir, and an open-air dramatic performance under the direction of Mrs. A. L. Harkness. The attendance was very encouraging to the promoters, and much satisfaction was expressed at the possession by the churches in the Manchester district of so charming a spot in which to hold united meetings. During the evening a short meeting was held, and addresses were delivered from the terrace. The chair was taken by Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, the president of the Association. Colonel Pilcher welcomed the gathering on behalf of the College Committee, Mr. Richard Robinson, president of the Provincial Assembly, spoke on behalf of that body, and the Rev. Charles Peach spoke on behalf of the Manchester District Association itself. The meeting heartily endorsed the appeals of the speakers, and gave every indication of great readiness to take up the work with the same enthusiasm which carried the last undertaking to so successful an issue.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—The summer Conference was held at the new church at Ansdell, on Saturday, July 21. There was a large gathering and a pleasant afternoon was spent. Delegates and friends were present, from Kendal, Lancaster, Preston, Chorley, Blackpool, and South Shore.

Norwich.—The Sunday school anniversary services were held at the Octagon Chapel on July 8. Special music was rendered by the choir and children; the sermons were preached by the Rev. Alfred Hall. On Sunday evening, July 15, the music was repeated, when the Rev. Dr. Baart de la Faille, minister of the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, London, preached to a good congregation. In the morning he had preached the annual Dutch sermon in the Blackfriars' Hall. The Octagon congregation has just lost one of its oldest members through the death of Mr. Edward G. Reeve, at the age of 79. He had been connected with the Octagon all his life.

Oldbury.—Flower services were held on Sunday, July 15, the Rev. W. G. Topping being the preacher, when special hymns and anthems were rendered by the children and choir.

Stockport.—On Saturday, July 21, a grand garden fête was held in the charming and extensive grounds of "Woodbank," kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. Herbert Marsland, a member of the congregation. The purpose of the fête was to raise money towards paying off a debt of about £300 on the church. A large tent was kindly provided by Mr. Marsland for entertainments, a large space near the house was fenced off for à la fresco teas, and there were various refreshment stalls, all in the open air. The band of the 4th V.B.C.R., by permission of Col. Johnson, another member of the congregation, was in attendance, and discoursed sweet music. Entertainments were given at intervals, by the Sunday-school children, well trained by Mr. G. L. Halsall and his daughters, and much enjoyed. The School Dramatic Society gave a laughable dramatic sketch, "The Wrong Box," and various sports helped to enliven the proceedings. About 1,750 persons were present, and it is hoped that £60 or £70 may be cleared. The weather was fair, and the fête was a great success, thanks to the efforts of a large band of willing workers, and the great kindness of Mr. Marsland.

Yorkshire S.S. Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at Holbeck, Leeds, on Saturday afternoon, July 7, and was attended by a goodly number of officers, teachers, and workers of the affiliated schools, and most of the ministers of the district. The proceedings began with a service in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield, whose discourse on the true religious training of the young was informing and helpful. Tea was served to about 100 friends in the large classroom, and a business meeting was held in the school. The president, Mr. E. D. Dodgson, opened the meeting with a practical address on the work of the Union during the year, and made a number of suggestions for the extension and improvement of its activities. The secretary, Mr. C. H. Boyle, presented the annual report, which bore testimony to a year of well-sustained effort among the schools of the Union. The election of officers for the ensuing year was confirmed. The Revs. Charles Hargrove and W. R. Shanks offered a welcome to the representatives of the N. Midland, Manchester District, and N.E. Lancashire S.S. Societies, to which the Revs. J. K. Smith, and H. Kelsey White, and the President of the N.E. L. S.S. Union replied in interesting addresses. The further proceedings included the passing of votes of thanks to the preacher, to the friends at Holbeck, and a number of suggestions for further consideration were referred to the committee, among the speakers being the Rev. E. C. Jones, J. H. Green, and Messrs. F. T. Jackson, J. T. Kitchen, and others.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that during August all correspondence may be sent to the office of THE INQUIRER, and not to his private address.

THE first part of Mr. Schroeder's Tennyson lecture at the Oxford Summer Session for Sunday-school teachers we hope to publish next week.

DR. E. RAY LANKESTER gave his address as President of the British Association at York on Wednesday evening, referring to the fact that the first meeting of the Association was held in that city seventy-five years ago, and then dealing with the progress of science during the last twenty-five years, since the last meeting in York. The discovery of radium, and its revolutionary influence on scientific thought, naturally held a prominent place in the address. We quote its concluding sentences:—"In conclusion, I would say a word in reference to the associations of our place of meeting, the birthplace of our society. It seems to me not inappropriate that a society for the advancement of science should have taken its origin under the walls of York Minster, and that the clergy of the great cathedral should have stood by its cradle. It is not true that there is an essential antagonism between the scientific spirit and what is called the religious sentiment. 'Religion,' said Bishop Creighton, 'means the knowledge of our destiny and of the means of fulfilling it.' We can say no more and no less of science. Men of science seek, in all reverence, to discover the Almighty, the Everlasting. They claim sympathy and friendship with those who, like themselves, have turned away from the more material struggles of human life, and have set their hearts and minds on the knowledge of the Eternal."

THE Education Bill on Monday passed the Commons by a majority of 192, and Mr. Birrell has received the congratulation of his friends and his political foes for his conduct of the measure. He is also the recipient of the sympathy of Punch for the exhausting labour through which he has come. We imagine a man of Mr. Birrell's humour will appreciate the latter not less than the former. While the Bill awaits the autumn and its fate in the House of Lords, the controversy is not to languish even in the holiday season, if a number of "undersigned ministers of the Free Evangelical Churches" have their way. The signatories include among others, the Revs. Dr. Fairbairn, Dr. R. F. Horton, Dr. Monro Gibson, F. B. Meyer, and Thomas Spurgeon. They not only affirm that "instruction in the Bible truth" is an essential factor in the education of the young, but they "hold strongly that the Bible should be taught as an authentic and authoritative record of fact and truth, and that the instruction given in Holy Scripture should not be inconsistent with the 'Apostles' Creed,' which represents the general consent of Christendom on the fundamental facts of the Christian religion." Of course "authentic and authoritative" may be no more than a flourish, meaning only authentic where it is not inaccurate. But in that case the phrase is disingenuous. If it mean more than that, it implies what every Biblical scholar knows to be untrue.

WITH reference to this manifesto the following letter from the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has appeared in the public press:—

SIR,—The manifesto signed by prominent Nonconformist ministers respecting the Bible teaching provided for under Mr. Birrell's Bill, which appears in your columns to-day, will go a long way towards convincing the ordinary citizen that the claim of the Nonconformist—that he is bent only on the pursuit of truth and justice, while his Anglican brother is seeking to inculcate theological dogma and ecclesiastical ceremonial—is simply a myth.

We are solemnly informed by these divines that the Bible should be taught as "an authentic and authoritative record of fact and truth"; that the instruction given in schools "should not be inconsistent with the Apostles' Creed"; which Creed, we are told, "represents the general consent of Christendom on the fundamental facts of the Christian religion."

One would like to know if the teachers are expected to tell the children that the whole of the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, is "an authentic and authoritative record of fact and truth." If so, what a stupendous dogma these Nonconformist divines desire to enforce upon the reason and conscience of the children of the twentieth century! Then, again, why stop at the Apostles' Creed? Dr. Fairbairn and the learned brethren whose names are among the list of signators, know quite well that the immediate followers of Jesus had as little to do with the compilation of that Creed as with the Nicene or the Athanasian Creed.

If this manifesto really represents the views of the Evangelical Free Churches in England, I trust we shall hear no more about their being advocates and supporters of a public-school system which shows no preference to Church or Creed: The worthy Nonconformist divines who are responsible for this latest manifesto may, however, succeed in making it clear that it is not to them that one must look for a just and adequate settlement of the education question in the future.—Yours, &c.,

W. COPELAND BOWIE:
Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand,
July 31.

MISS MARGARET McMILLAN, whose broadly thought out ideals of education are so well known, is one of the managers of a group of county schools at Deptford, and, in connection with this, Mr. Joseph Fels has offered the L.C.C. a sum of £5,000 towards the carrying out of an interesting experiment in physical culture. It includes medical inspection, but goes very much beyond what the Education Bill will provide. If the scheme is carried through there is to be a teacher specially trained for the hygienic supervision of the children, who are to be taught swimming, voice production, and in various ways a general knowledge and reverence of physical health. For, as Miss McMillan holds, spurious forms of mental instruction will only be departed from when the pupils come with wholesome bodies to the higher education of sense and imagination.

MISS ETHEL HURLBATT, M.A., Principal of Bedford College for Women (University of London), has been offered and has accepted an appointment as Warden of the Royal Victoria College, McGill University, Montreal, and will leave England at the end of the year. The Council of Bedford College will shortly appoint her successor, whom it is hoped will come into residence at the beginning of the Lent term.

WE noted in THE INQUIRER of July 14 the coming celebration on Wednesday, August 1, at the First Church in Plymouth, Mass., the Church of the Pilgrim Fathers, of the Tercentenary of the first gathering of the church at Scrooby. The invitation to this celebration contained the following account taken from the "Church Records," of its original Covenant:—

"A Church Covenant was read, and the Church voted that it should be left upon record as that which they did own to be the substance of that Covenant which their Fathers entered into at the first gathering of this Church, which was in these words following: In the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ & in obedience to his holy will & divine ordinances, Wee being by the most wise and good providence of God brought together in this place & desirous to unite ourselves into one congregation or Church under the Lord Jesus Christ our Head, that it may be in such sort as becometh all those whom He hath redeemed & sanctified to himselfe, wee doe hereby solemnly & religiously (as in his most holy presence) avouch the Lord Jehovah the only true God to be our God & the God of ours & doe promise & binde ourselves to walke in all our wayes according to the Rule of the Gospel & in all sincere conformity to His holy ordinances & in mutuall love to & watchfulness over one another, depending wholly & only upon the Lord our God to enable us by his grace hereunto."

THE Jewish Encyclopædia, the first volume of which appeared in 1901, is now completed in twelve substantial volumes, of altogether 8,572 pages, and over eight million words. (Funk & Wagnall's Co., New York and London.) On the editorial board we note the name of Professor C. H. Toy, of Harvard, and among the foreign consulting editors Professor Oort, of Leiden. The encyclopædia admirably fulfils its purpose as "a descriptive record of the history, religion, literature, and customs of the Jewish people, from the earliest times to the present day," and so far justifies those concluding words as to have articles on Jerahmeel and Canon Cheyne, and the Dreyfus case. The concluding volume opens with an elaborate article on the Talmud. One well illustrated article is on typography, showing many examples of Hebrew printing, and the previous article on types (anthropological) gives a page of illustration, with an unmistakable composite portrait of a Jewish lad, and the ten youngsters of New York, of whom he is the result. The work is fully illustrated throughout.

IN the August Cornhill, it is pleasant to meet Mr. Leonard Huxley as a poet, and as "The Bather" in Bassenthwaite, by Skiddaw:—

"One long field, by sweet runnels fed,
That in the South mere ditches were,
But here spired plantain rears its head
And grey-eyed yarrow's silvery lip
Smiles norland welcome:—Last, a row
Of screening alders; there I strip
And barefoot through soft grasses go Where Derwent, curving to the mere,
Swift in his seeming stillness slides,
A moving mirror, darkly clear,
Deep-pooled beneath his hanging sides:

"Poised for the plunge, erect I take
The benison of the sun: I see
The toil-bound mower by the lake
Still swing his scythe, but I am free.
I poise, I plunge:—the mirrored hills
Rise up to meet me as I leap.
How the cool stream my body thrills,
Silken and soft and fresh as sleep!"

This number of Cornhill has also a most interesting article on "Ruskin in Venice," by Count Alvise Zorzi, while Mr. Stanley Weyman's Reform Bill story, "Chippinge," proceeds with sustained interest. We are promised in September the beginning of a new story ("Letters of an Independent Woman") by the Author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden."

THE August Connoisseur, as one of its full page illustrations, has a fine reproduction of an old portrait in oils, said to be Andrew Marvell, though no particulars are given of the portrait. A second article on Penshurst Place, in Kent, the home of Sir Philip Sydney, among other things, of how he fell at Zutphen, and in the illustrations shows many curious and beautiful treasures belonging to the house.

THE exhibition of works of William Blake at the Carfax Gallery, St. James's, which closed on Tuesday, contained a large number of his drawings, two of the most interesting being the panels of "Winter" and "Evening" which, according to the catalogue, once "formed the supports of a chimney piece in Cowper's house at Felpham." There was a third panel, a view of Olney Bridge, the only landscape which Blake is known to have painted, which is now destroyed. We are interested to see that the Liverpool Booksellers' Co. are to publish, early in the autumn, a fine edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, with Blake's illustrations (crown 4to, 12 plates in colour, 12s. 6d. net.).

THE mezzotint portrait of Mr. John Morley by Mr. Percy H. Martindale has been very well received. It is a happy unconstrained portrait of the man of letters sitting at ease in his study chair, with the light of a smile upon the face. "The likeness is most telling," said the Liverpool Daily Post, and many other papers, including the Westminster, spoke highly of it. Artist's proofs may still be had for five guineas, and prints on India paper, two guineas, on plain paper, one. Orders may be sent to Mr. John Arthur Cooke, Marple, Cheshire.

THE July Liberal Churchman, the second half-yearly issue for 1906 of this interesting organ of the "Churchmen's Union for the Advancement of Liberal Religious Thought," contains the paper by Dr. Rashdall, "A Plea for Undenominationalism," read at a recent meeting of the Union, an account of "the Church in the United States," with special reference to the case of Dr. Craspey, of Rochester, New York, by Dr. Heber Newton, and an article on "Lay Influence in Church Concerns," by the Rev. W. Routh, together with notes and reviews of books. (Williams & Norgate. 1s. 2d. post free.)

MR. F. A. EDWARDS, writing from Hammersmith, informs us that the Charity Commissioners have recently prepared a new scheme for the administration of the St. Peter's Free Schools, Hammersmith, which provides for the division of the endowment into two parts, one being applied to the payment of pensions of from 10s. to 20s. weekly to "widows or spinsters of good character, in reduced circumstances, of not less than sixty years of age," who "shall be Protestant Christians—not Unitarians nor Socinians." It would be interesting to know more of the origin of this enlightened charity!

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

THE Unitarian Van goes prosperously on its way. It started upon its mission, as we recorded at the time, on the Cheshire side of Warrington, at Lymm, on May 14, and is to conclude its journeyings for the present season on September 29, very fitly, at a village in the neighbourhood of Rochdale, the home of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, the devoted secretary of the Mission. Thus, of the nineteen weeks' campaign planned, eleven are now completed, and the Van is in Yorkshire.

From Warrington by way of Liverpool past Wigan, the course pursued was up into the hill country of North-East Lancashire, past Clitheroe and Chatburn into Yorkshire, at Gisburn and Barnoldswick, then back again across the border to Nelson, and most of the remaining weeks are marked out for Yorkshire, Keighley, Bingley, Sowerby Bridge and Hebden Bridge being on the programme, then finally back to Lancashire again by Todmorden to Walsden and Littleborough, and so on to Rochdale.

The weather has not been always kind, and Mr. Talbot, who has been with the Van all the time, will doubtless have some curious experiences to relate; but unexpected kindness in many quarters has marked the course of the journey, and the members of our own churches in the neighbourhood of which the Van has passed have loyally helped in the work. The stations chosen have been chiefly in villages and small towns, and, while numbers have been often small, great interest has been awakened, and the seeds of liberal religious thought have been sown broadcast; while in many cases there was no need for sowing, and a ready response of sympathy from members of other churches met the speakers.

When this first season's Mission is completed, it will be of great interest to have a full report of the results, and of the conclusions of the chief workers as to what has been accomplished, and what are the possibilities of such a Mission.

two-thirds of the members present, at once place the name of such congregation or society on the roll. If two-thirds of the members of Committee present do not vote in favour of such resolution, the Committee shall not have power to add the name of such congregation or society to the roll. But the Committee may by a simple majority pass a resolution recommending the Conference to do so.

(4) Any member of the Conference, who has given at least twenty-eight days' notice in writing to the Secretary of his member of the Conference under Rule 2 h.

Any such resolution may also be proposed on behalf of the Committee, in which case it shall be sufficient if notice of it be given

In either case, such resolution must be passed by a majority of two-thirds of the members present and voting.

(5) The business of the Conference,

(8) The twelve persons to be elected by the members under Rule 6 (b) shall be nominated in the following manner:—Every congregation on the roll and every Society enumerated in Rule 7 shall be invited to nominate some one person, who need not be a member of the congregation or society nominating, to serve on the Committee. The expiring Committee may also, if they think fit, nominate not more than six persons—not being members of the expiring Committee—to serve on the new Committee. All such nominations must be in the hands of the Secretary at least seven days before the assembling of the Conference. He shall then prepare a list of the persons nominated, showing by whom each person is nominated, and shall cause the same to be printed and delivered to each member as soon as possible after his arrival in the town in which the Conference is held. No one whose name does not appear on such list shall be elected on the Committee under Rule 6 (b), except by a unanimous vote of the members present.

(9) From the persons nominated in accordance with Rule 8, twelve shall be elected in the following manner:—The President or other Chairman of the meeting shall appoint Scrutineers. Each member shall make, on his copy of the list of persons nominated, a cross opposite the names of the persons for whom he intends to vote. The scrutineers, if members, may vote. No member may vote for more than twelve persons to serve on the Committee. Each member shall then sign his list with his name and address, and hand it as his voting paper to the Scrutineers. If any member who has been present during any portion of the Conference is compelled to leave before the business meeting, he may lodge his voting paper, duly signed, with the Secretary, enclosed in a sealed envelope addressed "To the Scrutineers"; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary to hand the same to the Scrutineers on behalf of such member.

(10) The Scrutineers shall reject every voting paper which is not signed by a member, every voting paper on which more than twelve names (of those nominated for Committee) are marked, and every voting paper which is, in their opinion, unintelligible or equivocal. They shall then count the votes and the Chairman shall announce the result to the meeting. The voting papers shall then be destroyed by the Secretary.

(11) The Officers of the Conference shall be a President, one or more Vice-Presidents, a Treasurer, one or more Secretaries (Honorary or paid), and two Auditors. The Officers shall be elected by the members present at each Triennial Conference, and shall hold office till the conclusion of the next Triennial Conference. Honorary Officers shall be ex officio members of the Committee.

(12) It shall be the duty of the expiring Committee to submit to each Triennial Conference the names of persons whom they deem qualified, and whom they have ascertained to be willing, to serve as Officers of the Conference. Any member present at any Triennial Conference may propose any other person for any office, and the vote shall be taken at the business meeting by a show of hands, unless an election by voting papers be demanded, in which case the Officers shall be elected in the same manner as the Committee.

(13) The Committee may fill up any vacancy which may occur on the Committee, or in any office through death, absence, resignation, or from any other cause.

(14) The Committee shall hold regular meetings to consult, and when considered advisable to take action, on matters affecting the well-being and interests of the congregations and societies on the roll of the Conference, as by directing attention, suggesting plans, organising expressions of opinion, raising funds to carry out the foregoing objects, or summoning, if it deem it needful, a special meeting of the Conference.

(15) At each Triennial Conference the Committee shall present to the members a full report of its proceedings and of the action which it has taken, for the approval or otherwise of the Conference. A copy of such report shall be forwarded ten days at least before the assembling of each Triennial Conference to every member whose name and address is then known to the Secretary. It shall state the general nature of any resolution (other than formal or usual business) which is to be proposed on behalf of the Committee at the approaching Conference.

(16) These rules may be varied or repealed, or new rules made, at any Triennial Conference by a resolution passed by a majority consisting of not less than two-thirds of those present and voting. Unless such resolution is to be moved on behalf of the Committee, notice of the proposed alteration or addition must be sent to the Secretary twenty-eight days at least before the assembling of the Conference. In either case, notice of the resolution must be given in or with the report of the Committee. Notice of any other resolution proposed to be moved at the Business Meeting must reach the Secretary two days at least before the assembling of each Conference.

MR. SCOTT'S NEWDIGATE.*

"THE Death of Shelley" was the subject appointed for this year's Newdigate at Oxford, and the prize, as we reported at the time, was awarded to Mr. Geoffrey Scott, of New College.

His poem, which is in the metre of Matthew Arnold's "Thyrsis," will be recognised as full of high poetic promise. It is, indeed, difficult to follow, and this is perhaps not wholly due to defective knowledge on the reader's part both of Shelley's works and the story of his death; but there is undoubtedly a true music in the verses, and if the thought appears at times illusive, it is with a beauty and a spirit not unakin to Shelley's own.

The opening stanzas will at once show its quality:—

"There is a sea no wanderer may find,
Nor sail thereto its distant freight may bring,

About the margins of the world it lies,
Beyond the sunrise and the sunseting,

* "The Death of Shelley." The Newdigate Poem, 1906. By Geoffrey Scott, New College. (Oxford: B. H. Blackwell, 50 and 57, Broadstreet. London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 1s. net.)

Serene and clear: no storm may there arise,

No footfall of the wind
May stir its peace; only upon the air
Echoes are heard, and whispers by the shore,

With low refrain returning evermore,
And Music makes her tranquil dwelling there.

"And all Earth's wealth of form and harmony,
Shapes of delight and voices magical
To bind our senses, from beyond that strand

Draw down to men. But faintly here they fall,

A silent foam cast forth upon the sand;
And few there are may see

That ocean's wonder; few whose ear is strong

To catch th' eternal rhythm of its tide,
Save in man's heart some memory of it hide,

Save in the broken beauty of his song.

"What strain of lamentation fitly sounds
By those clear shores for his ensilenced breath

Whom most their haunted echoes held in thrall?

Flows it in gentle mourning over death,
As, softly still, old shepherd-voices call

From where a blue sea bounds
The grey Sicilian uplands unforgot?

Or with the passion of his fiercer tone
That wept the singer of Endymion?

Nay! He is dead, and we can hear it not.

"We hear it not; but the enchanted tide
To Shelley's ear its gift would ever bring;
And Music's phantom messengers arose
Upon his dream-lit vision whispering."

So the thought proceeds of Shelley as the passionate singer of liberty, unheeded indeed, while yet the revolutionary forces of that time were gaining in strength; and of the singer also of the pure spirit of Nature, until his voice was silenced in death.

"But most his song

"Rose with the rising storm, exultingly
In the swift triumph of the driving West.

Yet wild, yet merciless, with angry speed

The storm o'erwhelmed him in its mortal quest,

And spares him not, that faring without Beneath the shaded sky,

Nought hears he but the gentle strains that tell

The legend of Antigone, and sees Nought but the tranquil light of Sophocles,

Who knew no tempest that he could not quell."

That is an allusion to the fact that Shelley had a copy of Sophocles with him, when his boat was overwhelmed by the storm. And thus his death is described:—

"And the great deep received him, and enwrapped

His life within the pulsing and the gloom
Of the slow-veering waters. All for nought

His voice of seas, to stay the sudden doom!

In vain his voice by sounding torrents taught!

For that mute song is lapped

In Ocean's treasury, and lingers there,
Amid the shelvey caverns of her base,
Where the sea ponders, and the tides
enlace, Gentlest of all her wonders, and most rare."

After a break in the poem, following the gloomy picture of the desolate shore on which the body was cast up by the sea, there follows a fine appeal to Plato, as the master of the poet's thinking, an appeal for some answer to this tragedy of his death—

"Thy scholar, passionate
As thou, to pierce beyond the enchanted sea
Past thronging dreams, and phantoms half divine,
To the white Truth, whose timeless realm is thine,
And, in thy pathway, sought to climb to thee?"

For with Plato's ideal vision comes foreboding of more perfect truth, "Wherein our fitful lights should burn

as one,

Calm in the fulness of the certain day."

So, even with our little knowledge, with the conviction of abiding spiritual truth, we can look calmly upon his death.

"Vainly he sought; but now the upturned face

Endures thy deathless answer. Silently
The mists half rise. From the dumb sands a breeze

Stirs and is gone; a gentle breath parts by

In awe the ruin of his hair, and frees
The wan brow's wasted grace.

And in the dawn the heavy hours release
To their sea-home his phantasies. He holds

Their mastery no longer, but enfolds
His one white slumber of unvisioned peace."

In the poem as published "brows" is a misprint, corrected above. We stumbled also at the phrase, "parts by," which appears to mean "parts aside," but is hardly a use of words one would expect or easily understand.

The poem concludes as follows:—

"Frail lamp of mighty arduours dedicate
In Freedom's sanctuary to dwell secure,—

Unmastered heart of music, overworn
With air-born passions, how should'st thou endure

The world's so bitter usage, and its scorn,

The storm's insensate hate?

Now hast thou rest! Yet now thy flame burns high,

Now all the winds are haunted with thy soul,

And the low waves with deeper cadence roll

For thee, and thy Greek lord, eternally!

"For thee more softly on the solemn hills Darkens the evening, and the late shades grow;

Thine altered spirit, peaceful now
as they,

Beholds at last its clear dominion. So,
When heaven, weary at the close of day,

Faints unto calm, and stills
The warring winds, and parts their cloudy cars,

In some deep, silent water the moon's light
Shines forth in ancient vigilance, and Night
Kindles the tranquil mirage of the stars."

A SERMON IN STONE.

It is well if a holiday sometimes surprises one with a new kind of revelation of oneself and the world. A holiday, to fulfil its proper mission, must needs tend towards the recreation of body and soul. In fact, it is fairly obvious that in the nourishment of the latter the former derives great benefit. Shall we say that the less is contained in the greater? A holiday should provide the opportunity for the release of the ego, which is far too apt to get imprisoned within the folding doors of the conventional and the commonplace. By long custom we get to prescribe our limits and define our horizon according to the pressure of circumstances of time and place. The pathos of the situation lies in the evident complacency; we hug our chains in abject contentment. The ledger, the scrip, the circular, the contract note no less than the golf club and the cricket bat, seem to control our actions and rule our destiny. Sometimes we rebel—it is in the rebellion that safety and sanity lie.

Such reflections have come, unbidden, from a short stay at St. Anne's-on-the-Sea.

It is true that in many respects this little resort does not differ from other seaside places. Perhaps its worst defect is its modernity; such an aggressive tone of ultra-respectability; so many tokens of a Liverpool and Manchester civilisation.

But there is a great—a very great—exception to all this. On the promenade, in a very prominent position, there stands a monument of stone. You are at once arrested by it, for it tells its own tale. A simple tale, mainly about a simple man and his fellows who gave up their lives in response to a call of duty some twenty years ago. That is all! We might, perhaps, examine this pedestal a little more.

Seemingly in rough, haphazard style a collection of stone has been thrown together, and on this has been chiselled with remarkable fidelity the full-sized figure of a St. Anne's lifeboat-man. He stands ready for immediate action, grasping the coil of rope which is going to be the messenger of hope and life.

The features of this man are expressive to a degree—they speak.

Your curiosity is aroused with perception—you want to know all that is to be known. Very well then, listen to the tale.

One December night a German barque, Mexico, manned by twelve hands, ran upon one of the treacherous banks which abound off the coast. "It was a fearful night, and just upon midnight, when the St. Anne's lifeboat, the Laura Janet, was launched on its errand of mercy." In this succinct prologue is contained the cause—the effect is easily stated.

Thirteen men went out to save; not one returned alive. The capsizing of the Laura Janet accounted for thirteen desolate homes.

There is really little more to add.

The shipwrecked crew were saved by the Lytham lifeboat; Southport also sent aid, and no less than eleven of this boat were drowned.

It was not the first time that death had been the reward of a lifeboat crew, but somehow the public mind was fired with imaginative fervour. A sense of realisation siezed men and women. There are just a few particulars worth the telling.

"The nation was touched to the heart by the calamity, and a fund was raised on behalf of the dependents of the St. Anne's and Southport heroes. In addition to a sum of £26,299, the Emperor of Germany, through his Consul at Liverpool, disbursed money amongst the widows and families;

"The wreck occurred in December, 1886, and in the May of 1888 the monument was unveiled on the promenade at St. Anne's.

"The figure is a striking likeness of the coxswain who held the helm of the Laura Janet on that fateful night." So runs a local report.

It was in the noontide of a beautiful June day that the memorial presented itself for our inspection: The bright sun overhead, the soft lapping waves upon the beach, the shore of many-hued pebbles—these, with the hundred and one associations of heat and energy and life, became suddenly dwarfed as in the presence of a power greater and mightier than them all. It was the conquest of the heroic; the reign of the spirit—in short, the triumph of the absolute. This lifeless, inanimate figure; the work of men's hands, the product of the quarry, the result of manual labour. Yes, all these and yet something else besides: the rough-cut features of a probably rough-cut native. Yet presently the external, the covering, the mannerisms of this rough sailor disappear, and it is evident that the divine and the god-like take their place. This poor fellow, with his brave associates, could do no more than offer up his life as a forfeit to the inexorable law of nature on behalf of a foreign crew. Somehow one's vision of the true inwardness of atonement seems to get clarified under the spell of a great sacrificial effort. A common experience teaches where an extraordinary theology only repels. Altogether a strange, sad spectacle this monument of stone at St. Anne's, and yet all the time a magnificent object lesson of duty and unselfishness. One cannot conceive of its influence ever growing slight while human hearts beat in a common unison.

It was Macaulay who, speaking of a certain book, said that no one who read it could be quite the same afterwards. Probably this is a hard truth to accept before one is brought face to face with the sterner verities of life; then no explanation is necessary; one understands.

The recollection of the brave coxswain and his twelve companions will be an abiding one: It has been the sermon of the holiday which, without sensationalism or excitement, has preached its message:

"Mr. Punch" said at the time:—

"Weep not for them, dear women; cease wringing of your hands;

Go out to meet your heroes across the Southport sands:

Grim death for them is stingless, the grave has victory;

Cross oars and bear them nobly home, brave Warriors of the Sea."

By A MINISTER.

XLIII.

THE smallest book in my possession measures three inches by two. It was printed in 1765, and contains in the original Greek the Manual of Epictetus and the Hymn to Zeus of Cleanthes—a kind of vade-mecum for the scholar, requiring no more room in his pocket than such space as he is wont to give to snuff-box or ink-horn.

The Manual of Epictetus is said to have been to antiquity what the Imitation of Thomas à Kempis was to later times. It is the spoken philosophy of "the halting slave," reduced to written form by a loving pupil and friend, before long to be as acceptable to Christian as to heathen readers. The wonder is, not that Christians recognised religion in heathen philosophy, but that heathen philosophers failed to recognise philosophy in the Christian religion. The reason was doubtless this, that to a Roman stoic it was inconceivable that philosophy, worthy of the name, could come from those who had not themselves passed through philosophic training. It was the pagan form of the question, "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" If any rumour reached him of the exalted teaching of the followers of the new craze, he would at once suppose it borrowed from one or more of the systems of existing philosophic schools. He would ask in his own disdainful way whether any originally good thing could come out of Nazareth.

And yet, let us suppose him set down by force, or by persuasion, to the study of the Sermon on the Mount. Religion apart, the Sermon is a philosophy of life. Its conclusions, in their bearing upon human affairs, are very much his own, independently arrived at, and not less serviceable. Here are maxims with which even the unbeliever may arm himself against the troubles which beset him on every side. Here is the great secret of detachment from worldly care, the remedy for unhappiness arising from anxiety concerning bodily want. And here, too, is a security more positive, more assuring, than that cold insensibility to evil which is the stoic's aim—the security of a mind which can rightly weigh, and calmly choose, and bravely overcome. Or let us imagine him pondering over the precepts of Paul the aged—words of counsel for those who would manfully bear the hardships of poverty, of toil, of civil oppression, and even of servile condition. Or let us think of him as coming upon that passage in which another apostle arranges his virtues in a scheme, and bids his hearers pass by a graduated course from the personal to the social, from the social to the universal. Might it not have dawned upon him that, quite apart from that preaching which was "foolishness," these Galilean moralists had something to say to him on his own ground? Epictetus speaks once of the Christians, and then with contempt. What if he had seen in the ages to come those same Christians shining forth as lights in the world, the philosophers with their dim torches falling behind, to walk humbly in their train?

The best things in the Manual are well known to modern readers. It opens with a fine enumeration, first, of the things which are within our power, and then of the things which are beyond control. To take the mind off the latter, and to make a right use of the former, is to find the true path of life and happiness. To know the real nature of things, what is substance and what is shadow, what is transient and what is abiding, what is moderate and what is excessive, what is precious and what is worthless, this is wisdom. The true philosopher is a man of action even more than of thought. We are like passengers in a ship, allowed for a time on shore, and may amuse and busy ourselves with what we find as we stroll, but, if the captain call, we must run and leave things as they are, and not once look back. This is good doctrine, whether we call it philosophy or religion.

The story of Cleanthes is even more moving than his famous Hymn. It is the story of one who, more than two centuries before Christ, found in philosophy the strait gate and narrow way of religion, and entered them through much tribulation. He began his student life with exactly half-a-crown. To earn his lecture-fees he worked all night at drawing water, and got into trouble with the judges for having no visible means of support. Bones and potsherders made the tablets on which he took his notes. It is comforting to know that he succeeded his great master in his school, but it is still more pleasant to think that St. Paul, preaching on the same hill of Mars on which he had been tried, had him in his mind when he spoke to Athenians of the witness of their "own poets." "For we are thy offspring" is the beginning of the fourth line of the Hymn.

I find the old printer's type less fitted to my eyes than to my pocket, but I thank him for showing me how portable a thing is weighty thought, and what breadth of wisdom can go into three inches by two.

ESSEX HALL YEAR BOOK, 1907.

SIR,—When the Essex Hall Year Book is published, several people, on looking over the anniversaries and events which appear in the monthly calendar from January to December, have suggested that the list might be made more interesting and instructive. Perhaps some of your accurate and well informed readers may be able to send in the names and dates of a few heroes, martyrs, teachers, saints, writers, workers, celebrated in the annals of liberal religious thought, which have hitherto escaped notice. I make the suggestion as a holiday task for the benefit of the diligent and the studious, and with a view to increase the value of the Year Book for 1907 as a book of reference.

XII. CREED.

A CREED is a summary of religious belief, and, as a man cannot think his belief without theology, so neither can he state it without a creed.

Mention is made in St. Paul's Epistles of a "form," a "deposit," a "confession," a "faith." In at least two passages (1 Cor. viii. 6; xv. 3, 4) there are clauses so rounded and balanced that they might well be fragments of a composition intended to be learnt by heart; yet there is no complete body of words to which we can point and say, This was the primitive creed. The nearest approach to a full profession of faith is the rehearsal made by St. Peter in Acts x. 38—43.

The truth appears to be that the primitive Christian creed was at first neither committed to writing nor recited in public. There was more safety, and also more reverence, in its use as a "symbol," or secret sign. It was a pledge, and the necessity for its use as a test, and as a protection against heresy, had not yet arisen.

With this later necessity rose another need—the need of that definiteness of statement without which no society can make its position clear. Without a creed Christianity would never have gained the attention of thinking men, and, despised by them, would have lost its hold at last upon the affections of the people. The most advanced minds in the fourth or fifth centuries were the religious minds, the most trained thinkers the theologians, and it would ill become those who study the rise of heathen systems of belief to find nothing of interest in the growth and development of Christian doctrine. Each man, says Emerson, should see that he can live all history in his own person.

Moreover, we must not underrate the importance in religion of a mental attitude. It is true that the founder of Christianity asked much more for acts of faith than for expressions of belief, but in the plain question, "What think ye of the Christ? Whose son is he?" he certainly demanded a statement of opinion. According to its conception of Messiah, so would the Jewish people conceive its own destiny. Everything would turn upon the idea they had in their minds. Our action depends very much on the nature of our ideas. As we think of God, so shall we think of life and duty and the future state. How nations have thought of God is written in their history; to a great extent the thought has made the history. It is by ideas that we are animated, by ideas we are governed, for ideas we live, and for ideas we are sometimes ready to die. The use of the intellect in religion will never supersede, but will always affect, the play of the affections and the power of the will.

A creed, then, need not be more than a concise statement of present belief. Rigidly fixed, and regarded as immutable, such statement might become in time a hindrance to religious progress, but there is no reason why an open confession of common faith should not be for the time being of the highest value in religious fellowship and life.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE VOYAGE OF THE "ARGO" TO GET THE GOLDEN FLEECE.

THIS is the story of the heroes who by daring deeds obtained the Golden Fleece and won everlasting fame. And now in their ship the Argo—a ship no more of timber but of shining stars—they sail over the Black Sea of the night until at the dawn the Fleece of Gold is seen shining upon a cloud.

THE golden fleece of Jupiter's winged ram hung on a beech-tree in a grove of oaks in Colchis. Wherefore 'tis said that in the autumn every beech-tree bears a fleece of gold.

Now Pelias, the King of Thessaly, had promised to occupy the throne until his young nephew Jason, the heir, was old enough to enter upon his heritage. Years passed, and Pelias found his seat so comfortable that he did not like the thought of giving it up. But now Jason came along to show his uncle what a magnificent young fellow he had become, tall and strong and handsome. Pelias praised him mightily, but in his heart he was ill at ease. He was determined to get rid of Jason, but in a thoroughly respectable manner, so as not to excite the suspicions of the people. There was the Golden Fleece far away in the land of Colchis—what a glorious thing to possess—to go through unknown perils and capture it and bring it home to Greece! It was just the thing to excite the spirit of Jason, therefore Uncle Pelias gave him every encouragement, for he thought he was sure to meet with destruction in some shape or other in the attempt to carry out such a dangerous enterprise.

Jason, for his part, could think of nothing but glory and success, therefore he invited the bravest men in Greece to join him, and they readily responded. They must needs have a new ship strongly built for the purpose, and the heroes themselves helped to build her. In their strong arms they lifted the heavy timbers—they truly set the keel and fixed to it the staunch oaken ribs. For many a long week from dawn till dark the cheerful clatter of hammer and adze and saw went on. The brown smoke of the pitch for caulking the crevices blew in their faces, but they relished the strong savour. At last the Argo was finished and her mast set up. Pushing all together with might and main the heroes slid her into the water. A goodly vessel she well might be, for she was planned by Athenē, the goddess of Wisdom.

The night before they started the Argonauts, as these sturdy adventurers were called, feasted and made merry and praised the gods and asked for their blessing on the voyage. Next morning they took their places two by two on the benches, and just as the anchor was weighed and the great mainsail filled with the wind and the oars fell with one splash into the sea, Chiron, the wise Centaur, came down from the mountains where he lived, carrying the little Achilles, thereafter greatest of heroes but now only a child, that he might wave a happy farewell to his father, Peleus, who was one of the crew. For the sight of children makes brave men braver. Old Tiphys the trusty takes the helm. Just before him is Hercules, a very mountain of muscle, rowing the stroke-oar. On a bench behind him, Polyphemus, who had fought with the Centaurs, but was now getting old, and another Polyphemus, swiftest of runners. There are seated, each at his oar, the twin brothers Castor, the tamer of horses, and Pollux, the famous boxer. Lynceus, so keen of sight that he can see the veins of metal in the rocks and the fountains far below the earth. There are the sons of Boreas, the North Wind, and others, and Jason, captain of them all. While the rest man the ship, Orpheus, the famous singer, sings to his lyre to hearten his comrades and to help them keep time. So sweet is his voice that the fishes in the sea are attracted, and the dolphins play round and round the ship in glee. Well is it to meet peril with laughter and song.

Of all the adventures of these brave men I cannot stop to tell, or of all the troubles that befell them; for great deeds are not wrought nor glory won without suffering and disappointment. I can but mention in passing the Six-handed Giants they had to fight, who threatened to destroy them and their vessel with the huge rocks they hurled into the air. Day after day stormy winds held them back, until at length a kingfisher flew over the head of Jason, and gave the sign that the wind would change.

The island of Lemnos they found inhabited by none but women. At one place where they landed they defended the king from the attacks of the Harpies, or flying hounds of Jupiter. Strange, weird birds flying overhead shot their feathers at the voyagers, whose flesh they pierced like sharp arrows. Their greatest danger lay in passing through the narrow passage of the Sounding Rocks, which they succeeded in doing by rowing at their utmost speed after the dove, which led the way; but only the protecting hand of Athenē, the friend of the Argonauts, could save them from destruction by holding back the threatening rocks; for no sooner had they passed from between them than they clashed together with the stunning crack of thunder. At length they reached the shores of Colchis, where Jason, landing, sought the palace of Æetes the King, and demanded of him the Golden Fleece in return for whatever hard service he should require of him. Mighty was the dwelling of Æetes, with gates and pillars and cornices of brass. A great vine grew about the doorway, and under its shadow were cool fountains of water and wine and oil and milk. First, in courtesy, the King gave Jason and his comrades to eat and drink, and afterward he listened to his demand and laughed and scoffed withal. "Before ye have the Golden Fleece," said he, "ye shall harness my bulls, brazen-hoofed and fire-breathing, and plough my four-acre field. In the morning ye shall sow it with dragons' teeth, and in the evening ye shall reap the harvest." Jason declared he gladly would perform that toil. Whereat the King gave him sword and armour and a shield of bull's hide hard as iron. But Jason could never have done the deed without the help of Medea, the King's daughter. She admired his courage and loved him for it, and determined to aid him. Having great knowledge of plants, she secretly gave him a drug with which to anoint his body and shield so that the fiery breath of the bulls should not harm him. But swiftly must he act, for the power of the drug availed for but a day. Bearing this in mind Jason went to the stalls, and seizing one of the bulls by the horns drew him forth and forced him to the plough, while one of his companions fastened the yoke. This he did with the other also. Then taking with him a helmet full of dragons' teeth which King Æetes had given him, he ploughed the field, dropping the seed in the furrow as he went along, until it was finished, when he took back the bulls to their stable. Soon the crop began to shoot up out of the soil—first the sharp points of spears, then heads of fierce men with helmets on, and so until the field was full of armed warriors. This was the crop that Jason had to reap. It surpassed the prowess of any single man; but what a man fails to attain by valour he may attain by reason of craft. Therefore Jason, hiding himself among the neighbouring rocks, hurled a great stone high into the air, which, falling into the midst of the armed host, at once created havoc among them; for every man charged his neighbour with causing this commotion until they were all fighting against one another, nor ceased until the greater part were slain; when Jason rushed in with drawn sword and despatched the rest. Thus he reaped the harvest from the dragons' teeth.

Æetes was not well pleased that Jason had succeeded, and he feared now lest he should get the Golden Fleece. But it was well guarded by a sleepless Dragon, that wound its coils round and round the tree on which it was hung; nor could any come near it for the smoke and flames that issued from its nostrils. But the magic of Medea prevailed where nought else could. Again she provided her lover with a potent medicine. When he approached the grove in the dead of night and saw from a distance the Fleece shining on the bough, his heart was great within him, and advancing cautiously toward the monster, sword in hand, he sprinkled the drug in its face, which soothed it into a deep slumber, so that Jason stepped boldly across its scaly coils and took the Fleece down from the bough. But Æetes, when he discovered that the Fleece was gone, and that through the cunning of his own daughter, was wrath beyond measure, so that Medea had to flee to the Greeks for protection. They took her on board the Argo, and made haste to depart. Tugging at their stout oars, and bracing the sail to the wind, they were soon beyond the reach of harm, carrying with them the Golden Fleece and Medea, who became the wife of Jason in his home in Thessaly.

Thus was won the Golden Fleece of Fame, the prize of daring, but not won without the aid and encouragement of love.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

THE Education Bill has passed the House of Commons, but what the Lords have now to consider is by no means the same Bill as that introduced by Mr. BIRRELL in April. As amended in Committee and on Report it has only 30 clauses instead of 40. Part II. of the original Bill with 11 clauses, on "Educational Endowments: Power to make Schemes," is dropped, and Part I., dealing with "Elementary Schools," has a fresh clause, and the 14 clauses of this first part extend to three and a half pages more of the Bill as printed than in the original copy. Indeed the Bill as a whole, in spite of the omitted part, is nearly as long as the original, for many clauses have been greatly elaborated in the process of amendment.

How the Bill will fare in the House of Lords is a subject of interest to many and of anxiety to some. The anomalous character of our legislative machinery, in which the motive portion is subject to periodical revision, while the regulative portion remains unalterable, shows itself especially at such a time; and people are inquiring, not what new wisdom the Lords may impart to the measure, but how far they dare go in opposing the will of the vast majority in the popular House. General opinion appears to negative the notion of a total rejection of the Bill, and the belief is that the Lords will confine their action to modifying the scheme now before them. How far are their modifications likely to prove of vital importance?

To estimate the probabilities we must first consider what the chief provisions of the Bill are. Everyone knows, or should know, that it insists on full public control of all public elementary schools—that is, of all schools maintained by the public funds. Then it is equally clear that henceforth teachers are not to be subjected to theological tests when applying for posts in such schools; this, at least, is the express stipulation of the Bill. Whether it will be obeyed, whether in the continuance of theological teaching in the schools it can be whole-heartedly obeyed, are points for experience to settle. But at any rate, these two cardinal principles of the Bill remove very serious grievances set up by Mr. BALFOUR's Acts on the subject. We do not think that the Lords will seek to reverse the unhesitating verdict of the House of Commons in favour of these principles.

But the Bill contains much more than the assertion of these fundamental principles. It follows the lead of Mr. BALFOUR's legislation in the direction of widening the scope of public education, and it offers substantial aid towards the better equipment of our schools. It empowers the local authorities to advance in notable paths, such as those relating to medical inspection of scholars, and in provision for "vacation schools." It gives to Wales a special Education Council of its own, and so takes us one step nearer to the devolution in our national business, which is seen by all practical men to be necessary. In these and other ways the Bill does credit to its promoters, and chiefly to Mr. BIRRELL, who is deservedly congratulated all round on the sensible and conciliatory manner in which he has conducted its passage through the Commons. So far as our survey has gone, we cannot think there will be in the Upper House such antipathy to the Government and all its proposals that so important and beneficial a scheme will be ruthlessly thrown out.

Finally, however, there is the "religious difficulty," which we regret to find usually thrust into the foreground to the absolute forgetfulness of other features of the Bill. As it stands, Mr. BIRRELL's scheme permits local authorities to give religious teaching on the lines known as "Cowper-Templeism," that is, the plan generally adopted by the great School Boards of a few years ago. In order to meet the views of those who desire a dogmatic type of religious teaching, whether they be Jews, Catholics, or Anglicans, facilities may be given, where the great majority of parents so desire, for special theological tuition, under certain conditions, one of the most significant being a due school provision for children of the minority of parents in such a district. In the House of Commons this feature of the Bill has been gravely discussed, and outside the House much dislike for it has been expressed. We shall see whether the Lords, at the instigation of the clerical peers, will endeavour to force further concessions to the sects. They may do so, and in that case serious difficulties will arise; but we are by no means sure that the average peer really cares more for extreme clericalism than the average churchman in general does, and that is not much.

FEW things impair men's reverence for human nature more than war.—Channing.

BOER HOME INDUSTRIES.

A MOST interesting report was issued last March by the "Boer Home Industries and Aid Society," telling by means of extracts from her letters of the admirable work done by Miss Emily Hobhouse and her helpers during the past year among the Boer women and girls. We quote the introduction to the report:—

"Travelling through the country districts of the Orange River Colony and the Transvaal in 1903, Miss Hobhouse was deeply impressed by the destitution in which she found large numbers of the people living. Owing to the character of the country, the scarcity of water, of wood, of fodder and other materials, the difficulty of starting agriculture again after the denudation of the country war, except for those who had capital, almost insuperable. Miss Hobhouse was able to administer relief from the fund entrusted to her in some urgent cases, but for permanent amelioration it occurred to her that it would be possible in the farmers' homes to supplement agriculture by domestic industries.

"Having mastered the details of lace-making and wool-weaving, Miss Hobhouse sailed for South Africa at the beginning of last year, with two lady assistants. How she has started her plan, both in the Orange Colony and the Transvaal, and has carried the enterprise to success—at least in its initial stages—is described by herself in the following letters, written week by week to her friends in England. These are published without substantial alteration, except for the omission of personal matters and household details.

"The possibility of using the wool of the South African sheep for weaving into clothes, rugs, and carpets, pointed to a homelier form of industry than that of lace-making, and one more likely to commend itself to the Boers. Their knowledge of the special dyes to be found on the veldt added, as will be seen from these letters, a new chance of success."

The first letter is dated from Philippolis, in the Orange River Colony, March 9, 1905, and the last from the same place, February 4 of this year. In August, last year, Miss Hobhouse wrote from Langlaagte, near Johannesburg. Her efforts met with eager and grateful response, and as soon as it was seen what the experiment meant the fathers of the girls with whom a beginning had been made sent to ask if they might come and copy the wheels and looms for home use. They had also two knitting machines, and here is the first example of their use:—

"H.' has made rapid strides with the machine in this week's teaching, and triumphantly carried home her work to show her father last night. She is the daughter of one of the elders of the church, and her mother died in Bethulie Camp. In order to come to us she gets up at 2.30 a.m. to wash, bake, and iron, to be free at 8 o'clock. She has her little brothers and sisters to be-mother, so six hours at the machine, in addition to her home work, is pretty hard for a delicate girl; but she won't give in. Other wants to learn this also, and we do wish our funds would run to a couple more; but they are rather expensive, £13 apiece. Harrison's Knitting Company, in Oxford-street, where we got them, packed them beautifully, and they arrived uninjured."

"My great interest and anxiety at this juncture," Miss Hobhouse added, "is how best to deal with the wool of the country. We want to use what is here, and not import, if possible, and for this purpose I am training all to spin. But the wool is very different to our English wool, and so at first I have myself to try endless experiments with it to see for what purposes it is most suitable, and how to prepare it.

"First there is the merino of exquisite quality, very soft but rather short and not of staying power for hard wear. I can spin very fine with it, like Shetland, and I think it will make excellent soft flannel. Next there is a coarse mixed wool, and this, I hope, will make strong rugs and carpets, and perhaps a little mixed with the merino will strengthen that and make it useful for stockings. Then there is black wool, and, lastly, the lovely Angora goats abound, which yield the soft mohair, and I look forward to experimenting upon that. Once we have learnt the merits and demerits of our raw material, we shall know better how to shape our plans."

How the experiment prospered must be read in the report itself. It is a record of high courage and practical capacity, which has already begun to produce the happiest results. The teachers were in difficulty for lack of enough spinning wheels, and an October letter tells of how it was partly met.

"The promise of the Swiss spinning wheels has brightened our whole horizon. I hear of 60 or 70 already packed in Basle, and of more preparing. It is most touching that the Swiss people should be willing to give up their wheels that have often been generations in the family. I shall only give them to very picked pupils. The Bloemfontein Farmers' Association have sent me a present of the fleeces of three sheep. General Botha has promised to send me a bale."

The weaving has also prospered, and Miss Hobhouse wrote from her second centre at Langlaagte:—"We mean to specialise in rugs, carpets, and mats." We understand that some of the rugs and patterns of woven materials were exhibited at the last exhibition of the Home Arts and Industries at the Albert Hall, where they were much admired.

Friends who are interested in South Africa should send for this report; and we may add that while, by very careful management and the kindness of subscribers, and gifts of wheels, knitting machines, and raw material, it has been possible to carry on the work so far, some time must elapse before it can become self-supporting. Further contributions are greatly needed. The treasurer is Miss Margaret Clark, Millfield, Street, Somerset.

THE Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., of Chatham, is going out to Cape Town, and will preach for three months in the Free Protestant Church, to release the Rev. R. Balmforth for a greatly needed holiday. Mr. Davis sails on August 10 by the Union Castle Line s.s. Goorkha.

THE REVIVAL NEEDED.*

By THE REV. CHARLES ROPER, B.A.

"THE voice of one that crieth, Prepare ye in the wilderness the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." (Isaiah xl. 3-5.)

Unitarians are not likely to underestimate the intellectual, theological side of their faith, and I do not wish to be thought to value it at all lightly. It is encouraging to realise that our heaven is working powerfully in all the churches; and that the opinions we formerly advocated, like one crying in the wilderness, are being more and more accepted by our fellow-Christians of every denomination. What we want now, however, is an accentuation of the practical side of our religion. A genuine revival would prove our salvation. A revival that recognised that man is head as well as heart, and heart as well as head. Men and women are sometimes easily stirred by religious emotion; but when the stimulating cause is removed, they become their old selves again, too often. Emotion by itself will never really save a man. It may make him bigoted, ungenerous, and self-centred unless at the same time his reason joins partnership, and rouses into healthy activity the whole man, and not merely one limited part of him. Nor do I wish to say that modern orthodox revivals have done no good. Any appeal that makes a man a soberer citizen, a kinder husband, a better father, if only for a month, has some virtue in it. I fear that the majority of our fellow-countrymen are yet too undeveloped to be wrought upon by rational argument, in all the concerns of life as they tend to elevate the moral sense, and secure the dominance of justice and righteousness. That time is yet to come, but I am confident it will come; nay, it must come, since God is God. We are apt to speak and act as if we believed in evolution only in so far as it affects man physically and socially; but if it is a true theory it applies to our humanity as a whole. Nothing that God has created stands still. God's work of creation is not finished. Strange and even unduly boastful though it may seem, God cannot do His work without the help of man. We are His instruments in the fashioning of perfect human life, and in devolving the resources of the earth. He has taken His human children, as it were, into partnership. Realise this, and the sense of responsibility will compel you ever to put forth your best effort in honour of the God who made and commissioned you.

I want to speak to you of the revival which I, as a Unitarian, think is the most needed in the world to-day. It is not a revival of antiquated beliefs; not a regalanising of the dead bones of obsolete theologies; not a confirmation of old dogmas and creeds, nor a making of new ones; not even "back to Jesus" in the ordinary sense of that phrase; but a fuller faith in God, in justice, in righteousness, and in human possibilities. I would not lose anything of value which the past has bequeathed to us; I would feel the thrill of religious trust and confidence, and the keen sense of individual responsibility which characterised Jesus and all the other prophets and seers in past ages; but I would have my thought and energy mindful of the future, intent upon gaining newer light, of understanding more of God's nature and laws, and of recognising more conscientiously both the divine and the human relationships of this mortal life. We want a revival fraught with enthusiasm and self-devotion, characterised with whole-hearted trust in God, and by less suspicion as to the use of the faculties and powers He has given us. We want a revival that looks upon man, in his essential being, as son of God, having within him potentialities of infinite extent, and that does not regard him as a mere worm, or object of wrath, so depraved and mean by nature as to be worthy of nothing from his Maker save contempt and condemnation. God has made man His son erect, so that he can look his Father in the face, and speak with Him face to face; and if only man will aspire to the best that is possible to him, and devote himself to finding out God's laws and obeying them, he will find approach towards the divine and perfect more easy, and the happiness and joy of his life will be increased marvellously. Unfortunately, revivals often tend to make men morbid, selfish and self-satisfied. We do not want men and women to segregate themselves from this wicked world, with the idea that by private prayer and penance they can make themselves acceptable to God, and ensure for themselves salvation in a future world.

"Heaven's gate is shut to him who comes alone;

Save thou a soul, and it shall save thine own."

We want a revival which shall send men and women not merely to the penitent form, and not merely make them pray and sing; but which shall drive them by an irresistible impelling inward force of love and sympathy and holy ambition into the humanising work of the world; to infuse righteous principles into all business transactions; to direct civic energies towards the sweeping away of our slums, to brightening of the environment of the poor, the better and truer education of their children, the payment of nothing less than a living wage to any man willing to work, the control of the drink traffic, the denunciation of laws and customs which in the least degree wink at any form of vice whatever.

These things, however, are as a rule, secondary in the so-called religious revivals which have their rise amongst the least enlightened of the people. Now, theology does not save, whether it is good or bad. Confession and profession do not save, of themselves; they are means to an end, that end being higher, holier, practical life. How lamentable and farcical it is to learn that bishops and archbishops, while recognising the imperfections of their Church service, still declare themselves bound to maintain the principles laid down by prejudiced and quarrelsome and fanatical ecclesiastics in the first six centuries. As if God had said all He had got to say about thirteen hundred years ago, and had been dumb ever since. We may not live to see it, but sooner or later a revival will come which will utterly discard the so-called ancient authorities both of Church and Book; which will command men to stand upon their feet as in the living presence of God, to hear His living voice speaking in the language of the twentieth century, and to see His wonders, not through the eyes of purblind sages, who lived thousands of years ago, but with their own eyes and in their own land! Just imagine what would be likely to happen if such a revival were to occur to-day, and were to touch the cultured and thoughtful classes of the community. Suppose we had a national parliament of men whose lips had been touched by coals off God's own altar! What, think you, would be the entire drift of our legislation? Would there be a clashing of class interests? Would there be this disgraceful squabbling over an Education Bill? Should we hear of Bills being passed for the special benefit of clergy or landlords or brewers at the expense of their fellows? Would so much money be spent on armaments and so little on education, and, practically nothing on the general welfare of the old, the degraded, and the starving? Would there be so much time wasted in personal bickerings and party disputes? Could these, and so many other defects and shortcomings exist if the members of Parliament had all been so rebaptized with true religious fervour as to set God on their throne of state, and to make all their proceedings subservient to His laws of justice and of love? Why does not this state of things prevail even now? I fear that the churches, which ought to have worked for this consummation, are largely to blame. The State Church is like an idol of brass or wood or stone. It cannot grow, and, therefore, has no healthy life. It was made with man's hands, and swathed with cast iron creeds, and labelled "infallible" as if it came from God; indeed, people did at last regard it as of divine origin.

When Evan Roberts was stirring the heart of the Welsh nation a year or so ago, it is said that two gentlemen left London for South Wales in order to "see" the revival. They alighted at a little railway station and asked the ticket collector if he could tell them where the revival was. Placing his hand on his heart, he said, "Gentlemen, it is here, underneath the buttons." The revival the world needs must be underneath the hat as well as underneath the waistcoat. People will rise as one man in that day, and demand a reason for the faith that is in them.

I have spoken of the change needed in our national government; but what about our municipal affairs? Better laws we need; and yet we have by no means exhausted the possibilities of improvement under the present laws. Imagine the town councillors of any corporate borough in this country being moved and controlled by the spirit of such a religious revival as I have indicated. What a swilling out of many an Augean stable there would be! How elevated the discussions in the council chambers would become. Elections would no longer be fought on purely "party politics" lines. The most qualified citizens would vie with each other in seeking such posts of honour and usefulness. No labour would be too onerous for them that had for its object the intellectual and moral elevation of the people; aye, and no complaint would be made about high rates if only they were spent wisely about the sanitary and ethical well-being of the populace. In such a community infant mortality would be less shocking than it now is, and children generally would not only be healthier and happier, but would also start in the race of life with more equal opportunity all the way round. A civic spirit like this would co-ordinate itself with an abounding philanthropy; men and women would be rivals only in good altruistic work, trying each to do more than the others towards establishing the kingdom of God on earth. Yes, we want a revival which shall not merely increase our church membership, but infuse more of the spirit of Christ's gospel into our everyday business and social and philanthropic life.

Now I contend that whatever people do and think outside the churches, we who are inside ought to set an example which they may profitably imitate. We who know what religion is, what it demands of a man, we who believe in a God who desires the development of all His children in goodness and knowledge, ought so to live in the workaday world as that our conduct and character may be an incentive and inspiration to all who know us. "The world wants examples." It will not do for a man to be professedly religious at the Sunday services, and yet go into the world on Monday with many mean little blemishes of character which he is fool enough to think other people do not see; but which his children see, and are cursed by his example; his fellows in the street, in the mart, in social affairs, see them, and by their actions seem to conclude that what's good enough for so regular a Church-goer is also good enough for them. Alas! that there should be even so much as one of these men to bring discredit upon religion and Church-going as a whole.

How do we stand in relation to this question? If my Unitarianism does not involve all this I have long been under a delusion. The doctrine of one all-loving Father God, salvation through character and not creed, works rather than belief, of man's position as co-worker with God, that what a man sows that also must he reap, of infinite progress in God's eternity—surely this gospel strikes you, as it does me, as being the most inspiring and most beautiful the world ever had preached to it. Personally, I cannot for the life of me understand those few Unitarians one sometimes meets with, who deny that we have any obligation to carry the news of our faith to those outside our churches. My idea of a truly religious character is that it is of necessity stirred with an unquenchable desire to share with others the joys and raptures which itself feels. The old theologian's conception of religion is totally inadequate for the world to-day. With Unitarians religion is life; not the mere round of animal functions, but the healthy activity of a man as an intellectual, emotional, and reasonable being. It, therefore, involves rational conceptions of God, of human nature, and human duty. That being so, worship is not an end in itself; but it should bring us into a closer and felt relation to God, and it should inspire us to fulfil all the obligations of human brotherhood. True religion does not ignore but it recognises the fact that man is a social being, destined to work out his own salvation here below. Our churches, and all churches, need enthusiastic revival on these lines. The true success of a church is equivalent to the sense of individual responsibility characteristic of its members. The highest principle for which the church stands must arouse our zeal, and goad us to strenuous endeavour. Its members should say amongst themselves, "This piece of work in which we are engaged is for us as important as any ever engaged in by earnest men and women. The world needs our sincerest and most dogged effort as much as that of its greatest reformers." Let us remember that epoch-making reforms have been carried through by the force of mighty and ennobling aspirations. I remember the imprecations hurled at General Booth thirty years ago—fool, madman, enthusiast—while his officers, wherever they went, were treated by the populace as escaped lunatics; they were scoffed at, and beaten, and were unable to obtain convictions against their enemies in the Police Courts. Fifty years ago the old Chartists were imprisoned, slandered, derided, and held in contempt. They were enthusiastic, the world said they were stark mad. "But their heresy is to-day's orthodoxy." Earlier than that Wesley and Whitefield were called "mad fools" for endeavouring to rescue the nation from its moral and religious indifference, by vigorously arousing its emotional life, and by speaking truths extremely upsetting to those who indolently sniffed at the odour of sanctity amidst all the possible indulgences of life; but their enthusiasm prevailed. So, further back still, the severe sobriety of the Puritans was sneered at and scoffed at; they were also said to be mad enthusiasts for a principle; Enthusiasts and madmen are with certain cynical folk convertible terms; and yet who can deny that the world is moved on by just such people, rather than by the cold, calculating, self-complacent folk who say, "let well alone," because, forsooth, it happens to be well for them? Cannot we have a baptism of fire to-day, the fire of enthusiasm, which shall send us back to our various centres tremendous workers for righteousness, both inside and outside our churches?

Many a soul now grovelling in the dust of commonplace, frittering precious time away and doing nothing manfully, would be raised up, transfigured, and ennobled by enthusiasm. Does not the lesson of history teach us that the nation that has not its enthusiasts perishes as a matter of course, and deserves to perish? So also must it be with churches. Enthusiasm is the subtle current that sets aflame the hearts of the multitude; it may be strong enough to defy resistance; by it a man's true worth can be measured; it is a lever in a giant's hand to relieve and banish a nation's burden of poverty and sin and ignorance. The true saints of the world are its enthusiasts; binders of the broken heart; smiters of the oppressor; deliverers of the captive; healers of wrongs; teachers of the ignorant; aspirants after an ideal state; and truly they are more deserving of monuments and statues than conquering kings or diplomatic statesmen, for they are the true healers of nations, and deliverers of the world from its selfish indifference. What an enthusiast Jesus was! None save enthusiasts can fully appreciate and faithfully obey his two great commandments which are the foundation of our Unitarian faith. On the wings of fervour and enthusiasm only can we soar to the sublime height of divine communion with the Father Spirit. Be not deceived; the truly religious man must be enthusiastic. Let us measure our worth by this fact. If only we members of the Unitarian churches in this country displayed such enthusiasm that the critics should point the finger at us and shout in derision "Madmen!" "Fools!" the millennium would be within measurable distance. Alas! folk have come to regard us as cold, intellectual, and nothing more, undesirous of inviting others to join us in our worship and work, satisfied with things as they are, and so on.

Of course, I know this is a gross and unfriendly perversion of the truth. We have more warmth of spirit and devotional fervour than our traducers give us credit for; still, we want a great deal more. Personally I have not much faith in those churches that speak and act as if they had no special message to proclaim and no special work to do. No church can know the extent of its possibilities until it has tried its best, not spasmodically, but persistently over a term of years. A church is not a one man's business. Every member should act as if its success and reputation depended upon his interest and practical support. When a man says, "This is my church," he should realise what the true significance of that personal pronoun is, and what obligations it implies. When the same man says "This is my business, or my profession," he means a very great deal by the expression. He means that he is putting his best thought and strength into it; that he is grasping every opportunity of making it known, and if it has any superiority over other businesses of a similar character, he is not slow to declare the fact.

In conclusion, friends, what is more important than the dissemination of the religious spirit? the awakening in men's minds of a sense of relationship with the Almighty who has endowed us for a purpose, and sent us into the world to do His work, and to bear testimony to His love and His fatherhood? Is there any conceivable obligation more ennobling than that which appeals to the conscience of a truly religious man? What a heritage we have! Think of the noble souls who have fought and won for us the privileges we enjoy; the freedom, the knowledge, the culture of our common life! Is it not morally binding upon us to hand on that heritage to posterity enriched? To spread abroad a knowledge of God's word and will until it covers the earth as the waters cover the channels of the deep? We have in our churches a lever that can move the world. Yes, marvellous as it may seem! Scientists now tell us that waves set in motion here by sound or electricity encircle the earth, although we may not have instruments sufficiently sensitive to register them. So also the moral and religious influences which emanate from a church girdle the earth, and in their measure affect humanity as a whole. Who can tell what fervent souls inspired and magnetised by our enthusiasm will, in the exigencies of life, go to dwell in remote lands, and become centres of uplifting influence there, bringing men to God, and stirring them to self-sacrificing effort? May God grant our churches a succession of enthusiasts. May there be a goodly number of us here this day who may have the honour of being called by that name; men and women inspired to grapple with the demons of darkness; who are faithful, courageous, and undaunted; who in their zeal for truth despise mere shibboleths and conventionalities, and who aim at mercy, justice, and love; who will take any man by the hand if he honestly aims at the highest truth in opinion and conduct. There are vices in society which thrive upon the ignorance and poverty of the multitude. We want enthusiasts who can arouse the heart of this nation religiously; who can grapple, as with unholy dragons, with the accursed evils of poverty, immorality, and ungodliness; and who fearlessly ignore the imprecations of the worldly-minded, and the jeers of the indifferent; who will scorn to pander to any prejudice, or to be deterred by the hysterics of threatened interests; men and women who have the true undying Christian spirit within them; and who will strike for freedom and truth and love as unhesitatingly and boldly as Jesus himself would do were he amongst us to-day.

We ought to expect our churches to breed and train and inspire such men and women. What are you and I going to do to secure this God-desired consummation? A mighty trust is placed upon us. We are divinely commissioned. One is our God on earth and in heaven. Let us obey His laws and carry out His heavenly commands with zeal, devotion, and enthusiasm.

IMPRESSIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

II.

EVENING, and a sunset to be remembered. Masses of rose-coloured clouds filling the Western sky, red tints on distant hills otherwise almost black in the fading light. Away to the south a heavy rain falling on a group of heights has been caught and shot through by this light till it looks like a great fiery mist. Overhead the stars begin to show. In front, some half mile away, a line of trees, black against the sky, marks the point where a tableland, flat as the proverbial pancake, sinks into the cañon of a creek whose waters, fuller than is usual, sound faintly up to where we sit. And we sit entirely happy, our two selves and our host, in the little wooden verandah of a little one-roomed wooden house—16 ft. by 12 ft.—to which, however, in anticipation of our visit, there has been added this same verandah, and a kitchen—8 ft. by 12 ft.—which opens on the verandah, and is not yet closed by a door. A door there is to the inner room through the kitchen, but you do not take the key away when the whole establishment leaves for the day, such a precaution being wholly unnecessary. And this house our host has built himself; and now we are supposed to be "roughing it"—save the mark! For within what can be more comfortable than the clean white wooden walls and gabled roof, the neatly-oiled cloth-covered floor, and the two little beds with their snowy linen? For the time being the rightful occupier has pitched himself a tent alongside. For dining-room we have choice of kitchen and verandah with its fine view, and generally prefer the latter.

This, then, is a bachelor's "shack" on the "bench" above Kelowna, and in a week's residence in such a place one learns how extremely comfortably one can get along without nine-tenths of what he considers necessary at home; learns also an increasing admiration for the adaptability and skilfulness with which men, experienced in such manner of life, turn their hands to all manner of things—from house building to excellent cooking.

The "benches" are a succession of curious very flat tablelands, lying some five miles back from Kelowna, along the river side, and the first of them rising sharply some 150 ft. above the lower valley level. Most unpromising looking places in their native state, dry, sparsely covered with vegetation of a prevailing greyish green tint when the sunflowers are not out—with much large and small stone bedded in their surface. Yet here is the latest development of fruit growing. The land is ploughed, the stones gathered up, water brought from the hills in irrigating channels—wooden flumes or open ditches—and apples, cherries, peaches, and other trees are springing up all round in long rows and flourishing exceedingly. Cut up into 10, 20 or 40 acre lots, most of which have already their little wooden houses and outbuildings, it is the scene of an energetic and promising industry, the details of which are extremely interesting. Very beautiful it is to see the young trees answering to the care bestowed upon them in their vigorous growth and healthy appearance. In between them you will find crops of potatoes, onions, strawberries, raspberries, and other small stuff, and, when the land is not vigilantly "cultivated," most vigorous crops of weeds, with masses (at our time) of a strong growing purplish blue flower, not identified by us.

Not every one can have such happy experiences of this kind of life as was ours, for rarely will so much care be given to making all ready and pleasant for the visitor, and rarely can one hope to experience so much courtesy and hospitality from neighbours far and near; but surely for every one of us town dwellers in the old country life would become the larger for such an experience of how simple it can be made without letting go any essential of well-being.

It does not seriously hurt one to clean his own boots occasionally, nor empty his own wash basin, especially if its contents go to assist the growth of some promising young peach; nor to do an occasional "sweeping out"—these being the present writer's principal contributions to the ménage; while it is distinctly interesting to watch the others engaged in the more delicate operations of cooking and bed-making. Plenty of cool clean water, plenty of good food, books, the continual interest of studying the young trees, new acquaintances every day, dinners out, teas out, a great picnic, long walks, cool silent nights broken only by an occasional howl of the coyote (wolf), fair weather; and all this is wound up by a grand afternoon tea in our own verandah, which included several ladies, divers men folks, and two quite live 'babies', regaled on excellent home-made cake and tea; then the quiet of the great sunset, and then, alas! once more upon the move towards scenes no doubt more grand and strange, but none to leave a more happy recollection for future years.

* * * *

That the essence of comfort lies in the adaptation of oneself to the environment. That the essence of the C.P.R. considered as an environment is expense; ergo, that the attempt to do it cheaply, &c., &c.—such are the midnight meditations of one who vainly asks himself, "Hast any philosophy in thee, fool?" as he counts the weary hours in a day car of the West-bound train. "Let us for once avoid the expense of a 'Sleeper,'" said Virtue; and thereafter vainly sought her reward, as she slowly, very slowly, passed from long and uncomfortable wakefulness to short uneasy dreams.

But, as light begins at last to grow, is this dream or reality that breaks upon tired eyes? How many hundreds of feet away, and how awfully steeply down below rushes that swollen stream so swiftly towards the sea? How short a distance across it, and to what soaring heights above us rise those rocky walls and inaccessible slopes? In their gaps what visions of still loftier summits dull white against the sky! What a mad nightmare of a railway writhing down such a Gehenna of a valley, clinging frantically to its almost impossible sides, winding and twisting along their rugged rocks and slippery slopes, and vaulting their ravines and waterfalls! How soon will this wild dream end in one big plunge down to those boiling waters that shall once for all give rest to the poor, panting, snorting engine—and to ourselves? For it is not long since we looked on one of these powerful monsters whom fate had so overtaken. There he lay, far below, wheels in the air, his incessant journeyings ended at last. Now, surely, we too must plunge and—but more light comes and greater wakefulness, and we recognise that it is no dream but the great Thompson Cañon in one of its wildest parts, and seen in an unusually weird, uncanny light.

Soon the sun strikes in, and as hour after hour we wind down towards the sea, and the Fraser Cañon succeeds to the Thompson, new elements of beauty and interest are added to the scene. There, high above (some say 1,000 feet), and across the river, crawls and clings the remains of the old "Voyageurs" track along the face of the rock. Far away below perches an Indian village or burial ground on some little promontory. Here an Indian fishing station—slight structure of branches and of boughs—overhangs the boiling flood. Now we pass through fine bushes of the purest white syringa in full bloom; now again it is great masses of white or pink spirea, that add grace to the savageness of the scene. Then, with full daylight, comes a chance of welcome tea, which finally wakens one to the consciousness that it is the part of wisdom to leave to guide-books the description of such places and be content with criticising their work as at once exaggerated and inadequate. We shall see it all again under other conditions—dreamlike also, in a persistent, quivering, blazing sunlight; very beautiful and grand, but it needs the dim light of earliest morning to bring out its full significance of suggestion.

* * * *

The cañons are past, the great river has broadened out and become navigable, with stretches of fertile land between it and the encompassing mountains; Yale—once the crowded scene of such a lawless, cruel, greedy, gold-besotten life, now an almost deserted village—lies behind us. We have left our noisy train on its way to the not distant Pacific coast. All is quiet and most peaceful around us, as in the hot sun of a late June morning, on the bank of a broad, swift stream, just about, under the shadow of a noble snow-streaked mountain, to mingle its waters with those of the Fraser, we embark ourselves and our belongings in a not too large rowing-boat. It is the Harrison River, famous for its fish. Pleasant indeed is it after the roar and rattle of the train, to glide leisurely up its green waters, basking in the growing heat and listening to the garrulous conversation of our crew, 'Mike,' a Swede of many experiences, as he expounds our new surroundings to us.

* * * *

And here beginneth the dream of the Harrison River. Other places we have seen of which we shall read again or hear others speak. Not so, probably, of this. Therefore, as the years pass on in the noise and smoke and worry of English town life, this shall become to us more and more of a dream—or, rather, many mingling dreams.

It is a dream of coming slowly up the broad river, slowly across the shallow bay into which it expands, and from which later on its waters will recede, leaving rich grazing ground, with no sign of house or home ahead, only a great wood backed by lofty cliffs to which the trees cling till they are baulked by absolute precipice; of entering a narrow, shallow creek of marvelously clear water, and winding with it slowly in and out among low woods and flowering shrubs; of a halt at last just as it seems coming to an end; of a few steps through the wood into a great clearing with monstrous blackened stumps and stems of trees still waiting to be blasted out with dynamite and finally cleared away; of a garden patch at the end of this, and a house beyond that; of forest ringing round it all, and mountain rising steeply up behind.

It is a dream of a house all wood save plastered walls and ceilings, large and well designed, with shaded balconies and cool sitting-rooms, with floors carpeted only with skins of bear and wild cat shot close about it, with broad, easy stairways and restful bedrooms and clean, sweet linen, nay even with a delightful bathroom—house built almost entirely by the cunning hands of its owner and the aforesaid Swede.

It is a dream of a most kindly welcome and kindly treatment in that house; of a hostess, bright and indefatigable, cooking good meals of plain food for you, and presiding over your table as she shares them with you, full of conversation, laughter, and interest in you—most cheery of hard-working little women; of a host who in his time has set himself to many tasks, and now faces the reduction of 1,200 acres of forest into the order of a home, and meanwhile adds to its revenues by sharing its charms with wanderers and sportsmen who are drawn that way—a resourceful man of many experiences and wonderful stories of fishing and hunting and forest craft; of a fine young son just fresh from school and hesitating between the attractions of such a home and University life; of a few other guests, new and interesting types, a veteran officer of the old Federal Army, and a sportsman deeply learned in the ways of fish—all friendly and kindly; of a few children playing round.

It is a dream of great trees, soaring above us for 250 or even 300 feet—cedars, Douglas firs and pines, exquisitely beautiful in life, grand but rather sad in death; of soft, thick coating mosses inches deep on their trunks, of lichens trailing from their boughs; of lesser trees, maples and cottonwoods, attaining perhaps only a poor 150 feet; of an undergrowth dense and cumbered with the limbs of ancient giants passing to decay, and fair with many lovely ferns; of a trail winding away through such a forest, mile after mile, with here and there the sunlight breaking across the deep shade; of the solemnness and the beauty and the grandeur of such a forest, and of long evening rambles in it.

It is a dream of floating hour after hour upon the swirling rapids of the big river in quest of its big fish, skilfully piloted by Auguste (most taciturn but reliable of Indians), and of trout and salmon captured there—also of those not caught; of the great fish-hawks and cranes and big black crows that floated round those waters; of distant snowy ranges and densely wooded or rocky mountains gazed on from them in an ever-varying light; of a morning up the river when the hills through which its bright green waters came pouring down to us seemed altogether unsubstantial and transparent in the misty light, gateways of a mysterious world; of passing up towards them by an Indian village and watching the Indians come and go in their light boats, using sail or oar, pole or paddle with equal skill, of one boatload of them gay in the brightest of red and yellow garments upon the green flood.

A dream of leaving the river, and, guided by our Indian friend, pushing up an old trail for a mountain lake, a trail almost grown over and closed up, where giant brackens and young cedar growths swept our faces and tangled above our heads, leading on to a wider way paved with rough logs and bordered by all kinds of shrubs in fruit and flower—raspberries, blackberries, blueberries, currants, gooseberries, and many another; of another plunge into a denser, darker wood, and then the lake—a blue sheet under sunlit cliffs, ringed round with noble living trees, backed by an army of the whitened stems of monarchs long since dead, which glowed almost fiercely in the tremendous sun.

It is a dream of another river with a wonderful Indian name that ran a wild course through the woods, and with a dozen boiling rapids in it from its rocky cañon in the hills down to the main stream, with cunning Indian fishing-places devised beside it, and Indian tents upon its banks; of a Sunday encampment there with all our household assembled for the midday meal; of the crackling fire and pleasant, friendly talk; of embarking on that river in a small dug-out seatless canoe, and being marvellously poled up it over the cruel-looking stones and up-hill through the bubbling white waters to the still pools at the foot of the cliff; of being still more marvellously shot down it, now through the bubbling white, then through the green, back-curling waves of deeper water that sometimes came on board, now sharply across till a smash on the bank seemed inevitable, and then a straight run down; of feeling the waters grip the tiny craft as she neared the beginning of each rapid; of the silent, skilful Indian who, with a touch of his paddle here and his pole there, and a judicious baling in the calmer reaches, brought us safely and fairly dry and supremely contented to its mouth.

A dream of wonderful stories of salmon that in the fall die by thousands in the creeks, and of bears and crows that gather together to devour them—stories of Indian life and ways, of gigantic trees, and the difficulties and dangers of a settler's life.

A dream, finally, of the ending of our dream in a sharp row against wind and time, in a hot sun, over dancing waters, back to the station, and a final awakening by the engine's familiar hoot to the sad fact that our faces are once more set towards the East.

EASTERN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Eastern Union was held at Diss on Thursday, July 19. There was a good attendance, consisting of fifty delegates and the members of the Park Fields Chapel, Diss. All the ministers of the district were present together with Mr. R. Hamblin (President), Messrs. Francis Taylor and R. Chenery (Diss); Mr. and Mrs. Scopes (Ipswich); Mr. D. C. Betts, Mr. and Mrs. James Motttram; Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Stevens; Councillor A. M. Stevens (Norwich); Miss Smith Bedford; Miss Mole (Yarmouth); Mrs. Jeffries (Hapton).

In the morning a religious service was conducted by the Rev. Wm. Birks (of Diss); the sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Roper, of Kilburn, and will be found in our present issue.

Over sixty sat down to luncheon in the Cornhall, after which the business meeting was held in the Park Fields Chapel.

MR. HAMBLIN took the chair, and in his address as President, after dealing with the Education Controversy, he said:—"To those whose faith in the old beliefs has gone, we try to show that the progress of science, if viewed aright, will make the foundation of religious belief broader and deeper, proclaiming as it does an unbroken harmony in creation and the onward and upward march of mankind, and thereby giving a new purpose and power to the life of man. But every step towards the higher life, whether in an individual or an organisation, means toil and self-denial, and the work fell on a few and not on the many. We must bear in mind that there are no bounds to spiritual growth. Though we may not have the satisfaction of seeing our numbers increase, we are thankful in the knowledge that much of the seed we have sown has borne fruit in quarters where we least expected. We must continue to be earnest, and to work with heart and will. Otherwise we shall be justly reproached for want of faith in our principles. We can all help the Union by taking a more active interest in the church to which we belong, for the more one works for his own church, the greater interest will he take in the cause generally, and the greater desire will he find for co-operation with other churches.

MR. FRANCIS TAYLOR welcomed the visitors to Diss. He said that they, in Diss, were cheered to see a larger congregation than they anticipated, especially considering how unfavourable the elements were in the early part of the day. The congregation at Diss was an old-established one with some traditions of which they might be proud. The members of the Union would visit during the afternoon the spot where stood the house once occupied by the Barbauds, and if time permitted, the graveyard where used to be the chapel which preceded the Park Fields Chapel. He and the Diss friends were heartily glad to have so many from the churches of the Union present with them that day.

MRS. MOTTRAM responded to the welcome. There was a great deal of pleasure in coming again to the old town of Diss and in experiencing once more the charm of restfulness and peace which the chapel gave them. Their meeting might be of great service to them, for there was nothing like personal touch to unite isolated thoughts.

MR. W. J. SCOPES also responded.

THE SECRETARY (REV. ALFRED HALL) then read the report. The churches in East Anglia had suffered serious losses by death. Some of them had to mourn the departure of friends whose counsel and generosity had done much to sustain the cause of the Union in the different centres. Reference was made in particular to Mr. C. F. Dear, who did excellent work as a lay preacher in the Eastern Counties. Mr. Bruce Leach, of Yarmouth; Miss Emma Taylor, of Diss; Mrs. Sidney Courtauld, of Braintree; and Mr. E. G. Reeve, of Norwich. The Committee, however, were glad to note from the reports received from the various churches that, notwithstanding these losses, the cause was in a healthful condition. They regretted, however, that services had been discontinued at Lynn, but some of the enthusiastic members were continuing the work of the Sunday-school in the hope that some day they would again have a settled minister. During the winter months fortnightly services had been conducted at Bury St. Edmunds by the Rev. Frederic Allen. There was good prospect that before the next annual meeting the building of the Martineau Memorial would be commenced, for which subscriptions were still urgently needed. Special services had been conducted at Ipswich, Norwich, and Yarmouth, with the assistance of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE TREASURER read his balance-sheet, and also, in the absence of Miss S. S. Dowson, the report of the Postal Mission, which showed that the demand for our literature had been increased through the attacks made upon Unitarians by the Torrey-Alexander Mission. The Eastern Union branch of Postal Mission work was most successful and influential.

MR. SELBY moved with pleasure the adoption of the reports, especially that of the Postal Mission, which he regarded as most important work for our Eastern Counties.

THE REV. W. J. POND (Long Sutton) seconded, and a vote of thanks was heartily passed to Miss Dowson.

REV. WM. BIRKS spoke of the welcome he had received at Diss from ministers of other denominations, and of the broadening spirit of the time.

MR. MARK STEVENS thanked the B. and F. U. Association for its financial help and encouragement to the smaller churches. Thanks were also due to the Association for sending as its representative the Rev. Charles Roper, whose sermon had been helpful to all who heard it. They did not forget that Mr. Roper was a Norwich boy.

REV. JOHN BIRKS (Yarmouth) seconded.

THE REV. C. ROPER said he was glad to come to Diss as representative of the B. and F. U. A. The association would be glad if not only the Eastern, but all the Unions would do more work, and so have more grounds for claims upon them. If they helped themselves more he was sure the association would help them more. He did not think there was a case on record where the association had refused to contribute to the support of a movement which had been taken in hand by enthusiastic and generous workers. He thought that a van was as much needed in the Eastern Counties as anywhere in the country, for here were numerous men and women who had no opportunity of hearing our Gospel unless we thus went to them.

The Rev. ALFRED HALL said if the laity of their district, with support from outside, would furnish the van, they could rest assured that the ministers of the district would readily give their service and man the van.

On the proposal of Mr. R. H. FULLER, seconded by the Rev. LUCKING TAVARNER, Mr. W. H. Scott, of Norwich, was elected president for the year.

The Rev. A. E. RUMP proposed, and Rev. R. NEWELL seconded, the officers for the coming year.

Afterwards the visitors were taken for a drive in the district, a halt being made at the spot where the Barbauld house once stood. After tea Mrs. Tye and Miss Day (of Ipswich) gave some musical selections.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen (Church Hall Opening).—The hall which forms the lower storey of the new Unitarian Church in course of erection in Skene-street, was opened on Sunday for public worship, the services being conducted by the Rev. S. M. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass. At the morning service Dr. Crothers took for his text Rev. xxii. 17: "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely," and spoke of the world-wide movement in which that church would have part—a movement not for the teaching of one special form of creed, or for sectarianism on the old lines, but for some better way of organising the religious life. The way of freedom in the organisation of religion was his special subject. Why was it that the Unitarian Church pleaded for religious liberty and at the same time asked for loyalty to a religious organization? He thought it was because persons were coming to see that the Church, the Church purified, enlarged, spiritualised, and rationalised was one of the great hopes for the future. They were seeing that something more than personal liberty was needed for the well being of men, that it was not possible for each one alone to work out any great salvation. Multitudes of men working together were able to produce more than the same number of men working otherwise. There were three kinds of organisation, the result of age-long experience, which had come down to them, and in which each one of them believed—the organisation of the home, organization of the State, and the organisation of the school. He believed they should look upon the Church in the same way as on the home, the school, and the State. The Church had had superstition, but the State also had had superstition; the divine right of the Church to dictate as to what constituted salvation was at the same stage of civilisation as the divine right of kings, and both went before larger knowledge. When he asked himself to what Church he wanted to belong he said he wanted to belong to the whole Church, not to one Church but to everyone of them, in so far as they sought to do the Divine work of uplifting human souls. If he had his own way he would go to the biggest Church, the oldest Church, the best established Church, and he would make only one condition, that was that he might come in just as he was and that he might come in absolutely honest. But those conditions he could not find in the Roman Catholic Church, or in the great Presbyterian Churches, which demanded the acceptance of doctrines which were quite impossible to him as a condition of membership. He must belong to a free Church. In such a Church they had great opportunities of rendering service to their fellow men. There was a large attendance at the service, and again in the evening. The opening of the new church itself, it will be remembered, is fixed for Sunday, September 23.

Bedfield: Suffolk Village Mission.—The anniversary of the Sunday-school has just been celebrated. It lasted about a week, from Thursday to Tuesday, including Sunday, July 22, when Mr. H. G. Chancellor came down from London to give the annual address in the chapel in the afternoon, and to take part in the open-air service with the village missionary, Mr. Newell, in the evening, at Monk Soham. A very good congregation met on both occasions. In the evening about 100 people came together from Bedingfield, Bedfield, Worlingworth, Monk Soham, and Framlingham, and listened attentively to the addresses of the speakers. On the Thursday 22 people, comprising teachers and elder scholars, travelled by an open van to Diss, a distance of 13 miles, to take part in the annual summer meeting of the Eastern Union of Churches. Mr. Taylor's beautiful gardens were thrown open to the visitors, drives to Palgrave and Redgrave Water, lunch and tea in the Corn Hall, and other attractions were provided, and the visit was greatly enjoyed. The following Tuesday was the younger children's day, when a most successful excursion to Framlingham Castle was made.

Bournemouth.—The church has been thoroughly cleaned and redecorated, and the electric light put in. Its appearance is much improved by the addition of a centre aisle. The re-opening services on July 22 were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Crothers, whose impressive and eloquent addresses were greatly appreciated. The annual congregational picnic took place on July 25 and was a great success, a large number being present.

Crewkerne.—On Sunday, July 29, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held, and were most successful. The minister (Rev. A. Sutcliffe, B.A.) preached morning and evening, when the scholars, assisted by the chapel choir, sang special music, and Mr. E. J. Blake gave an address to the school in the afternoon. There was a large gathering on each occasion, the chapel in the evening being very crowded.

Harrogate.—Sunday evening services are being held during the summer months at the Scotch Tea Rooms, Royal Arcade. The first of the series was held on July 22 and was conducted by Rev. Chas. Hargrove, who took as his subject, "What Unitarianism Means." The second was held last Sunday, July 29, and was conducted by Rev. A. H. Dolphin, who spoke on "The Days of the Wider Outlook." Good congregations assembled on both occasions. Unitarian visitors will, perhaps, be glad to know that the services will continue each Sunday up to and including September 9.

Knutsford.—A sale of work and garden party was held at Grove House last Saturday, through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. George Holt. The sale was opened by Mrs. Richard Peyton, of Birmingham, who was supported by Mr. and Mrs. G. Holt, Mr. Alfred Holt, Mrs. Alfred Holt, jr., Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Beard, the Rev. G. A. Payne, and other friends. Neighbouring churches were well represented. The object of the sale was to provide funds for the extension and improvement of the schoolroom of Brook-street Chapel. The proceeds amounted to £101 7s. 6d.

London: Blackfriars.—The Rev. J. H. Smith, of Deal, is to preach in Stamford-street Chapel the first three Sundays of the present month.

London: Mansford-street.—The twenty-second annual flower show in connection with the Window Gardening Society, took place on July 24. Of 300 plants sold at the beginning of May, 134 were brought in for exhibition. The geraniums, both pink and scarlet, made a most creditable show, and it was remarked that the plants of the children's section were better even than those of the adults. Fuchsias, too, showed up well, but the begonias this season were decidedly poor. The judge, Mr. G. H. Ellis, awarded some twelve or fourteen prizes, which during the evening were presented by Mrs. Wallace Bruce; the Rev. H. Gow being in the chair. Prizes were also given for the best arrangement of flowers for "table decoration"; for the best buttonhole of home-grown flowers, and for the best bunch of wild flowers gathered by the children and judged at the annual excursion. During the past winter some 100 hyacinths and 300 crocuses had been grown for competition, and the awards for these were distributed during the evening. Miss Gould and Mr. Arthur Thompson provided some music.

London: Stepney.—For the second time, through the kindness of the teachers at Unity Church, Islington, the two schools have had a united summer treat, at Hadleigh Woods, on July 17. Thanks are tendered to the friends through whose generosity the cost was defrayed.

Maidstone.—Miss Peggy Farquharson, daughter of the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, who has just completed her curriculum at the Physical Training College, Chelsea, under Fraulein Wilke, has been appointed on the staff of Queen's College, Harley-street, W., as mistress of physical development. Under the Board of Education, Miss Farquharson passed all her subjects in the senior division, six of them with honours, and she has gained the college diploma with distinction.

North-East Lancashire Sunday-school Union.—The third meeting of the year was held at Rawtenstall, on Saturday, July 21. The meeting was presided over by Mr. J. W. Hird, of Colne, and a paper was read by the Rev. J. Islan Jones, of Accrington, on "The Moral and Religious Training of the Young." Whilst disclaiming any new suggestions, the essayist said that he believed the secular system of instruction in the Day schools to be the only possible method of dealing with the religious difficulty. There still remained the fact that children could only be considered to have been properly educated who had had moral and religious training, as well as secular. A child was entitled to this training—it was its birthright—therefore, he suggested that Sunday-school teaching should be compulsory. The parents should have the choice of school to suit their religious views, but the children should be compelled to attend at least once every Sunday. If secular instruction was compulsory, why not religious instruction also, in order to complete the education which is essential to make the complete man or woman. The paper aroused considerable discussion, in which the Rev. A. W. Fox, Rev. J. E. Jenkins, Mr. J. S. Mackie, Mr. Lowcock and Mr. J. T. Harrison took part, Mr. Jones replying. An interesting meeting was closed with hymn and benediction.

Pudsey.—The annual flower services were held last Sunday. The Rev. W. Rosling preached morning and evening, and assisted at the afternoon service, when an address was given by Mrs. Ceredig Jones.

Scarborough (Unveiling of Portrait Memorial).—On Sunday, July 29, after morning service, an enlarged photograph of the late Mr. H. J. Morton, J.P., was unveiled in the schoolroom of the Westborough Church. The portrait has been subscribed for by nearly a hundred members of the Church and friends, and is appropriately placed in the schoolroom, where Mr. Morton's genial, kindly presence so often made itself felt in the various gatherings of school and congregation. Mr. Arthur Bailey occupied the chair, and referred in sympathetic terms to the affection with which all who knew Mr. Morton would hold him, and said that that portrait would serve to perpetuate his memory in their hearts. Miss C. A. Wurtzburg also spoke, characterising the chief features of Mr. Morton's life as simplicity and singleness of aim. She referred also to the special interest he took in the Sunday-school, the scholars of which, she hoped, would always cherish his memory. Miss Wurtzburg then unveiled the portrait (which bears the plain inscription, "H. J. Morton, J.P., 1819-1905"), and the Rev. Ottwell Binns closed the brief and simple ceremony with words of prayer.

South Wales Unitarian Association.—The annual meetings were held at Cribyn, Cardiganshire, on July 25 and 26, when all the Welsh ministers were present, and also the Revs. T. J. Jenkins, Hinkley, the president; E. Ceredig Jones, Bradford; and Jenkyn Thomas, Rawtenstall. The meetings commenced with a conference at 5 o'clock on Wednesday to consider the present ebb in the supply of ministers in Wales. The matter was introduced by the Rev. R. J. Jones, Aberdare. Several speakers took part in the discussion. The subject will be further discussed at a future meeting. At 7 o'clock there was a religious service, when two sermons were delivered by the Rev. D. R. Davies, Rhondda, and D. J. Evans, Cumbach. The committee of the Association met at 8 on Thursday morning, and continued its deliberations till 10.15. There was an excellent attendance both of ministers and lay representatives. The president for the coming year is Captain Davies, [Llwynrhydowen]; the vice-president, the Rev. D. J. Evans, Cumbach. The morning service commenced at 10.30, the devotional part being taken by the Rev. J. Davies. The president, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Hinckley, then delivered his address, his subject being "The Church and its Work." The address was delivered with great earnestness, and made a deep impression on those who heard it. The association sermon was delivered by the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas Rawtenstall. He was followed by the Rev. R. J. Jones, Aberdare. In the evening two sermons were again delivered by the Revs. D. Rees, Bridgend, and J. H. Davies, Cefn-Coed. The services, especially those of Thursday, which were held in the open air, were very numerous attended, 500 being present on Thursday afternoon and evening.

Wakefield.—There have been three places of worship used in succession by this congregation, one at Flanshaw-lane, nearly two miles from the centre of Wakefield, which did duty from 1672 to 1697; another near Westgate-common, opened by Oliver Heywood in the latter year, and the present Westgate Chapel, which was erected in 1752. Each of these had an adjoining graveyard, in which there were numerous interments, as the ecclesiastical authorities commonly refused to grant burial facilities in consecrated ground. The first and second of these have long been closed, and, indeed their very existence has only been known to those interested in the history of Wakefield nonconformity. Of late years, however, there has been a strong desire to improve and protect that which did duty during the eighteenth century, as many of those buried there were people of position, and among them three ministers. It was also repeatedly urged by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers that this restoration should be no longer deferred, as this old Campo Santo of the Protestant Dissenters is one of the sacred memorials of the city, and is associated with some stirring chapters of its earlier annals. Being assured of considerable support from his congregation, as well as from friends outside, he issued a circular with an historical sketch of the old Puritan sanctuary, and an appeal for funds to re-build the half-ruined wall, and to take other all-necessary steps to guard the tombstones, about seventy in number, from gradual decay and wilful damage. £60 was the amount asked for, though it was expected that more would be required. The result has been extremely gratifying, as subscriptions were readily given, mostly in small sums by about a hundred people, about one-half being from members of the Established Church and other denominations, and on July 28 a sale of work was held in the grounds of St. John's Mount, the residence of Mr. Chalmers, the arrangements being that of a garden party rather than that of an ordinary bazaar. The proceedings commenced with a brief opening ceremony, in which Mrs. Marriott, of Sandal Grange, took the leading part. She expressed her sympathy with the movement, as a rightful tribute of grateful remembrance to the loyal and heroic people of former days who had struggled for their faith and freedom in days when greater sacrifices had to be made for conscience sake than now. Then, having declared the sale open, a hearty vote of thanks to her was moved by Mr. H. S. Harrison and seconded by Miss Masters, both of whom had worked indefatigably for the success of the scheme. The net result is that about £75 will be available for the restoration, and it is hoped that enough may be secured to place a simple but tasteful tablet in Westgate Chapel, in memory of the departed worthies who, during their lives faithfully upheld the cause of liberal religion, and were laid in the precincts of their now vanished house of prayer.

Wimbledon.—The very successful series of meetings held since Easter ended last Sunday. After the service a meeting of the entire congregation was held to formally constitute the Wimbledon Unitarian Church. The Rev. George Critchley, who has been conducting the services, presided, and rules were drawn up, and committee and officers elected. Mr. A. Wilson, Chairman of the Missions sub-committee of the L.D.U.S., kindly came and brought an encouraging message of sympathy from the society. No services will be held during August, but on Sunday, Sept. 23, the work will recommence, not as an experiment, but as the beginning of a permanent congregation, which, there is every reason to believe, will grow and prosper. The services will be held, certainly until Christmas, in the same building as formerly, the smaller Worple Hall, Worple-road, which is three minutes walk from Wimbledon Station.

WHAT, then, is the peculiar office of Art? It is, in a word, to present the truth of things under the aspect of beauty, to bring before us the "world as God has made it," where "all is beauty."—B. F. Westcott.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is not given to many citizens to have their names permanently associated with legal enactments, but if Mr. Birrell's Education Bill gets as successfully through the House of Lords as it did through the House of Commons, Mrs. Humphry Ward's name will be one of those thus singled out for honour. As we stated last week, one of the beneficial provisions of the Bill promotes the establishment of "Vacation Schools." Many of our readers know that Mrs. Ward's efforts on behalf of the children around the Passmore Edwards Settlement have been specially successful in this direction, and it is a well-deserved reward that the clause in the new Bill, which provides for similar efforts throughout the country, will be known as the "Mary Ward" clause.

SOMETHING like "sensation" has been caused by a decision in the Court of Appeal this week. By a majority of two to one, the Master of the Rolls being one of the two, that Court, reversing the decision of the Court below, has decided that a local education authority is not compelled by the Act of 1902 to make payments for religious instruction in a non-provided (Voluntary) school. The case arose through the action of the West Riding Committee in deducting from the salaries of the teachers in such schools in their district a portion equivalent to the amount of time in which they had been engaged in religious instruction. Doubtless the case will go farther, but what a commentary the story forms on our legislative methods! Here is an Act barely four years old, and our judges are hopelessly divided as to what it directs to be done in a matter of vital interest to Mr. Balfour and his supporters, who passed the Act.

THE House of Lords last week read the Education Bill the second time, after a lengthy and important debate. The speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury clearly intimated an intention to modify the Bill drastically in Committee, and other peers breathed out threatenings if not slaughters. The anxieties of the friends of the Bill are naturally keen, but the situation has been rendered considerably less awkward for them by the judgment in the Court of Appeal, to which we refer above. If that judgment holds, and in any case till it is reversed at a further stage, the "non-provided" schools would appear to be in a worse plight than the present Bill would give them. The Archbishop has the repute of being a moderate man, and we do not expect violent extremes from him.

MEANWHILE we may notice two remarks by the British Weekly. In its last week's issue that journal expresses the opinion that if the House of Lords amends the Bill in impossible ways, or rejects it, "we shall then be very close on the secular solution, which is the only one which, in a divided community like ours, offers the smallest chance of permanent success." As our contemporary has favoured this solution we need not be surprised that it shows no great concern at whatever the House of Lords may do with the Bill. But the following is more notable, and we quote it without comment:—The hollowness of the simple Bible teaching plan is further demonstrated by a curious manifesto, which has been issued over the signature of eminent Nonconformist divines, including men like Dr. Oswald Dykes, Dr. A. M. Fairbairn, Dr. Monro Gibson, Dr. Horton, Dr. Maclaren, Mr. Meyer, Mr. J. H. Shakespeare, Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, Dr. Bowman Stephenson and Dr. J. S. Banks. These honoured leaders declare that "while we deprecate the use of any religious catechism, or of any distinctively denominational formulæ, we hold strongly that the Bible should be taught as an authentic and authoritative record of fact and truth, and that the instruction given in Holy Scripture should not be inconsistent with the Apostle's 'Creed,' which represents the general consent of Christendom on the fundamental facts of the Christian religion." This is evidently a manifesto against Dr. Clifford and his followers, who hold that only the ethical and literary side of the Bible should be taught in schools, and that Unitarian teachers should be qualified to give Christian instruction. It is a revelation of the utter hollowness of the present concordat between the advocates of simple Bible teaching. So far the British Weekly.

CONFLICTING accounts continue to reach this country as to the course of the revolutionary movement in Russia. There are spasmodic efforts towards strikes, which may at any time become general, and which are probably the most powerful instrument at present at the disposal of the people. For the mass of the army seem still to be at the command of the Court party, although the commanders of military and naval forces have a terribly perplexing task. An incident at a Black Sea port will illustrate the doubtful reliability of the troops. The artillery garrison is said to be mutinous, but the general hesitates to dismantle the guns because at any moment he may want to fire on the fleet. It is extremely likely that things will go on in this indecisive fashion for a considerable time.

In any case, the terms of a manifesto to the peasants issued by the various workmen's parties indicate the aims of the revolutionary socialists, and incidentally draw attention to the wide divergence between Russia and Western Europe. The people, urges the manifesto, "must everywhere remove the local authorities, and replace them by their own elected, and must everywhere confiscate and place in the hands of legally constituted national authorities all State funds and capital. . . . In conjunction with the troops, the workmen in the towns, all other toilers, and all trusted by the people and the peasantry must take their affairs into their own hands." Such advice would be almost meaningless in this country. We have little tradition of local autonomy, and perhaps not much genius for it. We depend very much on central government. In Russia it is different. We do not now discuss whether the problem can be carried out. That may or must depend on what the army does. But one thing is certain. Russians are ready to "take their own affairs into their own hands." The people have, and always have had, a despotic central government; they have also always been used to a great deal of "local option" and democratic administration in local affairs. This has been at the mercy of arbitrary police measures. But even when interfered with it has never been forgotten. The psychology of the Russians and their national destiny seem to point to this avenue, the path of local autonomy as the one along which the revolution must move. The leaders evince wise political insight when they remind the people that this way lies their freedom. In pursuing this ideal it may be that Russia will give to Europe a priceless practical lesson in the art of modern democracy.

THOSE of our readers who have been interested in the recently formed Anti-Sweating League for securing a Minimum Wage, will be glad to have their attention called to "The Case for a Legal Minimum Wage," which is the latest of the penny Fabian Tracts. The pamphlet notices the tentative approaches already made in this country in the direction of such an enactment, and gives also some brief account of the working of similar laws in Victoria and New Zealand. This is followed by a discussion of the problem as it affects men and women workers respectively, and of the conditions to be met if such a law is to be successful. The Act, we are told, "should aim at the fixing and enforcement of a wage sufficient to enable our workers to be maintained in healthy existence. Therefore, the wage should be calculated on what the worker requires for physical health and efficiency, and not on what the trade will bear. . . . In the second place, the law must be national; that is, must apply to the whole country in order that no district shall undersell another in the labour market at the cost of national vitality."

THE WAY OF PEACE.]

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE.
IN SEVEN DECADES.

(1) It is most of all necessary to one's real peace of mind and heart to be deeply conscious that the highest power on earth is the Divine Spirit dwelling within one's own soul.

(2) Lift up yourself. Make all you can of all you have.

(3) Days pass away, seasons change, the flowers of the field fade and wither, oceans dry up, and worlds are flung afar and shattered; but you are more than these—you are of the family of God!

(4) Care little for the opinion of those who know you least, for popularity, for loud applause, and the voice of public acclaim. These are fickle, readily moved, guided by passing conditions which change to every shifting breath. Care most for the quiet judgment of those who can read the desires of your heart.

(5) It is a pitiful thing to be afraid of solitude. Draw into your soul ceaseless streams from the infinite field of the boundless universe of which you are a part. Narrowness breeds fear. Fling open the portals of knowledge, let the barriers down, scatter your horizons. There will be no sense of loneliness to the seeing mind.

(6) It is not lack of opportunity that brings despair, but lack of understanding the opportunities we have. Men fail through ignoring their own splendid privilege of immediate access to the source of all strength and all power. Who can prevent your prayer of communion with God?

(7) It is the man with the low undeveloped self who is to be pitied; with much lamentation he bemoans his state and grovels as a "miserable sinner." The true man turns from his wickedness and does right.

(8) Be not misled by old instructions which teach self-suppression and self-mortification; they are incompatible with the true Christian faith in the Fatherhood of God. To scorn oneself is to insult one's Maker.

(9) It is a sure road to increasing steadiness of life and tranquillity of heart to grow daily in self-respect, through ceaseless exercise of every noble instinct, and every high and glorious quality, bringing the mighty power inherent in every living soul, out through the channels of life to justify its creation by serving its purpose.

(10) Let no man think more meanly of himself than he ought to think.

THE great sources of wisdom are experience and observation; and these are denied to none.—Channing.

WHEN a man who has rendered high service to humanity dies, there is no sect so base as not to do him reverence, and place a wreath upon his grave. It is a sign that the world's heart has risen, is rising, and will rise against the limitations upon the mercy of our God imposed by the dogmatism of ages. These changes of the heart could never have taken place had not the Power ruling the world been a loving Power.—H. W. Crosskey.

TENNYSON'S "IDYLLS OF THE KING."—"GARETH AND LYNETTE."*

BY REV. W. LAWRENCE SCHROEDER, M.A.

IN the service of religion all things human take their appointed place. The multifarious expression of thought and feeling, with its aspects of nobility and meanness, righteousness and iniquity, things lovely and things of ill report, may serve to lead the soul to God, or to reveal the nature of the relation felt in Divine communion and realised in holy love. The thought of the absolute unity of all being, together with the faith in the utter righteousness of eternal law, drives us to think of religion as that state wherein the soul is aware of infinite being and its purposes. The consciousness of God may be quickened by the beauty and grandeur of nature, by the tumultuous working of human life, by the subtle thought of the philosopher, or by the expression of the soul in art. The teacher whose aim it is to educate the powers which in us lie, and to give a Godward direction to life, will neglect no field of human activity which offers opportunity for the play of healthy, purposeful thought. In the classification of things sacred and profane we need to remember that theology is not necessarily religious, and that fiction may be a revelation of the deepest workings of the spiritual heart of man. Science, history, art, literature may be sanctified by the mind and soul of man, for in all the workings of human life we may discern something of God. Our religion, therefore, implies a spiritual interpretation of the universe, in terms of God; and the value of our service will depend largely on the truth and fitness of the method we adopt. There is no need violently to outrage the proprieties of science or art in order to emphasise the working of spiritual law; trite moral reflections may have an immoral effect; the perpetual desire to improve the occasion often defeats its own ends. Let science have her perfect work and art her own domain, and let the unity of created things be found in the ineffable experience of the human soul. The religious effect of the teaching will depend on the mind which discerns Divine relations, and on the spirit which hallows the lowliest things of earth.

No excuse, therefore, is needed for the adoption of literature as a subject of religious instruction; but care should be taken to treat the subject with respect, and not use it as a mere hobby-horse for theological or ethical trappings. All great literature has its religious aspect; it is for the teacher to reveal the inwardness of the subject and to indicate the spiritual relation in which alone the subject justifies itself as of God.

Religion is served when we set out the truth of an author's work, and when we discriminate motive and purpose and end, in order to appreciate rightly the spirit from which the literary expression flowed. Earnest, painstaking study characterises the work of the religious teacher, but gifts of mind and soul are necessary to the exposition of the finest things in poetry and in life. Taste, insight, knowledge are essential factors in the ministry of religion.

In poetry the work of Tennyson commends itself to the teacher by its simplicity, its directness, its adequate expression. In the main it is not difficult to see what the poet means; we may be puzzled when from the whole work of the man we try to deduce a coherent system of thought, but the individual poems present but few obscurities, and our acceptance of the mood of the writer will invariably lead to the understanding of his work.

It is somewhat ungracious to note the deficiencies of one who gives us such pure pleasure as does Tennyson, but we are constrained to say that although as an artist Tennyson ranks among the greatest, he lacks that quality of strenuous, subtle thought which marks the poetry of Browning, and which flashes through the work of Shelley. The great poet is always more than the mere artist. To him comes the vision without which the people perish; he knows the secrets of the Eternal, and reads the destinies of Nature and of Man; he searches the heavens with his glance, and sounds the depths of the human heart; through his soul surge subtle spiritual emotions, refining his nature and making him delicately appreciative of the infinite variety of life; his whole being trembles in sympathetic answer to the music of the spheres. When we think of Milton and of Wordsworth we are driven to admit that Tennyson lacks both height and depth; the awe and wonder which accompany our reception of the greater poets leave us when we approach the work of the later writer. With Tennyson we are conscious of charm, of delicate and truthful expression, of marvellous metrical skill, and of the play of a sincere artistic imagination; but such qualities of insight and of feeling as might have placed him in the highest rank are denied him. Yet, despite all that may be said in criticism of the conventions of mind and spirit which mark the limitations of Tennyson, we are profoundly conscious of the appeal of his beautiful, ordered life and tenderly receptive mind. There is much that is moving and inspiring in his work, much that ministers to the higher life of humanity; as a poetic interpreter of the thought of his day he is supreme; as a lyrist few have excelled him in the direct expression of simple emotions. He lived a life of spotless purity; he had a profound respect for his own nature and gifts, and endeavoured to fulfil them in noble fashion; he was strenuous in the prosecution of his art, and toiled diligently after knowledge; he was faithful to ideals; and in all these things he commends himself to teachers of religion as among the greatest of the forces making for the realisation of the kingdom of God.

"The Idylls of the King" reveal Tennyson's deficiency in that synthesising power of imagination by which the poetic elements presented might have been resolved into a unity of expression. The manner of composition told against the unity of the poem; the fluctuating purpose of the poet militated severely against a coherent body of thought. Only in certain conceptions of character—the King, Modred, Lancelot, Guinevere—do we find consistency; each idyll makes its own individual appeal. The poet himself appears to have arrived only by slow degrees at his own meaning. And yet, because in the mind and soul of Tennyson there is no moral doubt, the Idylls present a telling appeal for purity of living, for practical religion, for wholeness of soul as against the partial expression of the ideal.

The growth of the poem was in nine stages. Tennyson, in very early years, had written out in prose various histories of Arthur. He himself tells us, "At twenty-four I meant to write an epic or drama of King Arthur, and I thought that I should take twenty years about the work." The subject fascinated him: for over fifty years it was more or less in his mind.

(1) The first stage is marked by the early romantic ballads, "The Lady of Shalott"—a version of Lancelot and Elaine—"Sir Galahad," and "Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinevere." (2) In the 1842 volume he included the "Morte d'Arthur," a poem begun about 1833, and later embodied in "The Passing of Arthur." (3) In 1857 came "Enid and Nimuë: the True and the False," which was soon withdrawn from publication. (4) Two years later he published "Idylls of the King," with the sub-title, "The True and the False," and including four poems—"Guinevere," "Enid," "Vivien," and "Elaine." Later in the same year, 1859, a second edition was issued in which the title appeared, "The Idylls of the King," and the individual poems were headed: "Arthur and Guinevere," "Geraint and Enid," "Merlin and Vivien," "Lancelot and Elaine." (5) Four new poems were added in 1869: "The Coming of Arthur," "The Holy Grail," "Pelleas and Ettarre," and "The Passing of Arthur." (6) "The Last Tournament" appeared in an 1871 "Contemporary Review." (7) "Gareth and Lynette," and the lines "To the Queen," were published in 1872. (8) Thirteen years later appeared "Balin and Balan." (9) Finally, in 1888, came the re-arranged "Geraint and Enid." A little reflection on the necessary growth of the poet's mind will convince us that the method of composition was not in favour of a strongly unified presentation of the poetic elements. From a comparison of a memorandum, written before 1839, with the Idylls as they now stand, we gather some idea of Tennyson's uncertainty regarding the plan and purpose of the poem. King Arthur was to symbolise religious faith: of the three Guineveres the first was to be "primitive Christianity," the second "Roman Catholicism." "The first is put away and dwells apart," the second flies and "Arthur takes to the first again but finds her changed by lapse of time." Modred, the sceptical understanding, pulls the latest Guinevere from the throne. Merlin the enchanter stands for science; he marries his daughter to Modred. Excalibur symbolises war; and the Round Table represents "liberal institutions."

I think we may be thankful that Tennyson forsook his notes in the actual writing of the poem. Hallam tells us that before 1840 his father "wavered between casting the Arthurian legends into the form of an epic, or into that of a musical masque"; the actual form hardly rises to epic dignity. Complaint has been made of Tennyson's abuse of his sources. Mr. Frederic Harri-son accuses the poet of "emasculating Malory's fierce lusty epic into a moral lesson, as if it were to be performed in a drawing-room by an academy of young ladies"; but the poet is not obliged to reproduce his authorities, and Tennyson, in dealing with the Mabinogion, and with Malory's Morte d'Arthur, makes a legitimate use of poetic imagination in adding to and altering the elements of the narrative. Perhaps there is too much moralising in the poem, but the tone is healthy even in the most priggish of Arthur's speeches. Criticism may more justly be directed against the confusion of allegory and symbolism, and narrative pure and simple. In the Idylls the allegory is fainter than might be imagined. Tennyson admitted that there was "a parabolic drift in the poem"; Camelot, he said, "a city of shadowy palaces, is everywhere symbolic of the gradual growth of human beliefs and institutions, and of the spiritual development of man. Yet," he insisted, "there is no single fact or incident in the 'Idylls' however seemingly mystical, which cannot be explained as without any mystery or allegory whatever." Dr. Boyd Carpenter once asked Tennyson "whether they were right who interpreted the three Queens who accompanied King Arthur on his last voyage as Faith, Hope, and Charity." He answered: "They are right and they are not right. They mean that and they do not. They are three of the noblest of women. They are also those three Graces, but they are much more. I hate to be tied down to say, 'This means that,' because the thought within the image is much more than any one interpretation." On another occasion Tennyson affirmed in regard to the many meanings of the poem, "Poetry is like shot silk, with many glancing colours. Every reader must find his own interpretation according to his ability, and according to his sympathy with the poet." Tennyson's position involves a consideration of poetic function; one suspects that Tennyson was betrayed by his mere artistry into the necessity of posterior elaborated interpretations. His own explanation of the poem is inadequate but suggestive: "The whole," he said, "is the dream of man coming into practical life and ruined by one sin. Birth is a mystery, and death is a mystery, and in the midst lies the tableland of life, and its struggles and performances. It is not the history of one man, or of one generation, but of a whole cycle of generations."

Hallam's summing-up is much more definite and convincing: "If epic unity is looked for in the Idylls, we find it not in the wrath of an Achilles, nor in the wanderings of an Ulysses, but in the unending war of humanity in all ages—the world-wide war of Sense and Soul, typified in individuals with the subtle interaction of character upon character; the central, dominant figure being the pure, generous, tender, brave, human-hearted Arthur—so that the links (with here and there symbolic accessories) which bind the Idylls into an artistic whole, are perhaps somewhat intricate."

The mere fact that, for most readers of the "Idylls," the story element is supreme emphasises the inherent weakness of a poem which plays with allegory in a halting, unconvincing way. More satisfaction is derived from the incidents of the separate idylls and from the perfection of the artistic setting than from the poem viewed as a whole, although there are not wanting minor poetic motives which give an aspect of unity to the book. So the development of the war of sense with soul follows the changing seasons. In a note by Tennyson himself we read: "The Coming of Arthur is on the night of the New Year; when he is wedded 'the world is white with may'; on a summer night the vision of the Holy Grail appears; and the 'Last Tournament' is in the 'yellowing autumn-tide.' Guinevere flees thro' the mists of autumn, and Arthur's death takes place at midnight in mid-winter."

In any study of the "Idylls" the "Mabinogion," Malory's "Morte d'Arthur," and the "High History of the Holy Graal" should be read; only so can we understand the ethical and spiritual infusion due to Tennyson. The "Idylls" depict the working out of accepted sin:—"The little pitted speck in garner'd fruit That, rotting inward, slowly moulders all."

The illicit love of Lancelot and the Queen make for the dissolution of the Table Round; the discipline of mind and body is essential to high nobility and to the truth and purity of social relations. More subtle in its influence on the soul is the of an asceticism which belittles morality and indirectly fosters sensuality. In the "Holy Grail" Arthur laments that visions should take the place of practical good. Spiritual religion must find definite expression in everyday morality. Right throughout the "Idylls" Tennyson insists on the real relation of religion and ethics; perfection of living demands the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace; love is manifested in faith and constancy; spiritual being moves in the conflict with doubt and in the realisation of moral ideals.

To serve the purposes of exemplification we may take the idyll "Gareth and Lynette." Chronologically, it is late, organically it is early in the evolution of the "Idylls of the King." It depicts a time when as yet the court of Arthur was unsullied by gross sin, when could be seen—

"In all the listening eyes
Of those tall knights that ranged about the throne,
Clear honour shining like the dewy star
Of dawn, and faith in their great King, with pure Affection, and the light of victory,
And glory gain'd, and evermore to gain."

The idyll sets out the triumphant progress of the knightly soul through trial and grievous conflict to the vantage ground of true chivalry; incidentally it exhibits the transformation of petulance into admiration by the power of an undaunted devotion to an accepted service. There is also an unnecessary but splendidly wrought allegory of "the war of Time against the soul of man." In point of craftsmanship "Gareth and Lynette" ranks lower than "Lancelot and Elaine," "Guinevere," or "The Passing of Arthur," but it is not lacking in passages of arresting beauty, and touches of high poetic feeling. The description of the gate of the city of Camelot—"a city of shadowy palaces And stately, rich in emblem and the work Of ancient kings who did their days in stone," a city "built to music, therefore never built at all, and therefore built for ever"—is full of mystic beauty and significance.

"And there was no gate like it under heaven.

For barefoot on the keystone, which was lined

And rippled like an ever-fleeting wave,
The Lady of the Lake stood: all her dress
Wept from her sides as water flowing away;
But like the cross her great and goodly arms

Stretch'd under all the cornice and upheld:
And drops of water fell from either hand;
And down from one a sword was hung,
from one

A censer, either worn with wind and storm;
And o'er her breast floated the sacred fish;
And in the space to left of her, and right,
Were Arthur's wars in weird devices done,
New things and old co-twisted, as if Time
Were nothing, so inveterately, that men
Were giddy gazing there; and over all High on the top were those three Queens, the friends

Of Arthur, who should help him at his need."

Lynette's song, in which is unfolded by slow degrees the fulness of her admiration for Gareth, may seem somewhat too delicate for so saucy a creature as Lynette, but we like the lyric for its own sake, as its tender music sounds in our ears:—

"O morning star that smilest in the blue,
O star, my morning dream hath proven true:

Smile sweetly, thou! my love hath smiled on me.

O Sun, that wakenest all to bliss or pain,
O Moon, that layest all to sleep again,
Shine sweetly: twice my love hath smiled on me.

O dewy flowers that open to the sun,
O dewy flowers that close when day is done,
Blow sweetly: twice my love hath smiled on me.

O birds that warble to the morning sky,
O birds that warble as the day goes by,
Sing sweetly: twice my love hath smiled on me.

O trefoil, sparkling on the rainy plain,
O rainbow with three colours after rain,
Shine sweetly: thrice my love hath smiled on me."

Nature is invited to give of her joy, that nothing may mar the harmony of the developed love: but neither here nor elsewhere in Tennyson have we that profound appreciation of the awe and mystery in Nature which distinguishes the poetry of Wordsworth.

Tennyson's treatment of Nature is sadly deficient in that subtle sympathetic quality which penetrates to the soul of all created things and helps us to realise the wondrous unity of God's universe. Nature, to Wordsworth, was spirit; with her the soul of man could enter into such relation as from her life flowed healing and subduing power. Tennyson is keenly appreciative of the beauty of Nature, he knows her appearance and methods of working, but of her inner being, the reality by which the appearance is possible, he seems to have his doubts. He is an acute observer of the ways of life; his mind is richly stored with scientific lore; but he lacks the true humility by which alone may be known the secrets of the living world. Nature is always something beneath him, or, at the best, a storehouse of poetic similes:

Within the range of his appreciation Tennyson is a safe guide and charming companion; his similes are convincing, wrought out of a practical experience of the material used. Speaking of the dazzling "cloth of palest gold" sent by token of fealty from Mark of Cornwall, he says it "shone far off as shines A field of charlock in the sudden sun Between two showers"; and, as we read, we feel the point of the resemblance. The blustering of Sir Kay, the seneschal, is likened to the "sudden wind among dead leaves," which drives them all apart. Kay himself is "a man of mien Wan-sallow as the plant that feels itself Root-bitten by white lichen."

Gareth's spear "of grain storm-strengthen'd on a windy site" is altogether convincing; as is also the gloomy-gladed hollow, "in the deeps whereof a mere, Round as the red eye of an eagle-owl, Under the half-dead sunset glared."

Such a passage as

"Nigh upon that hour

When the lone hern forgets his melancholy, Lets down his other leg, and, stretching, dreams

Of goodly supper in the distant pool," bears on it the impress of first-hand knowledge. We seem, too, to have a transcript of experience in the lines:

"How sweetly smells the honeysuckle
In the hush'd night, as if the world were one

Of utter peace, and love, and gentleness!"
but this is as near as Tennyson ever gets to the mystic heart of Nature. He is, however, a master in the correlation of mood and aspect; he makes unerring choice of the appropriate simile and setting.

(To be concluded.)

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Report on Ecclesiastical Discipline, recently issued by Mr. Balfour's Royal Commission, properly looms large in this month's Reviews. In the Nineteenth Century and After four articles are concerned with this subject, and the editor may be congratulated on his success in securing able representatives of different points of view. Lady Wimborne writes, with acuteness and evident long acquaintance with the details of the controversy, as representing the "Protestants"; on the other hand, Sir George Arthur does manful battle for the "Catholics." The two other writers are Canon Hensley Henson and Mr. Herbert Paul, whose dexterity and views, ecclesiastic or non-ecclesiastic, are alike well known to the reading public. The popular Canon, indeed, is so full of his subject that his criticisms run over into the pages of the Contemporary, and even there he has to intimate another article before he can be done with the matter. We must follow his example, so far as proposing another occasion to ourselves for remarks on the findings and recommendations of the Commission: It must suffice to say here that the "Protestant" and the "Catholic" advocates find the Report to be strongly condemnatory of their respective opponents. Canon Hensley emphatically denounces the type of religiosity exhibited in the manuals of devotion brought to publicity in the Report. He speaks of the "involuntary disgust" certain to be evoked by them in "intelligent and educated minds." "What," he asks, "is to be said of the intellectual quality of religious teaching which lies at the basis of these 'devotions'? What must be the consequence to mind and character of surrendering one's self to the habitual government of the notions which are implied in all this belated and childish superstition, and indulging in the the paltry and frivolous ceremonial by which it is appropriately expressed in the Churches? The influence which it is calculated to have upon young and immature minds is as powerful as it is mischievous. Religion taught in the spirit and by the aids of these manuals, and nourishing itself with the theatrical ceremonialism to which they are designed as auxiliary, cannot but become hostile alike to intellectual vigour and to moral health. At best, no more can be expected from such a system than a dependent and credulous piety; at worst, a dangerous and mentally degraded fanaticism. This is a consequence plainly reached within the Roman sphere, and it is the despair of patriotic citizens." These are weighty words, and we cannot think that the majority of professed Churchmen will think them overcharged. Mr. Herbert Paul's opinion points the moral with reference to the Education Bill. It is, he believes, "a small compact body of sacerdotalists" who have put forward the claims which have endangered that Bill, claims which he declares to be "odious to the great mass of their Protestant fellow-countrymen." "If they are the Church, the Church as a national institution is at an end." But we must defer further remarks on the subject.

We find in the Contemporary the first of two articles by Monsignor Barnes on the "Evolution of the Lord's Prayer," the perusal of which should open the eyes of some placid Christians as to the critical position occupied by even the most revered of the literary heritages of the Church. The view taken by the writer of the article is that Luke's shorter form represents most nearly the original prayer, Matthew's being the result of growth during a considerable period.

Those of our readers who are really interested in social reconstruction will be grateful to the editor of the Contemporary for publishing in extenso the speeches of MM. Jaurès and Clemenceau recently in the French Parliament on the question of Socialism as a political programme. The arguments are fitly set forth with French lucidity, and are free from the verbosity one has to fear so often in these cases. It is easy to concur with M. Clemenceau that the individual must be elevated in order that socialistic legislation may succeed; but unless one is capable of realising the struggling forces of regeneration in the Socialist's speech, such concurrence is the idlest of futilities.

Turning again to the Nineteenth Century, it is decidedly curious to read Mr. Carnegie's rebuke of British alarmists, especially those whose bogey is Germany, immediately after Mr. A. S. Hurd's creepy description of the irresistible Kaiser's "Dreams of Sea Power." Mr. Edgar P. Rathbone recalls the students of South African problems to the necessity of developing a beautiful "home life" among the various types of race in that country. He writes with moderation, and therefore the more cogently. A very curious speculation is introduced by Mr. F. H. Balkwill in an article on "The Sacred Fire of Israel." He would explain the different manifestations of "the fire of the Lord," from the times of Moses (perhaps Abraham) to those of the Maccabees, by the hypothesis that a secret of "naphtha," or similar compound, became known to the priests, and this inflammable substance, being easily ignited under the intense solar radiance of Caanan or the desert, struck awe into the beholders, and affected them as supernatural. We have heard weakly jocular persons suggest that the sacrifice on Carmel was an instance of the use of some substance of the kind, but Mr. Balkwill appears to be in sober earnest.

In Dr. Guinness Roger's article on the "Education Controversy" we observe the following. . . . "There are comparatively few who realise the difficulty of securing a real instruction in what are to us the essentials of the faith without violating the consciences of those who dissent from them. I am bound in honour to add that this minority has never pressed its objections, and that they may have been sometimes too much ignored. It is curious indeed," Dr. Rogers proceeds, "to note the difference accorded to Unitarians and Roman Catholics. The history of the last thirty years, however, has made it abundantly manifest that for the latter exceptional treatment must be granted under any system except that which forbids the interference of the State with religious teaching altogether. Unitarians have been zealous workers in the cause of education, and have never insisted on any special grievance of their own. Hostile critics will probably say that is because the Cowper-Temple teaching is practically their own." Yes, hostile critics may say so, but it is not true. Some years ago Dr. Crosskey, whom Dr. Guinness Rogers has assuredly not yet forgotten, gave us a pretty long list of things not at all Unitarian that got taught at Board Schools. But most of us shrugged our shoulders, thankful that the case was no worse.

By the way, the "Reader" in the Contemporary refers with commendation to the volume entitled "Memorable Unitarians," which has been recently edited and republished. A long list is given of names of worthies celebrated in the book, and the final remark is: "Some of these names are perhaps hardly Unitarian names, but with all possible exclusions it is a noble list." In that verdict we heartily concur, and we venture to think that the reading of the book would do good to many Unitarians who are pitifully ignorant or oblivious of their splendid heritage in such a record.

THOSE whom Burns addressed as the "Orthodox, Orthodox,

Wha believe in John Knox," are, in one sense, a dwindling number nowadays. Many a "heretic blast" has been blown in Scotland since the one of which the poet wrote, and at each blast some more of Knox's followers in the faith have surrendered. But happily a reformer's claim to the admiring and grateful remembrance of his countrymen may survive their desertion of his theological standard, and probably not many Scotsmen will dispute Knox's right to be regarded as a hero, as he is in the volume before us. That there should be some dissenters to the Knox hero-worship as by Carlyle established, is, however, natural and explicable enough. It was Knox's misfortune to be brought into sharp personal conflict with Queen Mary Stuart, and Mary's gallant defenders, among historians and readers of history, are not likely to forgive "the man who gart her greet," or to think that there could be much good in him. Had she been out of the picture, how much better he might have fared at their hands! Moreover, it is impossible to dissociate Knox from his work, and they who consider that he only succeeded in replacing one evil with another, in "suppressing idolatry and promoting superstition," can hardly be expected to take a very exalted view of his character.

Of the existence of such dissenters, and of their various grounds for dissent, Professor Cowan seems fully aware. His book has been written apparently before Mr. Andrew Lang's volume came forth to disturb the faith of some believers, but we doubt whether the perusal of that volume would have made much difference in our author's treatment of the subject; and, indeed, he answers by anticipation a good many of Mr. Lang's criticisms of Knox. Though his general tone is by no means apologetic, he is always ready to explain his hero's conduct where such explanation seems necessary. For example: Knox's belated identification of himself with the cause of religious reform has laid him open to the suspicion of weakness and timidity. But Dr. Cowan suggests that the delay was due to the fervent patriotism which always characterised him: this most likely having made him hesitate to join a religious movement which was, for the time being, associated with a political party whose policy seemed to jeopardise the national independence. By 1546, however (the date of Knox's first appearance as a reformer), the political situation had begun to change; it was becoming more and more apparent that the real menace to Scottish liberty was not from protestant England, but from catholic France. From this time, therefore, patriotism and protestantism found that they could make common cause, and Knox's scruples were at an end. No one was finally more zealous than he in cultivating the friendship of England and withstanding French aggression. Dr. Cowan shows throughout a keen perception of the manner in which the Reformation was helped and hindered by the political vicissitudes, and his book is even more valuable as the history of a period than as the study of a personality. Nevertheless, the hero is never lost sight of amid the surge of circumstances. If these are against him, he is still seen grimly hopeful and persistent in his effort to master them; if they favour him, he is ready to seize the opportunity they afford, and to carry his cause forward to success. Say what we will of Mary's criminal folly and of the intervention of the English as factors in precipitating the Scottish Reformation, these things would have availed little but for Knox's whole-hearted devotion and splendid fighting qualities.

That the Reformation worked mightily for the intellectual, moral, and spiritual good of Scotland, our author does not for a moment question; but he confesses that, in one respect, it was too thorough. "In the sphere of congregational worship," he says, "it must be admitted that in one important particular, Knox has impoverished the Scottish Church. In his anxiety to escape from temporary abuses, he removed from Scottish Christendom what it is now only beginning to recover—the stated and united commemoration of the fundamental facts and truths of Christianity, a commemoration which is at once helpful to the Christian life, and a wholesome preservative against the obscuration of vital Christian doctrine, or its supersession with a cold and semi-pagan morality." But we hardly know whether Knox is more to be blamed for his thoroughness than admired for his consistency. His great aim, like that of the reformers generally, was, as he said, to "restore the grave and godly face of the primitive Church," and, from his point of view, Christmas and Easter and Whitsuntide were just as truly "idolatry" as the Mass itself, "because in God's Scriptures they have neither commandment nor assurance."

Our author mentions the fact that the Confession of Faith which was drawn up by Knox, and was in use in the Kirk for almost ninety years (1560-1649), "is, in most particulars, conspicuously broader than that of the Westminster Divines" which superseded it; and he suggests it as "the possible starting-point from which a less rigid standard of doctrine might be formulated for the present time." However this may be, it is certain that when the Kirk takes in hand the revision of her creed, as, since the momentous Act of last year, she is now at liberty to do, she will be glad to remember that Knox's Confession anticipated to some extent the demands of her growing liberalism.

This book is the work of a true scholar. Almost every statement has its footnote of reference to the authority on which it is based, and a list of the works so alluded to is given at the beginning and forms an excellent bibliography for the study of Knox and his time. Photographic illustrations, chiefly of places associated with the reformer's eventful ministry, add further to the value and attractiveness of the volume. We commend it to all interested in "sour John Knox," as Browning called, or rather miscalled, him, for there must have been no little charm about a man who could win the confidence and affection of so many. His First Blast Against the Monstrous Regiment [i.e., Rule] of Women, has, we fear, made him for ever unpopular with Queens and divers ladies in authority; but even Mary Stuart herself, who had, beside this Blast, other and more directly personal grounds for disliking him, could grow quite confidential with him at times!

OBITUARY.

THE REV. THOMAS LEYLAND. 1

WE deeply regret to announce the death of the Rev. Thomas Leyland, which took place on Monday last at Blackpool, where he had for some time resided. A native of Chowbent, he was brought up a Unitarian, and early showed eager interest in the cause. On removing to Manchester for business purposes he attached himself to mission work, and, as stated in the appreciation given below by his life-long friend, the Rev. J. C. Street, he was educated at the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. His chief pastorates were at South Shields, Moneyrea, Burnley, and Colne; he was also for a short time at Douglas. Owing to ill-health he retired from active work a few years ago. The funeral, which took place at Burnley Cemetery on Wednesday, was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, many old friends and brother ministers being present.

ONE of our veterans, and one of the gentlest spirits, whose life has been a benediction to many, has passed from us, and, amid scenes of sorrow, lighted up with a Divine hope, his remains have been reverently interred at Burnley. The Rev. Thomas Leyland, educated at the Home Missionary Board, 1866-9, began his work, in association with Rev. J. C. Street, then of Newcastle-on-Tyne, as missionary of the Northumberland and Durham Association, where he laboured successfully at Choppington and afterwards became the first minister of the new church at South Shields, which he built up into a living centre of religious life; he then followed his friend Mr. Street to Ireland, and ministered with great acceptance at Moneyrea. Subsequently he twice served the congregation at Burnley; he also worked, with acceptance, at Douglas and Oldham, and twice he was minister at Colne, at which place he was obliged to close his ministry on account of failing health and eyesight. In all the spheres of his work he was earnest, devoted, and successful, and in a remarkable degree won the affection and admiration of his people. He was an effective preacher and had a facile pen. His writings were enriched by a fine poetical taste, and his robustness of thought was evidenced in his editorship of the "Free Word," and by his many literary papers to our periodicals and magazines. He was the preacher of the Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly at the annual meetings in Ullet-road, Liverpool, in the year 1900, and was much sought after by many congregations as a special preacher. Even in his enforced retirement, and while he laboured under grave physical disadvantages, he gave his services from time to time and helped all the good causes he could. Sorrows and afflictions gathered about his life, but he kept a brave heart and a sweet spirit through all. He was not only a faithful and devoted minister, but his life was fruitful in all graces and good works, and he gathered about him devoted friends whom he loved and who loved him. He has left a widow to mourn his loss, and the tender sympathies of many will go forth to her, not only in her great loss, but in the peculiar sharpness of her own trial, and everything, we trust, will be done to soften the blow of separation to her in the declining days of her life.

A good man has gone from us. His labours will be missed, and many hearts will be saddened by the thought that on earth they will see his face no more. But the Infinite Father has all souls in His keeping, and gives His beloved ones peace and joy. J. C. S.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE ODYSSEY; OR, VOYAGE OF ULYSSES FROM TROY TO ITHACA.

This is the story of the man who, though he was king but of a small rocky island, yet loved his kingdom more than any empire, however rich and mighty, and deemed no hardship too great if only his wanderings led at last to his home, where through many weary years his true wife and his son awaited him.

The ten years' siege of Troy was over at last, her palaces no more, and her walls a girdle of scorched ruins. The Greeks were preparing to depart. At the head of a fleet of homeward bound ships sailed Ulysses, than whom none of the chieftains was braver, nor any so deep in counsel. From Troy to Ithaca, his island home, was no great distance, and he and his long-enduring comrades cherished the hope of seeing their loved ones and making mirth with their children before many weeks were past. But many are the hopes of men foredoomed to failure; and only after unequalled wanderings and hardships and lives lost was it to be the lot of one sole survivor to reach his own threshold.

The weary length of the voyage of Ulysses was brought about in the manner following. Having paid a visit to Æolus, the Father of the Winds, he, in good will, made Ulysses a present of all the winds that blow, which he tied up in a bag with a silver cord—all except the west wind, which remained free to blow the voyagers home to Ithaca. With this fair wind the long sea leagues were swiftly left behind; the cliffs and mountains of Greece came in sight, and one evening at sundown they saw the rocky coast of their own country. It was too late to reach port that night. The ships were anchored in a sheltered bay, and Ulysses, weary with the long day's steering, left the helm and lay down to sleep with a glad heart, for on the morrow's morn he would behold once more his dear wife Penelope and his boy Telemachus, and rest from warfare and travel beneath his own roof tree.

But then did a spirit of evil possess the minds of his crew. They envied their captain his imagined riches. "See!" said they, "we know not what there may be in this bag tied with the silver cord to the mast-head. Be sure it is full of treasure. Let us open it while he sleeps, and divide the spoil, for it is our last chance."

Then those base men climbed up the rigging to do as they purposed; but as soon as they cut open the bag out rushed all the winds, blowing against the ships and driving them from their moorings and far out to sea. On and on they wildly sped by night and day until they found themselves once more in the harbour of Æolus. For very shame Ulysses did not know what to do, but at length, proceeding to the palace of the king he told his sorry story and begged the service of another kindly wind. But Æolus was insulted of his former gift and would not help them further, but left them to be buffeted by all the winds that blew, and driven far away over the ocean. Thus they arrived at the isle of Circe, the daughter of the Sun. Now Circe was an enchantress who dwelt in a beautiful valley in a house of shining stones, guarded by tamed animals. She sat at her loom singing sweetly as she wove a magical rainbow web. To her, seeking fresh provisions, Ulysses' men came, but being feasted by Circe they gave way to gross appetites and were transformed into a herd of swine. Ulysses was saved from the same fate by carrying with him the white flower of temperance, which Mercury, the Messenger of the Gods, had given him. At his appeal Circe restored the men to their proper forms, and directed them on their way.

They came next to a land where there stood a grove of shivering poplars and willows waving in the wind, beside which the three rivers of Hades met. Having poured out offerings of wine and milk to Pluto, the God of Darkness, Ulysses passed through the solemn grove and entered a weird, rocky pass into the domain of Hades, where, it was said, the spirits of the dead dwelt roaming about like shadows. There he saw the spirit of his mother, who brought him news of Ithaca and his beloved Penelope. There, too, were the shades of many famous men and women, such as Agamemnon, who led the Grecian host against Troy, and Achilles the Champion, who, when Ulysses praised his high renown, replied that he would rather be a peasant-slave upon the earth than reign over all the kingdom of the dead. There, too, was valiant Ajax, and Orion the mighty hunter, still pursuing the ghosts of the beasts he hunted upon earth. And Tantalus, who, because he was not trustworthy, had to stand in water to his chin, but was always thirsty, for, as he bent his head to drink the water sank and he licked up dust; while delicious fruits were waved over his head, but as he lifted his hand to pluck them they were borne far out of reach. There he saw Sisyphus, punished for his sin by having to roll a great stone up a hill which, as soon as he reached the top, rolled down to the bottom and he had all his labour over again. And last he met the shade of Tiresias, a Greek prophet, who told him that he would reach his home again if he feared nothing, but only after great sufferings, all of which ensued. Thus, with new hope, he returned to his comrades and the light of day.

His gallant fleet was reduced to a single ship which barely escaped destruction in passing between Scylla and Charybdis, the monsters of the whirlpool and the rocks. The captivating song of the Sirens, who were beautiful witches who dwelt in a flowery meadow by the water's side, surrounded by dead men's bones, luring men to destruction, could only be resisted by a clever device. Ulysses first stopped up the ears of his crew with wax, and then got them to bind him to the mast until they were out of hearing of the seductive song. At last the ship went down in a storm, and Ulysses, floating on a spar, for nights and days, was alone cast up on the beach of an island. Here dwelt the nymph Calypso in a grotto of surpassing beauty, and by her the shipwrecked mariner was tended with every care. His wanderings seemed now to have reached an end—for no ship ever approached this island. Calypso promised to make him immortal if he would give up all thoughts of returning to his own country; but the heart of Ulysses was proof even against so splendid a bribe. Not even to gain immortality would he desert his home, and when the nymph found that his fidelity could not be shaken, she and her maidens helped him to build a boat. But he was not yet secure from the spite of Neptune, the Sea God, and only after further hardships did he land on the coast of Ithaca. There, first discreetly seeking the cottage of his faithful old herdsman, Eumæus, he disclosed to him who he was. Eumæus told him that his loyal Penelope was waiting for him, hoping against hope, while greedy suitors beset her, demanding that she should marry one of them, and feasting on the substance of her absent lord. Telemachus, his young son, had taken ship and sought over sea for his father, but all in vain.

So Ulysses disguised himself as an aged beggar and crept to the porch of his own house, and begged an alms of the carousing suitors, who knew him not, and treated him with scorn. By way of jest he challenged these self-invited guests to draw the great bow of Ulysses that hung on the wall, and when they one and all failed for lack of strength, he, seeming aged and infirm, took up the bow and bending it to the very head of the arrow, he loosed the shaft at the heart of Antinous, the boaster. And so with timely help of the good herdsman, and of his own sturdy son Telemachus, Ulysses ridded his home of these worthless creatures, whom he slew, one and all, and was restored to the good Penelope.

The sailors of Ulysses wondered that nothing could ever tire him out, nor any terror make him turn back. We who have our own dear Ithacas—our homes can perhaps understand how it was.

WIDENING THE HORIZON.

In the pause that has come to the majority, probably, of the nation's busiest workers, there is opportunity for widening the horizon. Parliament has been adjourned, schools have broken up, churches and chapels have temporarily dropped much of their subsidiary work, even where the Sunday services are not interrupted, business people have little to do, and the factory population has largely joined the rush to holiday resorts. When winter and bad roads put an end in former times to warlike operations, men spoke of the enforced idleness as "a truce of God." May not the summer respite from usual occupations take on something of such a character?

Primarily, no doubt, the aim before most of us at this period is to get that "change" which our doctors say, and which we are very willing to believe, is necessary for us. Change of air and of scene can indeed work wonders; and the tired men and women who have been literally bearing the heat and burden during these many days will, let us hope, quickly recover elasticity and tone of nerve and sinew. But while we aim at our private gains something higher than ourselves works its own way with us; and if a man will only let himself be blessed he shall be blessed in ways hardly anticipated. It is not only that the intelligent traveller fills his mind's wallet with stores of interesting memory and quaint pictures with which he may enliven the days and months to come. The pause gives him time to discover himself, to estimate afresh the value of those things about which he is usually engaged, and to compare his own doings with those of men whom he now has leisure really to think of, to judge moderately and sanely, apart from the hasty criticism and hurly burly of our ordinary life.

To realise for once that other men are much as we are, in all human essentials, that their problems are like our own, and that as we are in earnest in our little grooves, so they are in theirs, is something. To realise that they are necessary to the world's vast movement is more. Like solitary weavers, each man of us sits at his bit of the work, but the fabric of life is large and intricate, and the pattern of the web not to be discerned at close quarters. Our special tasks need special enthusiasm, but it is good for a moment to stand away and consider that our contemporaries are really co-working with us, even those whose threads cross ours at times and obscure the particular colours which in our judgment ought to be prominent. To the Master Weaver the responsibility for that—ours is to see to it that we place our work as rightly as we can, be the total result what it may.

You meet a score of men whom you have not seen before. Observe their geniality, their prevailing good sense, ready humour, genuine ability. Take due occasion to discover their pet theories of things, commerce, politics, religion. On the one hand is general similarity, on the other the utmost variety. Men of opposite parties and different sects make capital holiday friends, yet they remain of opposite parties and of different sects. One man sees the artistic side of things, another chiefly the ethical; a third is steeped in science, and a fourth broods over the social problem. Occasionally one finds himself wondering what the man's mind is like that is so absorbed in things that to ourselves are dry and technical. The other man cannot quite understand why we are troubled about our special matters, such as (shall we say) the criticism of the Fourth Gospel, or the maintenance of public worship. Not that one of us would willingly scorn another's conscientious work, but why are our interests and our neighbours so diverse?

The reason surely is that Life is larger than the wisest of us can easily discern. Our grooves do not represent the horizons of earth and time; still less do they exhaust the potentialities of eternity. To rise at this time to higher levels, to extend our understanding, if not our sympathy, is to seize a real profit from the hands of holiday. The benefit of the wider vision will not be missed by the healthy mind. Who but a very foolish person would go down from his particular Pisgah-top, his Snowdon, Snaefell, Ben Nevis, or Matterhorn so bemuddled with the vastness of landscape seen thence as to be less fit for attending to his own cabbage-patch or dahlia border? Some, indeed, we have heard of who have climbed to such superior heights of contemplation that they are never after found lending a hand to the lowly labours of quiet philanthropy, or attending to the possibilities of a Sunday-school. As to committing themselves to any special form of theological propaganda such persons appear to think themselves henceforth excused: Have they not beheld beyond the borders of all sects, they think; are they not exempted by the vision on the Mount? So they sit aloft in their own self-satisfaction, helping no faith, "judging all"; and therein they are themselves most surely judged. Wiser people gladly welcome the view of the wider horizons that suggest to them lowliness and promote charity. Thankful for the respite of the hour, glad that for a brief space they may breathe an ampler air, they are better fitted to do their own share of God's work on earth now that they feel reassured that all true servants of His, of whatever creed or no creed, are working together with Him. The perfect pattern, let us believe, will emerge by and by.

JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE.

A NEWLY DISCOVERED PORTRAIT.

In the autumn of last year a well-known picture-dealer in Birmingham was commissioned by a private gentleman to sell for him a portrait of an Oxford graduate and, if possible, to identify the subject of the picture. The owner of the portrait knew nothing of its previous history, nor had he any clue to the name of the person whose features were presented on a fairly large canvas (2ft. 6in. by 2ft. 1in.). The figure represented was that of a clergyman in his M.A. gown and bands, sitting at a table upon which lay his diploma, a roll of parchment, with the seal attached but hidden from view within a circular metal box; the left arm rests upon his college cap. In the background were to be seen the spire of St. Mary's and the facade of a collegiate building which was easily identified as that of Oriel College, Oxford. The picture bore the artist's signature as well as the date of its execution—"Jn. Kirkby, 1827." It was therefore clear that the portrait was that of a clergyman connected with Oriel who in 1827 had received a diploma from the authorities of the University; and since, moreover, the features of the person painted were those of a man of about fifty years of age, it might be assumed that his was a special diploma, granted in recognition of some unusual merit. The parchment and seal would indeed constitute a very distinctive mark, as ordinary graduates in the early part of last century received only a "Testamur"—a slip of paper on which were printed the names of the examiners, testifying that A.B. had satisfied their requirements. The picture-dealer forwarded the portrait to a dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church residing in Oxford, that he might bring the picture under the notice of the present authorities of Oriel, who might be able to identify the person represented as an alumnus of the College, and perhaps might desire to purchase it to grace their dining-hall. What clergyman of middle age, with complexion suggesting foreign birth, connected with Oriel College, had received a special diploma from the University in 1826 or 1827? The authorities of Oriel were no doubt soon able to reply that the Rev. Joseph Blanco

White had received such a diploma in 1826; that he was a Spaniard by birth, that no other graduate answered to the details of the portrait. An additional clue to identification was afforded by the pencil sketch of Blanco White contained in the first volume of Mr. Thom's Memoir. The latter was taken at least ten years later than the former, and is the likeness of an older man. The oil portrait gives the full face, the pencil sketch a profile; but in both are noticeable the high forehead, the dark hair brushed straight back from the brow, the prominent nose, and the rather deep-set eyes. The oil painting indicates something of the colour of a sallow Spanish complexion. It would appear that the authorities of Oriel had no desire to purchase the picture, for already on the walls of their inner common room, side by side with portraits of J. H. Newman, and other celebrated contemporaries of White, there hung a fine proof of the engraving contained in Mr. Thom's Memoir. No doubt that memento of a distinguished alumnus was deemed sufficient; they therefore directed the inquirer to Manchester College, where, perhaps, the painting might find a purchaser. The Rev. J. E. Odgers had an opportunity to examine the portrait, and felt confident that it was a likeness of Blanco White; but he believed that the most fitting home for the picture would be Ullet-road Church, in Liverpool, which already contains a marble memorial slab with bas-relief. Negotiations led eventually to the purchase of the picture by the executors of the late Mr. Thom, who have presented it to the Council of the Church, and it now finds a place on the walls of the Church Hall. Blanco White died in May, 1841, and was interred in the yard in the rear of Renshaw-street Chapel, a spot which has recently been taken over by the City authorities and laid out as a public garden, to be used henceforth as a resting place for the weary and the workless, amid the din of the great city.

To increase the certainty of identification, if, indeed, that were necessary, search has been made in the Blanco White documents which are now preserved in the library of the Liverpool University. It was known that White wrote voluminous diaries, and it was hoped that in these reference could be found to his sittings to Kirkby, and the circumstances attending the taking of the portrait. Most unfortunately the diaries for 1826 and 1827 are missing. Search was then made in his private accounts—all minutely kept—for 1827, but there was no mention of the painter's fee. Hence it must be presumed that this was a presentation portrait, and, indeed, White's slender means would scarcely have enabled him to engage on his own account the services of a painter of some eminence in his profession as Kirkby appears to have been. But to whom then was the portrait presented? To White himself or to his College Hall? Not to himself, since the large size of the picture would scarcely render it a suitable adornment in the sitting-room of a solitary clergyman who had no permanent abiding place. More probably, therefore, the picture was a gift to the common room or dining hall at Oriel. Who are likely to have suggested the presentation of such a portrait? White had many attached friends when he became a member of Oriel. There were Dr. Coplestone, the Provost; Dr. Hawkins, the Dean; Whateley, Pusey, Wilberforce, Hurrell Froude, J. H. Newman, Ogilvie of Balliol, Dr. Cotton of Worcester, &c. We know that these were all deeply interested in White, who in addition to the charm of his personality, and the vivacity of his conversational powers, was a distinguished convert from the Church of Rome. These friends may certainly have combined to defray the cost of the portrait, and to present it to the authorities of Oriel. May we not conjecture that this was done, and that the picture remained in that College for eight years, until, in 1835, White felt himself under the painful necessity, through change in his theological opinions, of asking that his name should be taken off the College books? (See his last touching letter to Dr. Hawkins, then Provost of Oriel, in Mr. Thom's Memoir, vol. ii. 88-9). At the same time, for conscientious reasons, he renounced his M.A. degree. May we not surmise that in consequence of his thus breaking every link of connection, both with Oriel and the University, the picture was discarded, possibly at White's own request, by the officers of the college? The world has grown more liberal to heretics since the third decade of the last century, and if the portrait of White was then allowed to disappear from the College walls, it is some satisfaction to those who revere his memory to know that (as already stated) Oriel is not without a pleasing memorial of him now.

There is, however, another possible conjecture. Whateley may have had this portrait of his friend painted at his own expense, and for himself. He may have looked forward in confident anticipation to becoming the occupier of a deanery, or of a bishop's palace, where this portrait should find a fitting resting place and help to remind him of his Oxford companions, when they should be far away. When Whateley was made Archbishop of Dublin in 1831, and White went to reside with him as clerical secretary and boon companion, this portrait may have been in the eyes of both men a visible symbol of their friendship. When White, under sheer pressure of conscience, renounced the Evangelical Protestant form of Christianity and quitted the Archbishop's palace, Whateley's ardour for his friend grew cold, and it may be that the picture was discarded either at that time or subsequently at the Archbishop's death. But this, again, is conjecture only; we know not through what strange episodes the picture passed down to the time when, sixty-eight years after it was painted, it was found in Birmingham in 1905, without the dignity of a frame. Let us hope that whatever may have been its history during that long period the picture has found at last a permanent home among those who know how to value it. The marble bas-relief in the church cloisters has found its appropriate counterpart in the oil portrait in the Church Hall. Tender associations with Renshaw-street worthies are still cherished there, though now the congregation worships some two miles off in a spot which, a generation or two back, was far away in the pleasant meadows to the south.

RENSHAW STREET, LIVERPOOL.

THE site of Renshaw-street Chapel (1811-1899), of which the Ullet-road Church, in Sefton Park, is the present successor, is now covered by the fine buildings of the Wesleyan Central Hall, a memorial to the late Charles Garrett. Of what has happened to the burial ground, the following account is given in the Ullet-road Church Calendar for August, under the title "Roscoe Garden":—

The burial ground attached to Renshaw-street Chapel has undergone a surprising change, and yet not one grave has been disturbed, not one relic of the past has been removed. As, in past years, one looked out from the window of the vestry of the chapel, one saw a rectangular piece of ground sloping upward to the building used as a British School in Mount Pleasant; this ground was covered with flat grave-stones, and its rather mournful appearance was redeemed only by the memory of those whose ashes rested there, whose names have for long been as household words amongst us. And now the graves have all been covered over with a good depth of soil, and the yard, including the site of the British Schools, has been artistically laid out as an ornamental garden, henceforth the property of the Corporation of Liverpool; it will be preserved for ever under proper regulations as another public breathing-space in the heart of the city. Through the centre of the garden, from the point where formerly stood the chapel vestry to the handsome gateway in Mount Pleasant runs a tiled pathway; and where this path reaches the level of the street there has been erected, through the generosity of a member of our church, a cupola or mausoleum, designed by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A., which is not only an object of artistic value but also of historic interest. On an octagonal base, which is reached by four sets of steps, stands a square pillar, surmounted by a canopy supported by eight columns. The canopy is roofed with green tiles, and on the apex is placed a metal cross. Two bronze tablets affixed to the pillar recite the reason for the erection of this memorial; the one facing Mount Pleasant reads thus:—
"This monument is erected as a memorial of Renshaw-street Chapel: Built in 1811 for the worship of Almighty God; also in grateful remembrance of those who ministered therein, among whom were John Hamilton Thom, William Henry Channing, Charles Beard; and in memory of the worshippers within its walls, and of William Roscoe, Joseph Blanco White, and all who were laid to rest in this ground.

The faithful men of every land,
Who Christ's own rule obey;
The Holy Dead of every time,
The Church of Christ are they."

The tablet on the side facing the Central Hall is thus worded:—"The Chapel stood to the south of this spot facing Renshaw-street. The monumental tablets within it are placed in the cloisters of Ullet-road Church, to which the congregation removed in 1899. The site of the Chapel and graveyard was sold to the Corporation of Liverpool, who made this garden, preserving a record of the graves and the inscriptions thereon, which may also be seen at the Church. This monument was erected in 1905 by one who worshipped here for sixty years." On the wall to the left of the entrance to the garden a mural tablet has been placed, bearing these words:—"On this site stood the Mount Pleasant British Schools, erected 1821, closed 1901, after eighty years of useful work." The stone on which this inscription is cut, bearing the representation of an open Bible, once stood above the school doorway. The handsome iron gate and railings on the Mount Pleasant side are the gift of Mr. R. R. Meade-King, J.P.

One relic of the former use of the garden as a place of burial still remains. It is a small piece of red stone in the wall to the right which records that beneath lie the remains of William Roscoe (1753-1831), one of Liverpool's most honoured citizens. A short sketch of his life was given in the Calendar for February last.* It will be remembered that in our cloisters is to be seen his monument and bust, transferred from Renshaw-street Chapel.

The new garden was formally opened on Saturday, July 7, by Sir John Brunner, who, as a member of the congregation which formerly worshipped on that spot, was fittingly chosen to perform the ceremony. After referring to the illustrious dead who rested there, and to the interesting historical associations connected therewith, he proposed "Roscoe Garden" as an appropriate name for the newly opened ground, a suggestion which met with the approval of all present.

IMPRESSIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

III.

Few things can be more provocative of "language" than photography from a moving train. Vainly does the observation car, most excellent institution, offer its advantages, if at the critical moment some enthusiastic lady, craning after the same view, suddenly thrusts her much-behatted head between you and the front of your train, which should have been "snapped" in the very act of crawling round the curve of one of the famous loops. Here is the western entrance to Rogers Pass, commanding a superb distant view of glaciers, peaks, and snow fields, and the train, great luck! is slowing down, and will surely stop—for a moment. Yes, it will, and land you plumb behind a coal shed! The pass itself, a stupendous cleft between two noble snowclad walls of rock, that will be a fine subject as one draws away from it! All is ready, the picture "found," and improving every second, when suddenly darkness, and a new noise is added to the usual clank and roar. Nothing has come to an end except your picture. It is only a snow shed, most necessary, but ugly, protection to the line in these parts. By the time you are out of it that chance is gone. Round the mountain side to the left, and there lies the Beaver Valley, 1,000 ft. below, with, alas! so many noble trees destroyed by fire still clinging to its sides. Fully determined to be ready for the noted spot where, by a light steel bridge, the rails cross a ravine many hundred feet deep, you find yourself upon and across it, with a vague sense of flying through space above distant foaming waters—and no picture taken. So it goes on, as you wind the 1,800 ft. down to Golden. Here there must be a chance while the most vigorous of engines prepares for the 2,700 ft. of the Kicking Horse Pass, for here, looking south and up a broad green valley, traversed by the great Columbia River, there stretches in long perspective on either side a procession of mountains whereof no end is seen. To the east lie the Rockies, rock, snow, and wood, irregular, rugged, and wild; to the west the Selkirks, wood, snow, and rock, far more regular and constant in outline, and almost peaceful in effect—a grand view and a great subject. Yes, but the blazing afternoon sun falls straight upon your lens, and the whole is far too much for your little kodak. Put it away, for it troubleth our peace, it provoketh to language!

* * * *

Among the many points in regard to which one institutes idle comparisons between the Rockies and the Alps is the question of the flowers. Reluctantly one has to admit that Switzerland is in this respect certainly equalled, probably surpassed. True, one misses the glorious blue of the gentians, red of the Alpen-rose, and pink of the little primula. Saxifrages are less varied and interesting, and androsaces not found by us. Other old friends also are not to be seen. But many and varied are the new beauties to which, with no book to assist one, it is impossible to do even scant justice. The flora of the Rockies is not yet in any adequate manner described. New varieties, even species, we are told, are still being frequently found. But a work is in preparation, which will be a great addition to the pleasure of the flower-lover there, and it was our good fortune to spend one pleasant morning at Field, hunting for specimens in the company of the accomplished lady who is painting the illustrations for it, and who was able to name many things for us.

Great is the variety of flowering shrubs. Some I have already named. Three others stand out prominent in the recollection of that morning. The Labrador Tea, a pure white version of the Alpen-rose, only more delicate and feathery in texture; the Lonicera, with shining dark green foliage, large leaved, and for flowers, yellow petals against dull red sepals, almost more beautiful when the petals are replaced by bright black berries giving a rare combination of lustrous green and black with dull red interposed; the Blueberry, with its light green foliage and delicate little apricot flower bells.

If the place of honour among the beauties of that morning's walk must be given to any, let it be to the Linnaea borealis, alike for its charm and its extraordinary profusion. Carpeting the rocks, clothing decaying logs, in masses here, in long extended trails there, its lovely pink flowerets were with us all along.

Everywhere, too, the white stars of the Cornus, another pleasant reminder of Norway, looked up at us. Easily to be mistaken for it at first sight is the exquisite little Clintonia lily. Nor must the glowing Tiger Lily, so called, but more like an Amaryllis, be forgotten, nor that one (name, alas, gone) tall growing with light green foliage, like that of the Solomon's Seal, and bunches of white flowers suggesting meadow-sweet, locally known either as false Spirea or false Solomon's Seal. True Solomon's Seal in several varieties, one with red flowers is also there.

Of Switzerland, the most familiar reminders were perhaps the Pyrolas. Uniflora, or something very like it—Monaces (?), with delicate white hanging bells, ordinary white and green, and a splendid sturdy brownish pink variety; the little branching mauve gentian; violas, small yellow (but not biflora), lilac and blue; a white Saxifrage; Arnica, Dryas, the white Octopetala and a yellow variety, and small anemones. Elsewhere we found the large purple and white ones.

Roses and willow-herbs, some of the latter twice the size we are accustomed to, put us in touch with home, as also did a honeysuckle, different from but quite as beautiful as ours.

Great was the wealth of yellow columbines. Everywhere also were the thalictrums, sometimes as delicate as maidenhair, sometimes suggesting a columbine in foliage. Go a little way up in the woods, and you shall find a purple clematis trailing among the shrubs, and purple asters springing from the grass.

Orchis, too, white and green, reminded us of other places, but nowhere else have we found such cypripediums. The little purple gold, and chocolate one (calypso) was over, but we had seen it at Banff; the white-lobed one was here, and also the larger yellow, all lovely flowers. Here, too, was a large shrubby potentilla, quite a new idea in such flowers.

Last to be named, as most definitely characteristic, but not as completing this very imperfect list, is the wonderful Indian paint brush. In little clumps or large masses, and in all kinds of places it claims predominance. In height from 6 to 18 in., in colour all varieties of red from delicate flesh tints, through salmon, to glowing scarlet and vermilion. The name suggests the plant of which not only the flowers but also the top leaves are highly coloured, and glow wonderfully in the sunlight. It makes a very splendid effect, either alone or, as we have seen it, clothing a shady bank, intermingled with large deep blue forget-me-nots, or disputing with golden arnicas the possession of some sunny slope.

But who shall describe flowers? It is as unsatisfactory as pressing them, and I cease the attempt in fear lest some botanist overwhelm me with reproaches, as did on that memorable morning a heavy thunderstorm overwhelm and send us hurrying to our hotel literally drenched to the skin.

* * * *

The word hotel suggests interests less æsthetic. Said a friend to me once, after a long day's tramp, "Let us live at the rate of £10,000 a year for the next ten minutes," whereupon something was ordered. I have not yet met with places where that operation may be more easily performed than the C.P.R. hotels. The carnal man looks back with some regret on their well-furnished salons and spacious dining halls, where Chinese boys, gorgeous in many coloured garments, differing with each meal, and rising to the splendours of purple and gold on the head men at dinner time, silently anticipate your wants, murmuring soft answers, not always intelligible, to your demands; to the wonderfully varied menus, from which even a vegetarian may select a substantial meal; to their plentiful supply of fresh fruits and ice, to the excellent bedrooms with private bathrooms and unlimited hot and cold water attached, to the great civility and trouble taken for you by their friendly managers, to their Swiss guides who will take care of you up aloft, or native ones who will pilot you through the valleys, and tell you about the hard winter life, when they turn to "trapping" for a living, to the polite drivers of their carriages who will often prove to be "college men" turning a vacation to account—were there not some three or four "medicals" doing duty in this way at Field;—For all of which things you shall be duly brought to account in dollars at the finish, yet without any attempt to charge you more than you knew you were spending as you went along. The company has rendered a great service in establishing these places at centres along their line. There is, however, some danger that in ministering to the wants of wholly lazy and fashionable people they will, by setting up similar establishments under the specious name of chalets, at places off the line, and building roads to them, do a great deal to spoil spots better left to camping expeditions and a rougher way of living.

A LITTLE ALPINE FLOWER.

THE stillness is enhanced by occasional thunder of falling avalanches, as they slip from their fastnesses under the stress of heat of a June noonday. No midsummer haze veils the dazzling whiteness of the towering peaks, snow-clad anew by the fall of the previous night. The beholder's vision is blinded by excess of light. Even the unclouded azure becomes, by comparison, a duller region, offering a soft resting-place to the eyes. The majesty of the Alps awes the mind as their aspect overcomes the sight.

To a world remote, superhuman, belong the abyss of blue and the high range of glistening summits surmounting the snow-fields and glaciers upon their flanks. The impassioned serenity of sky, the unsullied purity of mountain height, alienate in man everything save what is most spiritual and impersonal. Amid this vastness and solitude, the heart of man shrinks into nothingness. Recently, an art-student, afflicted with a morbid distaste for life, fled from these "hideous and terrible mountains," as he named them, and came to London to commit suicide. For even that last vestige of self-importance, involved in a desire for annihilation, shrivels up among these altitudes.

Strange how these white-robed crags still dwarf the lord of creation, who was made but a little lower than the creative divinities. Man's unhallowed feet have scaled every one of these Alpine giants; he has pierced one monster from side to side; he has made a spiral pathway for his steam-car within the bowels of another; the smut from his engines has polluted the vestal sheen of pinnacles once held to be unscaleable. Yet for all that, the Alps remain invincible, and abide moral victors after every defeat, where they lie pillowed on the breast of star-sown space.

It would seem as if once the earth, in supreme desire to wrest the secret of heaven, had lifted crest upon crest in high-mountaining ambition, until a sudden apocalypse had petrified their molten motion, and they had since been held in marbled wonder, everlastingly silenced and awed. And man, who knows not why they pause or wherefore they wait, is struck with awe and silence too.

Yet to-day, I heed them not, for at my feet lies the goal of my quest, the little flower I had come seven hundred miles to see.

God's own Thoughts.

Mendelssohn, looking upon the same prospect of peakland and white expanses and monstrous towers that seemed to join hands around and enfold him, wrote in deep emotion, "I have a feeling that God's own thoughts must look something like this. Whoever does not know God may find Him here, and the nature He has made, clear before his eyes."

In sooth, the scene is charged with religious suggestiveness. These shelterless wastes, wearing the mien of blanched fearfulness, save when the radiance of sunset bathes them in an incredible glow, lending them a flushed semblance of happiness, as though a tide of life had filled every empty vein and suffused them from crown to neck with a blush of surpassing beauty; these magnificent corridors that filled the mind of the agnostic Tyndall with a sense of saintliness and holiness, reminding him of that eastern religion whose essence is the repression of all action, and the substitution for it of immortal calm, are eloquent of God. But it is of the majesty and almightiness of God they speak. A dearer revelation, however, meets the eyes that dwell upon the flowers lying scattered at our feet. The flashing peak tells of God as a distant Being dwelling in awful Holiness; the flower tells of a gracious Presence, benign and alluring and near. One gives us a sense of Power, vast and inexorable, the other conveys a sense of the tenderness of God and his sweet lovingkindness.

Dearer than the Alps are the flowers of the Alps. The English visitor encounters the double pleasure of variety and novelty. He meets the old flowers with which he has been long familiar, but in brighter hue and more prodigal profusion. He also sees the flowers he has tried to rear in his garden, growing wild in provoking abundance. Then every day adds an element of rapture by revealing new forms he has not seen before, until he becomes a child in wonderland, delighted with fresh and constant discoveries.

The Swiss peasant is furnished with a happy way of blending the artistic and utilitarian, for the enclosed pastures around his châlet, which yield three crops of fodder, are each a paradise of blossom; and a sight of them enables one to understand the gentle look in the eyes of the fawn kine who are fed on the harvest of this elysium, or the rich bowls of honey which grace every breakfast-table, seeing from what chalices the bees extract their store.

An ascent from the valley to the snow-line, by giving diversity of altitude, which in its effects corresponds to succession of the seasons or diversity of climate, enables one to gradually change the luxuriance and magnificence of midsummer for the earliest harbingers of spring. And the higher one ascends, the brighter, the more beautiful, the more varied become the flowers.

"Probably nowhere on the face of the globe (says a writer on the Alpine flora) is to be found, especially in the spring and early summer, a greater wealth of brightly coloured flowers, often growing in enormous masses, festooning the rocks, and making of the Alpine pastures a veritable floral carpet. But it is not until we ascend near to the eternal snows that the full glories of the Alpine flora burst upon us; the rhododendrons, the azure of the innumerable gentians, the starlike saxifrages, white and yellow and purple, the many-hued anemones, the feathery heads and silvery leaves of Dryas octopetala, the primulas, the sempervivums, with their webbed leaves and singular blossoms, and multitudes of others."

Vulcan's flower.

Out of the two thousand and ten species of Alpine flowers, the one that appeals most forcibly to the imagination is a somewhat insignificant and modest one, the snowbell or the soldanella. Others have a more splendid aspect, whose colour intoxicates the sense, whose beauty enralls the soul; but they do not carry so intensely human a suggestion. Grant Allen has made everyone familiar with the life history of this little plant, which, in order to be early in the field, and prevent its being concealed from fertilising insects amid plants of larger growth, has devised a peculiar method of securing an early appearance. Its object is to bloom while the snow still lies on the ground, and, in order to attain its end, it adopts the means of literally burning its way through the thin crust of congealed snow overhead. In its thick, leathery leaves it collects the necessary energy, and stores it during the summer months. The following year, while the snow is not all melted, it begins to grow, and by transmuting its accumulated energy into heat, the warm flower-spike is able to melt the snow on its way upward, to open its flowers and catch the first batch of fertilising insects. Its method of generating heat is very much the same as the human manufacture of bodily heat, by combining the carbon of its food with the oxygen of the atmosphere, and creating combustion.

From an elevation of five thousand feet up to the snowline, one may find the frilled bells of the purple and lilac snowbell swinging over the snow it has outwitted, and bearing witness to a prudent preparation for the future, to the triumph of perseverance, to making the best use of circumstances, which is almost human. Above the place where it bloomed over its self-made funnel in the snow, rose the Jungfrau gloriously resplendent, yet I deemed the mightier phenomenon rested at my feet. For the plant in its frailty and lowliness, the plant that had heard the first call of spring while still entombed beneath the snow, and bored its way to look upon the sun and keep its tryst with the early insect, betokens a higher manifestation of life than lies imprisoned in rock and ice; and the mind of its presiding genius is in advance of that which sleeps within the snow.

Thus it offered a parable how weak and fragile things, simply by belonging to a higher type of being, transcend things of vaster might. This is the hope and promise that warm the hearts of all forerunners of a newer age. The tender blooms of the higher ideal are destined to surmount the vaster powers of a lower faith and practice.

J. TYSSUL DAVIS.

AT SCROOBY ON THE FIRST OF AUGUST.

HAVING seen in THE INQUIRER of the 14th of July the announcement of the intended celebration at Plymouth, Mass., of the first gathering of the separatist congregation at Scrooby, it occurred to me to visit the village on that day. It is an hour's cycle ride from Doncaster by an excellent road through an undulating country of woods and cornfields, with occasional views of low hills of soft and pleasant outline. Scrooby lies near the junction of the rivers Idle and Rayton, in the little wedge of Nottinghamshire, which penetrates between Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, and is very like a score of other villages in this district. They have generally a squire's "hall" with a park greater or less, a church, a few middle-class houses, a greater number of cottages, all the houses being roofed with red tiles, and there are trees and gardens everywhere. Scrooby itself in April is bright with cherry and plum blossoms of several varieties of trees, and in May equally bright with pear and apple blossom also of several varieties; in this present month there is not so much fruit as usual, yet enough to give an impression of plenty and to delight the eye. The village is but small, not big enough to have a shop, the villagers going to Bawtry a mile away, though there are one or two inns. Very few English visitors turn aside to Scrooby; the principal visitors are Americans motoring between London and Edinburgh; these diverge a hundred yards from the Great North-road, spend an hour in the village, see the church and the parsonage, an older building, and especially the farm which contains the fragments of the manor house; and at different times have carried away trees and the font from the church.

The church is a beautiful object in the landscape at a little distance: the tower with its battlements and spire being remarkably graceful. A peculiarity of nearly all the village churches in this district is that they have the doorway, or a window or two, or the chancel-arch of Norman or Early English erection and style, while the rest of the building is much later, generally perpendicular; the reason given for this is that the churches fell into decay during the Wars of the Roses, and were repaired and more or less rebuilt in the reign of Henry VII. This church was evidently built throughout about the end of the fifteenth century, though the exact date does not appear to be ascertainable; and being "all of a piece" an edifice it is almost without interest. In the interior the only objects of note are three benches of oak with carved backs roughly representing vine stems with bunches of grapes, said to have been the special seats of the Brewster family.

Of the other object of great interest in the village, the manor-house, almost nothing remains—that is to say, some beams, rafters, and oak carving embedded in a barn. This is to be lamented; for this manor-house was of historical interest. The manor and the house belonged to the See of York, and, therefore, at the beginning of the sixteenth century to Cardinal Wolsey. After his fall he retired here for several months, and it is supposed that here he received Henry's summons to London in the autumn of 1530 to be tried on a charge of high treason: at a day or two's journey from Scrooby he could proceed no further, but stopped at Leicester Monastery and there died.

That I suppose is history; at least it makes no great demands on credulity. On a former occasion being at this place and being shown the oak beams and carvings, the farmer took me and a friend outside, and pointed to a bend in the Rayton which runs by the end of the farm, and here is hardly deep enough for ducks to swim in—pointed to a bend a hundred yards further down, and said: "That is where the Pilgrim Fathers embarked." We felt we were being trifled with, but my friend said good-humouredly: "No doubt they carried the Mayflower from there down stream on their shoulders to the Trent." Our cicerone looked puzzled for a moment, but eventually answered, "Aw dare say they did." "And because they started from here they called the place they landed at in America Plymouth," continued my friend. "Happen!" answered the other. Was that farmer consciously trifling with us?

A very rapid speaker, on one occasion quoting Tennyson's "Morte d'Arthur," by a slip of the tongue said: "All my mind is clouded with a date." The early history of the congregation at Scrooby appears to be clouded with exactly the contrary—a "plentiful lack" of dates—and there is a want of definiteness, too, in the records concerning persons and places. William Bradford, who must have known as much as anybody, and who wrote memoirs concerning this movement, does not even name Scrooby as the seat of this Independent church, or as the place whence the first emigrants went to Holland, but speaks indefinitely of a village near the junction of the counties of York, Lincoln, and Nottingham, a description which applies more accurately to Austerfield, his own village, than to Scrooby. Still, the matter is beyond doubt; that admirable antiquarian, the Rev. Joseph Hunter, set it at rest by investigation of local legal records, fixing Scrooby as the seat of the Brewster family, and making many other conclusions the results of obvious inference. Of course, the congregation at Scrooby did not see the great tree which would arise from the acorn they planted: they were intent only on the passing event, and the time of exactitude in chronicling had not come; there is, for example, in the parish record at Scrooby a certification of the solemnisation of a marriage in which the names of the parties married are omitted. This is on the authority of the present clergyman at Scrooby.

However, the general features appear to be these. At Scrooby, towards the end of the sixteenth century, in occupation of the manor appears to have been William Brewster, a man of ardent and predominating character. It is not certain that he owned the property; it seems likely that he did not. There appears to be evidence that the manor still belonged to the See of York, and that a few years later it was leased by an Archbishop Sandys to a son of his, Sir Samuel Sandys. But Brewster at the time above mentioned was a man of great influence, and was postmaster at Scrooby, supplying horses, lodging, and food to travellers on the stage of 18 miles from Retford to Doncaster. How and where Brewster became a Brownist I have no means of ascertaining: but in his own neighbourhood he was evidently the moving spirit of radicalism in church government, and was named "elder Brewster." Perhaps it was on his invitation that there came to Scrooby at the end of the sixteenth century John Smyth and Richard Clifton, both former students of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, both Independents, and the latter rector at that time of Babwith, near Retford. At the first blush we naturally associate the Pilgrim Fathers with John Robinson, and John Robinson with Scrooby. He however, it appears, only came to Scrooby from Norwich in 1604, two years at the utmost before the church doors were closed, and the congregation began to meet in the manor house. Robinson, like another late apostle, ultimately became chief, and belongs less to Scrooby than to Leyden and new Plymouth.

But all this, together with the flight to Boston and towards Hull, is leaving Scrooby and its peculiar part behind. Keeping to this village, there does not appear to be any information extant as to when the manor house was destroyed, whether Brewster and his friends worshipped in some room with carven oak beams, some baronial dining-hall where Archbishops with their trains of ecclesiastics had feasted together, or met in some part of the present farm buildings, possibly the present barn. Perhaps better informed persons can supply every detail. If they can it is time that they should give their knowledge to the public; Americans, at least, would be thankful to them.

Taking a last look at the interior of the church before departing, and noticing its comparatively modern aspect, one wonders by what magic touches Hawthorne contrived to get the atmosphere of remote antiquity in the "Scarlet Letter" and the "House of Seven Gables." Was it a mere illusion produced by

Hawthorne, or is it that we have not the least idea of what Scrooby was by seeing it without the men and the costumes of other times, and without hearing the language and re-thinking the thought of three hundred years ago? But even then fact is another thing than the illusion produced by art.

Character and circumstance work together, character being the main factor in the production of results. Without William Brewster there would have been no separatist congregation at Scrooby, and the whole history of the settlement of New England would have been different; and the Americans have a true feeling as to the momentousness of events in making Scrooby a place of pilgrimage. They are the pilgrims and this is the shrine; those whom they call the Pilgrim Fathers were properly Pioneer Fathers. I daresay many a shrine, regarded with awe by the multitude won its sanctity by far less of credible nobleness in the beginning than this one, and few have been the fountains of material and moral consequences of equal magnitude. TER-CENTENARY OF NONCONFORMITY.

SHEFFIELD UNITARIAN CELEBRATION.

ON the 1st inst. the congregation (now Unitarian) of the First Church at Plymouth, Mass., U.S.A. (the Church of the Pilgrim Fathers), celebrated its 300th anniversary there. As already stated in our columns, it boasts of a continuous history from its foundation at Scrooby, Notts., in 1606, and has preserved continuous records, an unbroken ministry, and the original covenant of faith.

Last Sunday, at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, both services were made appropriate to the occasion, the preacher being the Rev. C. J. Street. Speaking in the morning, he pointed out that 300 years of sturdy Nonconformity had entered into the very fibre of the national character, and done more than anything else to preserve religion in its spiritual freshness, and make it, not a mere institution, but a matter of grave personal concern. Spiritual peace had been won at a cost of much pain and sacrifice. These were days when it was hard to realise the full significance of the revolt of early Puritanism, to which they owed everlasting gratitude. Only the bravest and sincerest spirits could bear the strain, and take the responsibility, of standing apart from the established form of worship, and of meeting together, against the law and under threat of condign penalty, to approach the Spirit of Truth in a perfectly truthful spirit. The separatist Puritans were the Protestants of Protestants. They felt themselves unable conscientiously to conform to the ritual and creed and authority of the State Church of their day. They found in it much of the arrogance, and no little of the error and superstition of the Roman Catholic Church, whose place it had taken. They realised that it was a Church of Compromise, and compromise upon sacred issues was felt by them to be sinful. So they took the serious step of separation, and of providing for the religious needs of earnest souls by establishing little groups of worshippers—"Conventicles," as they came to be called, self-contained and independent, responsible to no human authority beyond the actual church membership, amenable to no law but that of God. The theology of 1606 was not the theology of 1906; and some, if not all, of the founders of the Scrooby Church would have been startled, not to say horrified, if they could have foreseen the developments which have since taken place; if, e.g., they could realise that their Church, removed first to Holland, and then to New England, with an unbroken continuity of 300 years, should in process of time become sturdily Unitarian, as it has for generations been and is to-day. But the evolution had been a perfectly natural one, as the history of many of the Puritan foundations showed, and especially of those meeting houses in this country established in the latter part of the 17th century, with trust deeds free from any doctrinal obligation (as that of Upper Chapel was), most of which had developed in exactly the same way. The Unitarianism for which the living First Church of the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth, Mass., stood, and for which their own historical congregation also stood after more than 200 years of continuous spiritual life, was the ripened product of three centuries of religious thought and life. The preacher concluded with an earnest appeal to the children of to-day, reared in a faith of freedom, to be true to the sacred responsibilities won for them and entrusted to them by the sufferings and conscientiousness of their forefathers.

At the evening service, Mr. Street told the story of "The Pilgrim Fathers," from the foundation of the Separatist Church at Scrooby, in 1606, to their settlement in New England. William Brewster, of the Manor House, Scrooby, gathered the congregation together to meet in his house. When formed into a church John Robinson was pastor, Richard Clifton teacher, and William Brewster elder. William Bradford, of Austerfield (Yorks), close by, afterwards Governor of New England, was a young and ardent member. Driven by persecution from the country, they sought refuge in Holland, where the free conscience was respected. At Amsterdam for a year, they then removed to Leyden, where they remained till 1620. Desirous, however, especially for the sake of their children, to be under the British flag, they resolved to emigrate to the newly formed colony of New England. A portion of the church was set apart to be reconstituted in the New World. Embarking at Delft on July 2, 1620, in the Speedwell they came to Southampton, where they were joined by another detachment of pilgrims who had sailed from London in the Mayflower. On August 5, 1620, both vessels set out to cross the Atlantic, but were beaten back by adverse winds and weather. The Speedwell was discharged, and all the emigrants (101 in number) gathered on the Mayflower, which, after a perilous journey, reached Cape Cod about Nov. 9. At Plymouth (then called Patuxét), they established a strong community, though not without great difficulties and sufferings. Their church was immediately reconstituted with William Brewster as ruling elder, and for some years pastor and teacher also. In the office of elder he remained till his death, in 1643. William Bradford was appointed governor in the spring of 1621, and for the greater part of the next 37 years held that office. Clifton, an old man, had remained at Amsterdam, and John Robinson, who was to have followed the first set of pilgrims to the new colony, died in Leyden. The original church of the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth had remained true to this day to the spirit which had always actuated it at Scrooby, Amsterdam, and Leyden, under the leadership of Robinson. "I beseech you, remember," he said to the departing pilgrims at Delft, "it is an article of your Church Covenant that you are ready to receive whatever truth may be made known to you from the written Word of God." This was the sacred principle of free religion, which sought the right to exercise the individual conscience without interfering with the liberty of another.

On Monday a party of forty Sheffield and Rotherham Unitarians visited Scrooby, and on the site of the old Manor House, in which the church was originated, Mr. Street gave an historical account of the church and of William Brewster, the guiding genius. The Rev. Joseph Hunter's researches had resulted in the discovery that Brewster was postmaster from at least April 12, 1594, to September 30, 1607, Scrooby being at that time one of the stages on the Great North road between London and Berwick, though the road had been diverted since so as to pass through Bawtry, leaving Scrooby on the left hand. In April, 1608, Brewster was one of three Scrooby men to be fined £20 each by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for non-appearance to their citation, the probability being that by that time he was on his way to Holland with the rest of the Church.

A visit was paid by the party to Scrooby Church, in which an appropriate hymn was sung, and then they proceeded to Austerfield, inspecting there the old Manor House, in which William Bradford was born, and brought up. In front of the house Mr. Street gave a historical sketch of Bradford's life, showing how, as a boy of twelve, the Scriptures had made a deep impression on him. He came under the inspiring influence of Richard Clifton, clergyman at Babworth, and afterwards teacher of the Scrooby Separatist community. Under Brewster's guidance he, at the age of sixteen or seventeen, joined that Church, incurring thereby the wrath of his uncles, who had brought him up, and the scoff of the neighbours. To their expostulations he answered, "To keep a good conscience, and walk in such a way as God has prescribed in His word, is a thing which I must prefer before you all, and above life itself." This noble spirit, so truly emblematic of the Pilgrim Fathers, characterised his life throughout. A visit was paid to the Austerfield Church, recently restored and enlarged at the expense of the descendants of the men of the Mayflower. And so ended a happy and appropriate excursion pilgrimage.

THE VAN MISSION.

EARBY AND SKIPTON.

EARBY.—A capital site in the fair ground of this village was willingly put at the service of the missionaries. On the first evening the Rev. W. Reynolds concluded his five days' mission with the van by addressing the assembled villagers for forty-five minutes on the subject of the Unitarian Deity. Mr. A. Woodhead was good enough to come over from Colne to play the harmonium. The congregation sometimes approached 100, 75 per cent. of whom were adults, nearly all men. After the meeting a group of inquirers, varying from forty to a dozen at the end, remained discussing with the missionaries till 10.25. Several entered the van, and all made small purchases. This was a good start, and great things were expected from the appreciative hearing accorded the message on the opening meeting. On the succeeding day the Rev. W. Reynolds' place was taken by the Rev. H. McLachlan, who travelled from Manchester as special week-end missionary. A good deal of rain fell for an hour before the meeting, which was delayed in consequence, but only a little fell during the proceedings. The organist of our church at Colne, Mr. J. H. Wilkinson, presided at the instrument, and his wife sang the sacred song entitled "Tears," which was thoroughly appreciated by a considerable audience. The attendance was good, both as regards numbers and the attention paid, several staying throughout the meeting, after which the missionary replied to many inquiries, a good impression being made. Four men entered the van, two staying till 11 p.m., displaying great interest and friendliness. Had the rain stopped the address, they said, it was their intention to invite the preacher to finish it in the hall of the Victoria Institute close by.

Only a short service was held on the Sunday afternoon, the weather being exceedingly hot, with a brilliant sun. The expected musicians did not put in an appearance, and the delay occasioned from this cause lost us some of those who came at the advertised time, but who did not wait. The town brass band, which was giving a free sacred concert at the time of the meeting, also proved a greater attraction than the van, although a number of children remained loyal to it. Good things were, however, in store for us in the evening, when Miss E. Crabtree, of Colne, took charge of the harmonium, her sister singing two solos, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and "Softly the silent Night," which augmented the company considerably. The congregation of some 80 adults and 30 children were punctually in attendance, and this number was the minimum during the service, the figures rising to 103 adults, who sang heartily. The van being within a few yards of the main thoroughfare, the company constantly received additions from passers-by, several of whom had prayer-books in their hands, remaining on the outskirts of our congregation, attentive listeners to the address on salvation. Seven-eighths of the crowd were men, and a most sympathetic hearing was given to the Rev.

H. McLachlan's discourse. After the meeting the missionary engaged in discussion until 9.30 with at least a dozen men, surrounded by fifty or so of the company. Seven men entered the van, where they remained in friendly talk till 10.20. From the many expressions of goodwill and regret at the brevity of our visit, it was gathered that Earby offered fertile soil for Unitarian thought. A page of the visitors' book was filled with the names of sympathisers, and only the difficulty of approaching the book prevented a still larger record of friends.

SKIPTON.—No difficulty presented itself in securing an excellent pitch for the van in the High-street of this ancient town, where it was soon seen that the inhabitants were well disposed towards our views of religion, in fact the encouragement given to the missionaries by what proved to be record attendances, caused the visit to be prolonged to a full week instead of the usual three days. The van being within a couple of yards of the pavement, an easy opportunity was given to foot passengers to read the Affirmation Posters, and many availed themselves of it, several having talks with the missionaries. The Rev. H. Kelsey White was the missionary for the week, and on the Monday a meeting of an hour and a half's duration was conducted by him and the Rev. H. McLachlan, who played the harmonium as well as spoke on the uses of the Bible. The visiting missionary addressed a large congregation on the Bible, 160 adults being counted at one time, while during the greater part of the meeting there were not less than 120 present, besides children. Public discussion continued after the meeting till 10.20, when three men entered the van, two remaining till 11 o'clock.

Tuesday's meeting was presided over by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who subsequently discoursed on the person of Christ. The audience numbered 20 adults to begin with, but in a very few minutes grew to 97 and a few young folk, and at the conclusion of the rev. gentleman's address there were 120 adults keenly interested. After he had left for home, the missionary spoke briefly on the same subject, and then invited questions. These and replies carried the meeting past 10 o'clock, for scores of questions were put by a dozen men on a multitude of points. The crowd, composed mostly of men of all classes, was estimated to reach 250 at 9.15, and even at the late hour of closing numbered 200. Everyone seemed to thoroughly appreciate the solo, "The Holy City," which our co-religionist, Miss Ada McCann, of Lower Mosley-street, Manchester, sang from the van platform without instrumental help, and doubtless her effort materially assisted to bring the crowd together, thus assuring the first speaker a good-sized congregation from the start. The feeling of the audience was very good-humoured and sympathetic, and all, with hardly an exception, appeared much interested in the answers, given as they were promptly and frankly.

An audience of 80 men, women, and children assembled on Wednesday evening before the meeting began, and when the missionary commenced his discourse on "The God we Worship," there were fully 150 adults present. This figure was never reduced, the company increasing to well over 200. Close attention was given throughout, but a heavy shower brought the meeting to an untimely end at 8.45, just when questions were being put. The crowd, estimated to number between 350 and 400, slowly dispersed at the suggestion of the missionary that they should take cover. Again a number of men entered the van, remaining until a late hour. The weather on the following day was very favourable, and a capital meeting was looked forward to, many complementary remarks having been made to the missionaries during the daytime. Miss Ada McCann once more obliged with a solo, "The Heavenly Song," eliciting murmurs of approval. Someone, however, had come with the determination to spoil the meeting, and, immediately the Rev. H. Kelsey White commenced his discourse, he was interrupted by an octogenarian man, who, at a distance of 15 yards from the van, mounted on a heap of paving stones near the gas lamp, read in a loud voice from the Scriptures, denouncing Unitarian Christianity in no measured terms. He was proof against all appeals to be quiet, asserting his right to continue, claiming that he was on private land. In order to gain time, the missionary invited the crowd to gather round the van and sing "Lead, Kindly Light," which was done very heartily, and helped to draw an increased audience together. This was followed by "Nearer, my God, to Thee," after which the missionary, under most trying conditions, continued his address to a company which now numbered between 400 and 500, three-fourths of whom gave their undivided attention to him, the remainder gathering round the "Skipton Critic"—to give him his local designation—and incited him to provide merriment for them. After the address questions were invited, and many people took advantage of the opportunity, the missionary displaying his exceptional powers of giving clear expositions of Unitarian views on the subjects upon which information was desired. At the close of the meeting many apologies were offered by Skiptonians for the unjustifiable action of their fellow townsman, whose unchristian behaviour they deplored. The missionary was also repeatedly complimented on his determination not to be silenced by such a method, however disconcerting the interruption might be.

We were prepared for similar annoyance at the meeting next day, but it soon appeared that his efforts on the previous day had rendered the offender quite hoarse, and thus incapable of disturbing the meeting. Miss McCann and her friend, Miss Ogden, turned up to lead the singing, to the great satisfaction of the missionaries. Some thirty youths being present, the missionary prefaced his address with some remarks on the power of influence, after which he discoursed on "Unitarianism, an Affirmative Faith." The maximum present during the address bordered on 200, and the company never fell below 160 adults. When questions were invited the crowd reached fully 300, growing to between 450 and 500 at 9 o'clock.

The formal meeting concluded at 9.20, when several groups formed for discussion, and visits were paid inside the van. During the afternoon one of the townsmen drove the missionaries in his smart gig to Bolton Abbey, and repeatedly expressed his unbounded appreciation of the ministrations of the Rev. H. Kelsey White, who evidently made a firm friend and admirer in the worthy trader.

Amid many expressions of regret and friendly salutations, on Saturday morning the visiting missionary took leave of newly made friends, and returned to his labours at Ashton-under-Lyne, the final meeting at Skipton being presided over by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who had the gratification of introducing to a large audience the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman and the Rev. William Rosling, of Bradford. Saturday is market day at Skipton, and the High-street presented a very busy appearance throughout the day, the van having to compete with ice-cream barrows and stalls of many kinds of merchandise. Both addresses took the form of autobiographical sketches of their respective religious homes, previous to arriving at Unitarianism. When Mr. Whiteman began to relate his experiences there were 130 adults present, that figure nearly doubling before he finished, and this highly satisfactory company of quiet and thoughtful people did not fall away throughout Mr. Rosling's remarks. The two speakers for the evening left before the conclusion of the meeting, the Rev. T. P. Spedding remaining to answer a few inquiries before the meeting terminated at 9.10, several groups remaining to discuss Unitarianism until a much later hour. Very hearty thanks were conveyed to Mr. James Hopewood, who so kindly presided at the harmonium for four successive nights. At no other place have there been so many names of strangers entered in the visitors' book, calls being made every day of the seven. On every day sales were effected, and the offertory boxes were not forgotten on any day.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bridgend.—The second annual outing of the Sunday-school took place on Tuesday; a hundred persons attended, a very large increase on last year's number. The Nottage friends lent their school and otherwise gave much appreciated help.

Chesham.—The services are suspended till the 26th inst., during the repainting of the school.

Great Hucklow.—We have just received the following:—On Sunday, June 29, in the Old Chapel, the annual sermons were preached to two good congregations by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, of Manchester. The collections were in aid of the chapel funds.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. A. Golland, M.A., has accepted an appointment as assistant minister for another year. To-morrow (12th inst.) the church will be closed; on succeeding Sundays this month, Mr. Golland will conduct the services; and during September and October, the Rev. Dr. Crothers will be the preacher. The Rev. F. K. Freeston sails for the United States next week.

London Teachers at Ascot.—On Monday, Bank Holiday, Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence again entertained a large party of teachers from the London Sunday-schools. The day was superbly fine, and all passed off successfully. About 250 were present, including representatives of the following schools:—Bell-street, Bermondsey, Blackfriars, Deptford, Essex Church, George's-row, Highgate, Islington, Kentish Town, Limehouse, Mansford-street, Rhyl-street, Stepney, Stoke Newington Green, Stratford, Walthamstow, Wandsworth. In many cases the ministers accompanied the teachers. A hearty vote of thanks was given to the host and hostess, after short addresses by the Revs. F. K. Freeston, W. G. Tarrant, and J. Toye. Sir Edwin in reply expressed the pleasure he and his wife felt in seeing so many happy guests about them, and asked his hearers, if they had received happiness through their visit, to "pass it on."

Manchester: Appointment.—The Rev. W. E. George has accepted the charge of the congregations at Chorlton-cum-Hardy and Urmston.

Northampton: Appointment.—The Rev. E. A. Voysey, having declined an invitation to Swansea, has accepted that of the congregation here.

Rochdale.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding completed twenty years' ministry here the last Sunday in July. Miss Ada N. Briggs has just completed twenty years of unbroken attendance at the Sunday-school.

Rossendale.—The Rev. J. J. Shaw has received a presentation from the young men of the congregation on the occasion of his farewell. He has been eight years minister at the Bethlehem Church.

Stourbridge: Appointment.—At a well-attended meeting held on the 15th ult., it was unanimously resolved to accept the recommendation of the committee that the Rev. John Ewart, D.Th., be appointed minister. Dr. Ewart will begin his pastoral duties in succession to the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas, on September 1.

Whitby.—On Sunday-week the Rev. F. Haydn Williams held a service of "re-dedication to the use of the poor for ever" of a portion of the Abbey Plain, measuring 1,165 square yards, which, after a contest of many years, Mr. Williams has secured for the public.

EXTERNAL criteria—that is, unmoral rules for finding moral things, physical rules for finding spiritual things—there can be none.—Martineau.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Dr. Crothers has accepted an invitation to attend and speak at a dinner of the Laymen's Club, in London, on Friday, October 26 next. Dr. Crothers is so delightful a speaker in the ordinary way that an after-dinner oration by him should be a treat indeed. Anyway, he is not likely to emulate Emerson's brevity at a certain Manchester banquet long ago when, if report says truly, the famous lecturer got as far as "Gentlemen"—and then, after an eloquent pause, sat down.

AMONG the visitors whom we have had the pleasure of seeing in London this summer is the Rev. Walter F. Greenman, of Watertown, Mass., the secretary of the American National Conference. Whether he has met Dr. Herbert Smith we do not know, but so far as enthusiastic planning for the success of next year's International Council is concerned they would be well matched. Mr. Greenman is full of the subject, describes with vivacity the great preparations being made to welcome visitors from the Old World to Boston, and urges that the English contingent shall be a large one.

COMMENTS on the West Riding education judgment, to which we alluded last week, have ranged over a broad field. Some people, in whom the wish was surely father to the thought, have expressed the opinion that the decision of the judges that Mr. Balfour's Act does not throw the cost of doctrinal teaching upon the ratepayers renders the Bill of this year unnecessary, and that the Lords will be easily excused if they reject the Bill. Others see in the interpretation of law as it stands a powerful lever in the hands of the Government. It is in the option of the Education Department, we presume, to proceed no further with the case upon which the judgment has been delivered, and in this event the "non-provided" schools will be in a tight corner. On the whole, there seems to be a splendid opportunity presented for the exercise of a little wholesome common sense. The valiant extremists on either side are more likely to provoke reprisals than to find a reasonable method of "living together" and working together for the good of the children of the nation.

MATTERS in the nearer East are troubling some and interesting others. The Sultan is said to be ill, to be dangerously ill, to be well, to have recovered—one knows not what the truth is. But the suggestion of his possible death in the near future opens the way for much serious speculation. If he goes, he bears no enviable fame with him; but it is more important to ask what his successor will be like, and what the intriguers, who hold war and peace in their hands will make of the crisis. Then the surprising news comes that the Shah of Persia is seeking a way out of his troubles by calling a Parliament! After this, what may not happen? A third, and most deplorable incident of the week, is one more bloody encounter between Greeks and Bulgarians. It is a significant commentary on the ways of nations that politicians find some relief in remembering that Russia has her hands full at this moment, and probably for long.

THE Encyclical letter of the Pope to the Bishops of France is sorry reading. Tortuous policy is bedecked as in robes of light; the most mundane considerations are hidden behind pious phraseology. This is, of course, no more than we expect from a papal document, and in the case of the present Holy Father is probably in some perverse sense perfectly sincere, since Pius X. was celebrated as a good religious before he discovered himself as a mischievous ecclesiastic. The issue is not (as the Vatican claims) one between God and the world, unless, indeed, the Roman curia is a fitting divine representation. The issue is between the destiny and integrity of the French nation on the one hand, and a band of alien cardinals on the other. It seems to be still the opinion in France that after loud defiance the Church will yield. Indeed, to a large extent the clergy anxious to secure their pension have yielded so far as to recognise the law of Associations. But for the moment, and on the surface, the Pope, on behalf of the Church, strikes at and would mortify a people in whose affairs his interference is an insolence none the less that it may also be dangerous.

UNIVERSAL disgust has been felt in regard to the state of things revealed in the report on the scandals arising in connection with the commissariat of the South African war. The harpies that made their prey of the British taxpayer, swindling right and left, have their reward, and in similar circumstances, we fear, only too many "companies" would be formed to copy this successful example. Such vermin thrive when men are at peace, how much more so when men have so far lost reason as to be at war! But the thing that has most deeply wounded the national honour is the discredit cast upon our soldiers. Either the men who had command of the departments involved were knaves or fools, and it is poor consolation that the report sets them down by preference as the latter. If these are the capable men who "protect the Empire," it looks as if Mr. Haldane should devise something more than schemes of armament.

THE Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, of Chatham, sailed last week for Cape Town, where he is to take service for a few months for the Rev. R. Balmforth, who is much in need of rest. Mr. Davis is known to our readers as a writer of original thought and graceful expression, and we shall have the pleasure of publishing a series of articles from his pen under the general heading, "Gateways to the Soul," the first appearing next week. We heartily wish that his trip to the Cape will be beneficial alike to him and to our comrade on the lonely outpost whom he goes to relieve for a time.

THE courage and wisdom of every intelligent minister of religion must be put to the test severely in such communities as those in South Africa. To us, in the home country, a decisive verdict on affairs out there is often precluded by the feeling of uncertainty as to the evidence; but it is refreshing to read, as we have done this week, a letter by Mr. Balmforth to the South African News (July 11) in which, writing in the midst of things, he trenchantly denounces the barbarism and savagery exhibited in the efforts to suppress the rebellion of natives in Natal. We have hesitated to accept some reports that have come to hand—they continue to arrive—giving details of the horrible inhumanities perpetrated by the white soldiers. If these things are true we have little justification in hurling epithets at the Turks. Mr. Balmforth denounces the conspiracy of silence that seems to prevail, and asks where the leaders of humaner and wiser policy are at this moment.

THE following passages from Mr. Balmforth's letter illustrate the spirit of his appeal:—The administration of native affairs in Natal is admitted on all hands to have been weak and inefficient, not to say unjust; while the burning of kraals, crops, and churches, the wholesale butchery which is now taking place, the execution of men without civil trial, the recent shameful offer of £500 for Bambata's head—a virtual bribe to his wretched followers to play the part of Judas, which, I understand, was withdrawn under pressure from the Imperial Government; the disgusting telegram which appeared in the Cape Town Press the other day to the effect that so many of the enemy had been "bagged"—these things, which, one would think, should disgust every right-minded man in the country who is not blinded by racial passion, are evidently taken as a matter of course. Where are our South African Liberals and humanitarians? Where are our Merrimans, Schreiners, Sauers, Fremantles, Moltenos, Orpens, and Becks? Where is the South African Liberal Association? Parliament is sitting, yet everybody is smitten dumb. Is it moral cowardice, or is it party expediency that keeps men silent?

MR. BALMFORTH continues:—And what are humanitarians to think when a so-called Liberal newspaper like the South African News comes out with the nauseating sentence, twice or thrice repeated, that "order must be restored ere the causes of the trouble are further investigated," which means, I suppose, that the rebellion must be allowed to spread throughout the whole of South Africa rather than that an attempt should be made to bring peace by methods of reason and conciliation. Such a dictum may sound well enough in Russia, but it ought to be scouted amongst a people with great and noble traditions. Here we have "Imvo," the representative of the despised "blacks," pleading for peace and setting us all an example of practical Christianity, and nobody heeds. Next Sunday, I suppose, we shall all be talking in church about the sacredness of human life and about "the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," while the process of "wiping out" goes on, and so many more of the enemy are being "bagged." . . . It is sheer nonsense to say this is an affair for Natal alone. We are all too closely bound together for that.—So writes our good brother. His words may help to stir the slumbering consciences of many in this country who have been strangely silent while these bad things have been done.

THE Birmingham and District Crippled Children's Union continues to do good and increasing work. It is now ten years since the visiting of cripples was adopted as part of the work of the Hurst-street Mission. At that time only 80 crippled children were known to exist, and it was thought that these were all that the city contained. Out of this branch of the mission work the present Union has grown. The latest report contains much interesting information as to work done in respect of the special schools, which the Education Authority has been stimulated to equip, or as to the School of Hand-weaving for Girls. The work achieved by the Society is excellent, but perhaps the most hopeful feature of the report is found, not in its record of achievement, but in its resolute reminder to the citizens of Birmingham of the duty which they had not discharged. "Though we do so much for them, we leave more undone. We send over 250 for convalescent treatment each year, but we leave at home 300 who should go. For lack of suitable accommodation we are unable to send away cases in the early stages, when they are most curable. We have not nearly enough spinal carriages and bath chairs, children often having to wait two months for these. We are not able to find employment for all our children. Our work is fully recognised, but only half done."

AND so the Crippled Children's Union appeals for funds; it may appeal, and still subscriptions may lag. It is sad, but inevitable; philanthropy cannot always say, "Our work is freely realised," but so far as it is dependent on benevolent payment, it is almost always "only half done." There are other Crippled Children's Unions similar to this in Birmingham; they too are fed with only half a loaf. There are also the much more numerous towns, where for lack of means and languor of local interest, nothing in a thorough way is being done for the cripples. Yet the work is either good work needing to be done, or it is not. If it is, surely it is time it were rescued from promiscuous subscribers, and recognised as a proper civic charge.

News from New Zealand continues to be most gratifying. The Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones reports a congregation of 400 on July 1. "The success of the work is beyond the dreams of anyone," he says. He and his wife are constantly at work, and yet he finds time to lecture for the City Council, scoring further success. People of high standing and intelligence are backing him up well, and "there is great consternation in the orthodox circles." The Bishop and clergy, the Presbyterian and Congregational ministers are at one in preaching against the movement. Good, our friend knows well how to avail himself of such useful opposition. But, while we rejoice to hear that Dr. Jones's health is better than it was here, we hope he will not tax his strength overmuch. He is doing well, and he is wanted long.

IN improvement the first steps are the hardest. The difficulty is to wake up men's souls, not to continue their action.—Channing.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE.
IN SEVEN DECADES.

II.

(1) FOLLOW reason! Seek and ever seek the truth!

(2) There can by no means be found any settled happiness in the mind that is limited in its range by a fixed authority, allowed to pasture only within the fenced paddock, tethered to an ecclesiastical post by a tightly woven creed. There is that native to the human mind, and by no means to be silenced, which will ceaselessly yearn for the far hill side and the hidden valley, for the depths and the unfathomable heights! This divine aspiration will make even the dullest man very wretched if, in his holiest moments, he dare not ask questions.

(3) It may be a foolish thing for a man to be unable to know his own mind, but it is better for the mind to have some rambling, and go here and go there on false trails in the freedom of a wide quest, than to be slowly stifled in compulsory inactivity.

(4) It is a poor timidity, and not to be wisely admitted, which seeks safety from doubt by flying to the arms of some obedience lower than that of the divine voice of reason. No sanctuary is other than a dismal dungeon if freedom is left on the threshold. And, after all, a man can in no way thus dispose of his natural responsibility, for though he endeavour to console himself with the cloak of authority, God will eventually ask him the same questions he has shamefully silenced in his own heart.

(5) Some men go a little way only in the path of spiritual discovery; they will not turn back, but they dare not go on. They try to make believe that they have acquired all that is essential to salvation. But those who are willing to be taught by God find no end. Nothing can be more satisfying than to be ceaselessly advancing; we then begin to share the glory of the infinite.

(6) True inward peace is not to be found in any clever method of exclusion, any comfortable cosy corner.

(7) Sophistry is a worse enemy than vice, it is so insidious and inobtrusive. It finds a special joy in blinding the eyes of its gentlest nurse. Warm sophistry in your bosom, and presently you will look out into darkness.

(8) Fullest light, broadest vision, freest discussion, these things are the best for truth. There is much evil thought, much misapprehension, and much ignorance, that a wholesome publicity to the great rude blustering common world's talk and ridicule, would brush away.

(9) Too many people are content simply to exist from day to day, without ever thinking whether they are fulfilling the requirements of life or not, without troubling themselves to ask, or to try to understand, what divine purpose they have to serve, or what place in the mighty sphere of being they are meant to fill.

(10) The most searching question you can ask yourself is, "Do I know how to live?" Think often of this.

A GLORIOUS CHURCH.*

BY THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

That he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having a spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy without blemish.—Eph. v. 27.

OWING to the poverty of human language we often use the same word to describe two different things. A school, for instance, is a given building, and it is also the scholars and teachers who meet within its walls. An Oxford College is a beautiful Gothic structure, mellowed by time and devoted to the pursuit of learning. But an Oxford College is also a body of men, tutors, graduates, and undergraduates, who are united in a common corporate life. The British House of Commons is a great palace of stone on the banks of the Thames: it is also an assembly of men chosen and summoned for the work of legislation. In like manner we use the word "Church" for two widely different things—for the building in which a body of worshippers meet and for the worshippers themselves. Such buildings we call "consecrated." But what is it consecrates them? Nothing else but the character, aims, ideals, and affections of the living souls to whom they give shelter. Is a given church-building a holy place? Yes, if a holy people be there; if not, it is so much stone and timber and mortar. The noblest dedication we can give to a church-building is to cleanse and exalt and set clearly before our minds the reason, use, and glory of the community of souls we call a church.

We may lay it down as an axiom in the philosophy of history, that every idea or institution which has retained a powerful hold on mankind through successive ages and centuries has somewhere in the heart of it, though it may be much disguised and maimed, some essential truth and some essential ministry for human needs.

The church idea and the church institution have been for nearly two thousand years among the dominating forces of the Western world. The idea and the institution have both been greatly abused. The Church has been sometimes a petty and trivial affair, at other times it has been lordly and arrogant. Men have used it as an instrument of tyranny; it has often stood squarely in the road of human progress; it has nursed dark superstitions, it has been guilty of the foulest crimes, which is only to say that it is an imperfect human institution, and has taken on many of the manners and ideas of the successive ages through which it has passed. But that it has its roots deep in human nature and ministers to the hunger and thirst of the human heart is proved by the fact of its persistence. In spite of errors, crimes, shortcomings, failures, and superstitions the Church has still to be reckoned with. I know it is said the Church idea grows weaker and weaker in our age, and that it has no such hold on the hearts and minds, fears, and affections, of the great mass of the people as it had in the past. We are warned on many hands that the palmy days of the Church are over. Superior people tell us that, while the churches filled a useful place in the earlier ages of social development, they are now played out. This feeling lately moved a celebrated Oxford professor to wind up a discussion in his class on the different churches with the cynical remark, "Gentlemen, it does not matter a straw in which particular lunatic asylum you choose to immerse yourselves!" It is so philosophical to sit at ease and watch these enthusiasts tilting at their windmills! Even so grave an authority as Dr. Fairbairn assures the English public that the Church has lost its hold on the great masses of the working-people at one end of the scale and on the cultured classes at the other end. If so, surely the chief fault is with the Church itself. I am convinced that the reason is not to be found in the widely alleged alienation of the masses or the classes from true religion. It is not religion from which they are alienated, but ecclesiasticism, professionalism, clericalism, dogmatism, an exploded theology, a presentation of religion that has no bearing on real life, the association of religion with decaying superstitions or with a sickly pietism from which manliness revolts, or with a narrow and poverty-stricken idea of human welfare and human society. Mr. Goldwin Smith tells us that the Church exists to-day chiefly as a social centre and as a reputed safe-guard of social order. Certainly there never was a time in the history of Christendom when so many of the thoughtful, the sincere, the good, and the true stood outside the Churches. One of the most startling signs of our day is the presence in our midst in increasing numbers of high-minded men who have broken their connection with organised Christianity. Of course, it has always been true that large portions of the community have been indifferent to Christianity—the thoughtless, frivolous, worldly, ignorant, and selfish. But to-day we see quite another class holding aloof—sober, kindly, cultured, earnest, sympathetic, public-spirited men and women—who, while they have not formally rejected religion, have nor part nor lot in its organised expression. Dr. Bruce, a distinguished divinity professor in the Presbyterian Church, writes, "I am disposed to think that a great and steadily increasing portion of the moral worth of society lies outside the Church, separated from it, not by godlessness, but rather by exceptionally intense moral earnestness." Many of the leaders in art and science, many of the guides and pioneers in moral and social reform, are men who rarely, if ever, join in public worship, and, if they support the Church, support it only as a philanthropic agency or a superior kind of gendarme!

If this were the time and place, it would be profitable to examine the cause and reason of this withdrawal from the Church on the part of some of the finest spirits of the age. For one thing, I am sure it is partly due to the fact that the church has lagged behind the best knowledge, and failed to find room for the intellectual march of the time. For another thing, the Church has been less widely humanitarian than many so-called secular movements, and, lastly, it has been more concerned about dogma than life. So long as the Church stands apart from whole provinces of human life, so long as the Church is too timid to claim the world, with all its interests and activities for God, so long as the Church is afraid of advancing knowledge and the work of criticism, so long will an increasing number of the best men find its atmosphere uncongenial. Thank God! our eyes see the dawning of a better day; nor need we fear that the estrangement of noble hearts from the Church will be anything but a temporary and passing phase of experience.

Thousands of these "outlanders" are Christians in fact, only waiting for the Church to assume a form and take on a breadth which will permit them to enter.

We do not think that good men will for long cease to gather themselves into associated life for the greatest and deepest things the heart cares about. That associated life may not take on the form of any of our present church organisations; but a church of some kind, that under some other name perhaps, shall still be a Church, is a fundamental necessity of human nature. It is a notable saying of Herbert Spencer's that nature never leaves her great lines of development; and he goes on to add that human nature having developed along the line of belief in God, it is as foolish to suppose that men and women will for long leave that line as it would be to suppose that nature will some day abjure gravitation. So it is with the Church: The Church is not going to die away: you might as well think that the family will die away. For the Church has a basis broad as humanity. It is founded deep in human nature's need of fellowship and association. Men will not be alone in any of the great interests of life. The like seek each other out that in companionship they may strengthen each other's purpose and kindle each other's zeal. They know that in union they can do far more for the cause at heart than in solitude. Lovers of art come together and organise themselves into art societies to get a way for the beautiful among men. Friends of science unite to promote research and scientific studies. Men and women interested in social reforms join hands to find stimulus and encouragement. Whenever men have interests in common which they can attain better by common action than by solitary, independent effort, they organise. And so long as men care for the great, deep things of God and righteousness, love and conscience and human welfare, so long will they organise for their promotion, that is, form themselves into churches.

Human nature needs the ministry of religion as much to-day as ever. A guilty conscience makes a coward of a man in the present as in the past. Trouble belongs to our nature; so much of the music of life is in a minor key. In its essential features human life remains unchanged. Sorrow in the twentieth century is the same as it was at Hebron when "Abraham came to mourn for Sarah and to weep for her." The pressure of life with its harassing cares is as heavy now as when the Psalmist cried, "Oh that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest." The prayer of Moses—"I beseech thee show me thy glory"—is humanity's prayer in all ages, for we faint if we know not that God is good. The apostle who said, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death," expressed a sense of sin and weakness which sensitive hearts feel to-day. When we have lowered into the earth the lifeless form of some one we love, we look through blinding tears into the open grave, and ask with Job, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Moreover there are always men moved by the wonder of the mighty sum of things who ask: "What manner of being is the Soul of all we see? What is his purpose and method of working? What is the soul of man? Whither? Whence? We are haunted by a God-consciousness from which we cannot escape; the shadow of eternity is upon us; "bright shoots of everlastingness" stir in our heart and flesh. Men need the Church to-day as ever, understanding by the Church not any sect, denomination, local institution, hierarchy, or polity, but that community of good men whose minds are set on righteousness and peace, and which exists wherever two or three are gathered together in the name which is above every name. The Church of the living God has come to stay, even as the planets their appointed time. Let us never think that in these last times we are to witness the death and burial of the Church. Many things associated with the Church will go—creeds, liturgies, rituals, priestly claims—ten thousand tons of church trappings may be shrivelled in the fires of criticism; but the Church of the living God is as the everlasting hills. For the Church is not primarily an institution, but a fellowship, a communion, human and divine—an idea, a power which makes of no worth the efforts of men who would whistle it down the wind. Our systems of theological thought may pass away; but the Church, the inspired and majestic fellowship of the human race in furthering human welfare, shall never pass away. So long as the Church is true to its mission, no human hands can ding it down; for within and behind all its weakness there is the power and the presence of God.

What is a church? There are many answers, many definitions. To-day let us content ourselves with one of the simplest on record. "The church," says Matthew Arnold, "is a society for promoting goodness." That is a definition a child can understand. Like a great many simple sayings it is very elastic, and on examination will be found to cover nearly the whole idea of a church.

1. It is a society; that is, a living body, an organisation made up of many parts knit together for common purposes by common affections and a common spirit. It is not an audience which meets in a certain building and disperses, and there is an end of it. It is not a fortuitous concourse of atoms, but a society, bound together by all sorts of ligaments, thrilling with a nervous system which runs through all its parts, animated by a common life, so that, if one member suffers, all the members suffer, and, if one rejoices all join in the music. What we suffer from in our liberal churches is a feeble sense of corporate life, a lack of cohesion, a far too loose attachment to each other. There is too little of the victorious movement of an organised body. We have carried individualism to an extreme. Our association is too much like that of a Ring-rat.

A Ring-rat is a nest of rats whose tails have got inextricably intertwined, and who are thus forced into a sort of union, but a union which ultimately means their death.

It is the trivial things unite us rather than the great ones. Our liberal churches have a great history behind them; they have a noble faith, the noblest faith that ever exalted the human heart, to sustain them in the present; they have bright hopes and saintly memories to cheer them onward—in a word, they have all the elements of a living community. But somehow they lack fusion. We have to grasp the idea that a congregation of worshippers is something more than an audience and a collection of individuals. It is a genuine being, a new organism, a body, a society with its own qualities and powers.

It is a conception perhaps a little difficult to realise, yet it is being made familiar by our new sociology, which bids us think of human society as a whole, a Titanic being, his brow furrowed with thoughts and passions, his heart beating with love which renews itself eternally, with dark hatreds, too, which mark his weary steps with blood—a mighty collective existence, a being having a life of its own which is something more than an aggregation of the units of which it is made up. The Church is such a being. It needs some power of imagination, some poetic vision to conceive the Church as an organism with its own life, powers, and obligations; but it is an idea which is of the very essence of the Church. Paul's graphic parable of the body and its members gives it shape and expression. We belong to one another. It is not church life to meet together once a week to hear a more or less eloquent discourse; it is not church life or membership to take a sitting or pay a subscription. By sympathy and fellowship we are to be helpers and encouragers of each other's excellence, we are to be associated for a great common purpose, namely, to build on earth the new city of God. Our fellowship with one another is to be more vital and manifest than it often is. The man who prays with me, who chants the Te Deum with me, who holds the same clear purpose and the same sweet affections at heart, ought to be my neighbour in a very special sense. A common affection for Garibaldi made all his followers friends and brothers, so that the red shirt was at once the way to a man's heart unknown before, and opened his doors with a welcome. Devotion to a great cause, discipleship of a great master, admiring love for a great ideal, ought to be a bond of union between men far stronger than anything on earth except the family tie. No man knows his own need until he feels the need of his brother's help and sympathy. Spiritual life is no mere individual matter, but a movement of many souls, a movement that knits men together and spreads by sympathy, and gathers heart by gathering mass, and has its being in companionship. Much more is this true of religious activity: it needs the co-operation of many energies, pledged one and all to loyal comradeship, bound into the powerful unity of a single organic frame, a body of faithful men set upon fulfilling righteousness, a society for promoting goodness, throbbing with the passion and fervour of a multitudinous life. The Church is a society.

2. It is a society with a very definite object—the promotion of goodness. In religion the first thing is goodness, the second is goodness, the third is goodness. A church that does not crown goodness as lord of all, that does not welcome goodness, however humbly clad, or in whatever guise and under whatever creed, may have many other admirable features: it may have art and culture, and pillared temples and storied windows, and famous scholars and a stirring history and social prestige and an overflowing exchequer, but it is smitten with decay. Nay, in these days when the Church is busy with so many activities of a secondary nature, it seems necessary to say, and to emphasise the saying of it, that the Church does not exist in the first instance to promote philanthropic agencies nor sanitary reforms, nor technical education, nor athletic sports, nor recreation clubs, nor penny banks, but to promote goodness, and that in very distinctive ways. These secondary things are to be welcomed and attended to as also promoting goodness, only all these things can be as well and sometimes better carried on by other organisations. The peculiar mission of the church is the promotion of goodness by more radical, more spiritual, and more lasting methods:

(I.) First by the cultivation of reverence, the noble faculty of admiration and love for that which is above us, the noble faculty of humility before a greater and a diviner than ourselves, the noble faculty of obedience to our best ideals. The Church gives the chiefest place in all its activities to worship; that is the uplift and uplook of the soul towards that which is more beautiful than earth can show—that ever elusive ideal which haunts us and which we have not grasped as yet, but which, ever following, leads upward to the shining table lands of the better and the best. Worship is reverence, and reverence is worship. When worship is eliminated from life society has lost its soul: when reverence is no more, mediocrity seals us with its curse. No character can attain any lofty degree of excellence in which reverence is wanting. The greater a man becomes in mind and heart the more the wonder, the glory, the beauty, the sorrow, the turmoil, the order, the depth and range of things fills him with reverence; the more completely a man lives, the more largely alive he is in every part of him, in brain and heart and hands, the better will he apprehend the magnitude of life and stand in reverence before the Power and Wisdom that governs it. The mere amateur in living, the man whose thoughts are of himself and whose outlook and sympathies are limited by what he calls his own interests never realises the grandeur of life, its infinitude and its possibilities, so that the faculties of wonder, admiration, and awe are but feebly developed.

Yet this is not the finest flower of reverence. The man's best reverence is not for power, greatness, beauty, cloud-encompassed mysteries; it is for goodness.

He who does not admire and love—that is, reverence, goodness—has yet to learn the a, b, c, of religion. The most hateful, damnable spirit of our times is the cynical spirit, the spirit that admires nothing, that professes to find something selfish in every gift, something mean in every heroism. To love and admire the good is a great step upward. In man, in God, in Christ, in angels made perfect, there is nothing great but goodness. All beauty of soul, all glory of aspiration, all elevation of spirit, all nobility of character is in yielding to that attractive influence. The church that cultivates reverence for goodness is a glorious church.

(II.) The Church promotes goodness by seeking to base character on eternal and impregnable moral principles. It magnifies the words "duty," "conscience," "honest," "truthful," "just," "up-right," "unselfish." It writes them in letters of fire. It weaves them into the stuff and substance of human life and human society. The Church puts a check on all the slimy and reptile things of life and literature, holds legislation up to the measures of equity, forces down envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness, weeps when men and nations go to war, declares in a voice of thunder that just and righteous ends can only be furthered by just and righteous means, that no question of expediency, no consideration of profit, can ever set aside the fundamental moralities of the New Testament. The Church pleads for the supremacy of conscience. She makes much of the simple virtues, simple fidelities, simple generousities, that are the root qualities of manhood. The Church glorifies character. It scorns the notion that a man can be made happy by simply being made rich, while he is rotten in heart, ragged in morals, merciless in his dealings with men, selfish in his activities. Tell me not until the courses of nature have gone backward, until God is fore-sworn, until the world itself is turned bottom side up, that such a man is to be envied on account of happiness. Envy the shark and the vulture rather than such a man. But the man that has simplicity, honesty, truth, and a loving heart, a man that has purity and kindness, who knows how to be merciful and magnanimous, whether he be rich or poor—that man carries the kingdom of happiness within him. So speaks the Master who lays all stress on doing the will of the Father who is in heaven. He heightened and deepened to an incredible degree all the obligations of morality. He insisted vehemently on right-doing as the one condition of heavenly favour. "Not every one that saith Lord! Lord!" It is the humble doer of righteousness who stands approved. Every good deed is an act of adoration. It is the pure, true, loving life which is the divinest of all liturgies.

(III.) The Church promotes goodness by fostering, enriching, and enlarging the sympathies. It stands for humanity; it excludes no outcast, no sinner, no broken-down wretch from its fellowship. The Church is the sacrament of man. It is not a selection out of humanity: in its idea it is humanity. It has sympathy for the far off as well as the near, for the vicious as well as the virtuous, for the fallen as well as the upright. No sorrow is there which men know that does not bring the Church to its comfort and relief, no fear which men fear that the Church does not seek to lighten, no bitter experience of the heart the Church does not soothe and heal. The human face, as Blake says, is the human face divine, and the human soul is the temple of the Holy Ghost. Is there a poverty-stricken soul shut up within the walls of its own selfishness? To that soul the sympathy of the Church goes out. It is the mission of the Church to spread in wider and stronger pulses the range of sympathy till the whole human race is sacredly loved. Drink-debased, vice-defeatured, pride-puffed, wealth-swollen, vanity-smeared, cruelty-cased, though men be, the Master will have us regard them still as brethren. There is no rough-hewn semblance of humanity but he will have us feel for and reverence. In that feeling we become one with Christ: To realise the infinite sympathy, that is to be a Christian. All the baser elements of the world, greed and wealth, luxurious life, selfish craving, pride, meanness, cruelty, covetousness, the hundred things which degrade humanity—all these perish in the heart filled with the passion of sympathy. To be perfect in love as the Father in heaven is perfect, what an illimitable ideal is that! Sympathy is the ministry of gentleness, pity, uplifting and help, and giving ourselves away in loving kindness the effort to lessen the burden and pain which men carry. It is the test by which we are finally judged. No assent to doctrine, no observance to rite, no progressiveness of thought will then avail. The question will then be not of belief nor unbelief, neither of faith nor scepticism, but of a cup of cold water to one of these little ones. Nothing matters eternally but the great commandment of love. It is hard to learn the lesson; but how glorious is the Church, which, with a divine husbandry, can bring forth out of the dry ground of once selfish, careless, hearts like ours the fair blossoms of sympathy.

Do not think that in thus speaking of the Church I am using the word in any mystic or merely ecclesiastical sense. The Church which would have the great mission of which I have been speaking consists of the whole body of men and women who love and trust and pray and reverence. But the Church, even among us, is too often the minister's church. Oh friends, you are all ministers in this glorious Church of which I have been dreaming. It is you, you large-hearted disciples of Christ, you loving, energetic, holy-minded men and women, who have the true apostolical succession: In the Church which exists for one thing only—namely, the promotion of goodness—in the Church which cultivates reverence, admiration, love, which grounds character, deep and strong, in the everlasting things of righteousness, which enlarges and widens the range of sympathy until the divine in us sees the divine in all men and takes all sorrow and pain under the wings of an infinite compassion—in that glorious Church all God's faithful sons are priests having sacred functions.

May the churches represented here to-day have their part in that glorious Church of God, the Church of Humanity in which reverence, character, sympathy, hold the foremost place. I do not think lightly of intellectual endowments: I mean not to disparage right theologizing nor the pioneer work which is laid upon us. Far be it from me to cast any slur on the thorough, wholesome, and much-needed criticism to which we have submitted ancient creeds and documents. But, in our zeal for these things, are we not sometimes in danger of losing sight of the yet more important things of reverence, character, sympathy? For what do our liberal churches exist? Let us not be driven from our confidence that in reverence, character, and sympathy we have a gospel to preach for all the world, a gospel not resting on creeds and documents, but on right reason, on spiritual experience, on humanity's needs and God's promise of light and love, of truth and peace. All our critical controversial work is simply that we may break the shackles from this imprisoned gospel—shackles of dogma and superstition—that it may live and be glorified. Working in chains, it does much for mankind; how much more, a thousand times more, will it accomplish when the chains are removed and its energies are unimpeded by cramping creeds and choking sacerdotalism! Of all churches in the world our churches exist for one thing only—the promotion of goodness, of that goodness which is reverence, character, sympathy.

Finally I plead specially that we should cultivate the spirit of reverence. Character we have not failed to magnify, and without boasting we may claim to have broadened the scope of sympathy. Is not lack of reverence one of our weaknesses? Will it not be well for us as individuals, well for us as churches, to put more stress on the culture of reverence?—reverence for the little child; reverence for the womanly in woman and for the manly in man; reverence for all high, brave, heroic endeavour; reverence for the Christ-like soul; reverence for the grandeur and scope of human life and story, and for its progress from age to age; reverence for the majesty of law revealed in the order of creation, for the glory of the heavens, the beauty of the earth; rising up finally on the wings of aspiration into the presence of that Adorable Perfection, the eternal and unchangeable realisation of all that you and I and the whole human family in our purest and noblest moments have ever dreamed concerning the true, the beautiful, the good, and there uniting with saints and angels and the spirits of just men made perfect, in that song which is the very music of the spheres "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come."

Could a church be found faithful to this conception, how would men and women and little children flock into it, saying, "Where thou dwellest, we will dwell: thy God shall be our God, and thy people our people!"

It had been a wet morning, but the landscape was then coming out with perfect clearness. "It is," he (Wordsworth) said, "like the human heart emerging from sorrow, shone on by the grace of God."—Caroline Fox.

NEW SPIRITUAL LESSONS.*

THE author of the book named below explains its object in a brief preface. "I have paused," he says, "at the principal events in our Lord's life and tried to educe the spiritual lessons involved in them." He is no novice at religious instruction. The title-page names sundry writings of his, all of which are concerned with some aspect of religious thought. Yet it is a curiously stammering book. At times the thought itself seems but half conceived, and more constantly there is an irritating and perplexing lack of finish in its expression. Sometimes singulars and plurals step in each other's way, and neither seem to have any distinct right of precedence. Sometimes a detailed, if not pedantic, discussion of the use of a word, which might very well be tolerated if it were leading us to a deeper apprehension of that thing for which the word is a symbol, disappoints us at the close of a chapter, and we wonder why we have thus been taken off the main line of our thought and left in a puzzled state of mind at an out-of-the-way station.

These faults are to be regretted, because many of the suggestions of the author are interesting; his wish to read the Gospel story for himself and to add something to the common stock of Christian thought is entirely commendable. The mere example of a man who dares to think, to speak, and be free, is helpful. But, having said so much, we must add that some of the ideas contained in these chapters are astonishingly crude, and that the style is simply amazing as the work of a practised writer. Could not the Evangelical doctrine of the Atonement be more clearly and more justly stated than in this unshapely sentence, which is here reproduced with punctuation and quotation marks unaltered?

Hence the theory was framed that God sent His "only begotten" and beloved Son to die on the cross, and so appease Himself, satisfy His justice, and thereby save the human race from hell—an imaginary place of everlasting torments wherein all would be living for ever if Jesus had not redeemed them, having "made (by His one oblation of Himself once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world."

The chapter on "The Child in the Temple" illustrates the remarks we have already made, and may give rise to other remarks that should be made. The story told by St. Luke (ii. 41 ff.) is contrasted not unfairly with the embroidered stories of the Apocryphal Gospels (or Gospel—for sometimes the singular and sometimes the plural expression is used), and then the writer gives at considerable length his own interpretation of the incident. In the course of this exposition Professor Henslow speaks as follows (the italics are his):—

It was in this peculiar aspect of God as a personal Father, that the novelty of the expression lay: for it involved some community of nature, and it was this spiritual Father, of whose business Jesus had so deep a conviction, that He especially must be concerned with it; just as He would afterwards be busied about the trade of a carpenter. It was this which so astonished, and perhaps somewhat alarmed Mary and Joseph. It might seem to them a verging on monomania for a child of twelve to make Himself equal with God.

Very likely. Only, as St. Luke nowhere tells us that the child Jesus made any such pretence; and as there is no hint of any alarm or astonishment except that Jesus had tarried behind in Jerusalem so long, and in his zeal for knowledge had apparently forgotten his parents' existence; as the child is represented as going home quietly and obediently with his parents, the suggestion of his apparent monomania is still further from the spirit of St. Luke's story than the old fables were, which made Jesus to show off his learning and confound the doctors. The following sentence seems to the present reviewer to be typically loose in construction, and also typically eccentric in substance:—

How He was, perhaps, quickly hurried away; but that Mary at least would never forget those words, nor that hour in which they were spoken—especially when later on she discovered that they cost Him His life.

There are touches of originality and glimpses of spiritual truth here and there in these expositions. But that there are also comments that can only be described as childish may be judged from the following, from a chapter on "The Proofs of the Resurrection":—

Now, had Jesus only swooned and awoke in the tomb, He would have raised Himself, supposing He could have freed His arms, unwound the napkin from His eyes, and laid it down. To free Himself from the grave-cloths, He must have unwrapped them, scattering the spices unavoidably in so doing; and, let us remember, no less than "about a hundred pound weight" of myrrh and aloes are mentioned, though perhaps not all was used in His burial. The linen and the spices could not do otherwise than make a heap on the ground. What, then, struck the disciples as so remarkable was that the cloths were lying—i.e., flat—on the shelf, or undisturbed, but the body had gone from out of them. No mention is made of the spices whatever.

The napkin, too, was equally undisturbed, and still retained the circular fold (indicated by the Greek word), as if it were still bound on the head, but the head was gone, without disturbing the circular form.

"Wonderful, and after that out of all whooping." With so many aids to the study of the New Testament already at hand, can we afford to waste precious moments with an author who argues that the use of three distinct verbs for seeing betokens an eye-witness, and asks whether it is likely that anyone would have invented the conditions of the linen cloths and the napkin?

In the course of these expositions there are several quotations from Ecce Homo, and "Sir J. Seeley" is mentioned several times by name. Could not he who has taught our expositor so much have taught him to ignore trifles, to avoid pedantry, to think clearly, to express his thought in bold and beautiful English? J. R.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XIII.—MIRACLE.

It is not enough to say, with some, that miracles are incredible, or, with others, that they do not happen, for there is no antecedent impossibility to make them incredible, nor is the fact that they do not happen now any proof that they have never happened in the past. But a miracle, it may be fairly urged, to become a matter of belief, ought to bear the test of historical investigation; and it may further be objected that no alleged miracle has ever been performed under conditions which would satisfy the incredulous to-day, however ready to be convinced. Modern unbelief does not refuse to weigh particular testimony against general experience, but it asks that the testimony shall be the direct testimony of cautious, critical, competent witnesses. For a miracle, at the time of occurrence, is an appeal to the reason, and, unless the eye-witnesses are persuaded of its reality on terms which would satisfy rational inquiry, and unless they show that the reason in their case has been so satisfied, the testimony is not of that kind which reasoning men can now accept. The difficulty in these days with regard to miracles is, not so much the nature of miracle in itself, as the nature of the evidence by which it is supported; it is difficult to trust the report of an unscientific age on phenomena which in this age would not be believed without subjection to severe scientific test.

And, apart from rational objection, it is not easy to think of miracles without moral hesitation. A being who challenged attention by display of miraculous powers producing physical effect, would not thereby establish moral ascendancy. The more frequently the physical effect was produced the less cogent it would become; it would be considered in time as much a matter of course as rain and sunshine, and other daily manifestations of divine providence; in the end it would perhaps be said, "Though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him."

Nevertheless, miracles do happen. In the inner constitution and ordering of our lives "signs and wonders" are to be found which attest the power and the grace of God. "So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how." In this field we may point with certainty to a process which we may confidently call miraculous, a process undiscoverable by reason, and therefore out of nature, supernatural, a process which is convincing in its evidence, and is worthy and adequate in its effect. SOME people are intolerantly liberal; others are ferocious advocates for peace, or intemperate on intemperance. I have known pleaders for generosity who were themselves miserably stingy. I have heard of persons who have been wonderful sticklers for "the truth"—meaning thereby a certain form of doctrine—and yet they have not regarded the truth in matters of buying and selling, or with regard to the reputations of their neighbours, or the incidents of domestic life:—C. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE VOYAGE OF PYTHEAS AND THE FINDING OF ENGLAND.

AFTER the grand old poetry stories of the Argonauts and the Odyssey, we come to a voyage at the beginning of history. This is the story of an ancient Greek who was the first to tell of the island of Britain in the Northern Seas, whither he sailed about the year 350 before the birth of Christ.

Long before that time the Greeks, pushing over the sea, had settled on distant shores of the Mediterranean—in Sicily, Italy, and beyond. Thus they came to found the colony of Massilia, now called Marseilles, in the South of France, which, by the time of Pytheas, of which we speak, was a city of wealth and beauty. But as it continued to prosper, its citizens desired new fields of industry and new sources of wealth.

They were, besides, put somewhat out of countenance by the Carthaginians, who, like themselves, were colonists, not Greeks, but Phœnicians from Tyre and Sidon, who had built a great city on the opposite side of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Africa. Great traders were the Phœnicians even before the Greeks, and as sailors they surpassed them, for they did not fear to sail by night and out of sight of land. Thus they were the first to discover the treasures of Spain, the shallows of whose rivers and the pools of whose streams glittered with gold and silver and tin. Bartering with the inhabitants for these they became exceedingly rich, and, in their turn, sent out companies of their overflowing citizens to find new towns and markets. But the sources of their treasure they kept, as far as might be, a secret, so that even the crafty Greeks knew not where it all came from. Then the merchants of Massilia met together in their chamber of commerce, and resolved to send out explorers who might discover whence the Phœnicians obtained the precious metals, or, better still, might establish new channels of business for themselves. Thus one ship was sent out to explore the West Coast of Africa, but of the results of the voyage all record is lost. Another vessel was to proceed round the coast of Spain to the North. This was put in the charge of Pytheas, who was not only a bold navigator, but a learned mathematician as well, who had studied the influence of the moon on the tides, and found the true north point in the heavens, and how to make a correct sundial. So in the best vessel Massilia could provide, with one great square sail and many rowers at the long oars, and a big white eye painted on either side the prow, that, like a gull, she might find her way over the pathless waters, Pytheas set sail as soon as the stormy winds of March had subsided, and going steadily down the East coast of Spain, passed between the Pillars of Hercules which we call the Straits of Gibraltar, and anchored for a fresh supply of provisions in Cadiz Bay. Now Cadiz, then called Gaddir, was already an important Phœnician city with many well-to-do merchants, who received Pytheas courteously, but I doubt whether they gave him much helpful advice. So he sailed on—sailing and rowing—rounded Cape St. Vincent, and turned his prow to the north. About Cape Finisterre he landed and found a people who professed to have fine weather for sale, and some who had a curious custom—for once every year the roof of their temple had to be torn off and replaced by a new one in a single day. This work was done by the women, and any one who carelessly dropped her load was immediately slain. Still hugging the coast, instead of striking boldly across the Bay of Biscay as any ship bound north now would do, Pytheas rightly concluded that after sailing many hundreds of miles, he was not far from his starting point in a direct line across the land. In course of time he entered the English Channel and landed on the coast of Brittany, in France, but so little was known of England then that no one could tell him that a few hours sail from the neighbourhood of Cherbourg would bring him in sight of the Isle of Wight. Instead, he went on groping his way along the French coast, and at length came in sight of the white chalk cliffs of Kent, where he landed and remained for some time, the people being friendly. Pytheas was struck by the abundance of wheat grown in the fields, and noticed that it was necessary in such a rainy climate to store and thrash it in barns, which was not the case around sunny Marseilles. After his own bright home he speaks of England as a land of clouds and rain. So it was much the same then as it is now. He also made acquaintance with English beer, made "by mixing wheat and honey"; but the wise Greek physicians advised their people not to drink it, as it produced "pain in the head and injury to the nerves." The ancient Britons seem to have lived in huts of wattle, that is, sticks and rushes woven together and plastered over with clay. From Kent as his head quarters—for he fell in love with bonny England and was in no hurry to leave,—Pytheas made journeys inland to different parts of the country, and went in his vessel up and down the east coast and no doubt up the Thames. He may have seen the fishermen of the village of London paddling about in their coracles, small round wicker boats covered with hide. But what most gladdened his heart was to discover that England was rich in tin, and that the tin was brought from Cornwall along the tops of the Downs to Kent and so across to the Continent.

Summer was far advanced when Pytheas re-embarked and crossed the North Sea to Germany, which he described as a land covered with a vast gloomy forest containing many strange animals, such as the reindeer, which he was told changed colour like the chameleon; and this was quite true, as the reindeer has different coats for winter and summer. Of the elk he heard the strange tale that it had no joints in its legs, and could never lie down, but leant against a tree to sleep; a fact of which the hunters took advantage by sawing through the tree beforehand, so over went the elk, and could not stand up again.

And now Pytheas won the second reward of his great commercial voyage. He had already seen and admired the beautiful fossil gum called amber, which was greatly prized in ancient days. Now he discovered where it came from—for it was found in Germany and on the shores of the North Sea and the Baltic.

When he had sailed round Denmark and up the Baltic as far as the river Vistula, he turned back and cruised up the mountainous coast of Norway, until he came, as he thought, to the end of the world, the land of the Midnight Sun, where the people of Norway showed him the lair or sleeping-place of the sun, where he saw the Aurora, or Northern Lights, and his men believed that it was the head of a god crowned with rays of glory. Then the weather grew foggy and the sea beginning to freeze became thick with rotten ice—so he called it the Sluggish Sea, and thought it time to turn homewards, but he reports that, had he gone further north still, he would have reached, so it was said, the Encrusted Sea. Strange as it may seem, Pytheas, living on the shore of the Mediterranean, had probably never seen ice, and could so little dream of a frozen sea that he accounted for the precious amber by supposing that it might be morsels broken off the shell of the Encrusted Sea.

All this was fascinating to Pytheas, for it was so utterly unlike anything he had seen before, and his strange story was soon made stranger still by those to whom he told his adventures. So that from the fact that in the Arctic regions there is no proper night for six months together, arose the quaint legend of the Hyperboreans, the people who live at the back of the North Wind in a land of mild and cloudless sunshine, whose days are six months long, who sow their seed in the morning, reap their harvest at noon, and gather their fruits before sunset; whose lives are free from all trouble and discord, and who die, when they have lived long enough, by jumping off a high cliff into the sea, which they consider a happy ending. This was a quaint idea no doubt; not the only one in days when the world was thought to be an island with the mighty river Ocean flowing round and round it, and when some people even thought that the earth was an enormous whale, whose breathings in and out made the rise and fall of the tide.

But we have lost sight for the moment of Pytheas, whose ship was in danger of losing her way in the fogs of the Sluggish Sea; so, as the days were shortening and the equinoctial gales would soon be blowing, he boldly steered straight across the North Sea until the white-eyed ship caught sight of the mountains of Scotland. So down by Aberdeen and Yorkshire and Norfolk to the English Channel and the Bay of Biscay, until, landing near to where Bordeaux is now, Pytheas left his men to bring the ship home to Marseilles, while he went eagerly by a short cut overland to tell the merchants of his native city how he had discovered two great islands in the Northern Sea, Albion and Ierne, and that there was great wealth of tin and amber in shiploads.

This is how England was discovered by the Greeks, and the foundations laid of her world-wide commerce and her wealth.

LONDON, AUGUST 18, 1906.

WHAT IS THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

THIS question may be simply, and erroneously, answered. Few intelligent readers of the Report on "Ecclesiastical Discipline" would rush in with a definition, the less so if they had grappled with any serious portion of the voluminous evidence taken before the Royal Commission. Perhaps it is asking too much that one should undertake the evidence; but these leisurely days of August may well afford time for the careful study of the Report, and the fact that it is unanimous may exonerate the average citizen from the larger task.

The Report is unanimous, and it also strikes us as decidedly sound-minded, allowing for a haunting impression all the while we are reading it that these things belong to another world than ours. There is, at any rate, the mark of sobriety and even-handed judgment upon it. No one can accuse the Commissioners of partisanship, they appear to have discharged a tedious and disagreeable task with sincerity, and occasionally their comments and references impart a truly human interest to what looks like a pedantic discussion in an ecclesiastical museum. Sometimes, indeed, we feel ourselves drawn much more closely into sympathy with one or another of the strangely diverse company in which we find ourselves. After all, what is merely curious to us is clearly of great moment to some of our countrymen; and, to say nothing of the fault of contempt towards our brothers' sanctities, we should be guilty of serious unwisdom if we failed to recognise in these questions of posture, raiment, and ceremony, belated as they seem to us, the very stuff about which wars have been made and kingdoms divided.

So far as the Report helps us to an answer to our question we are grateful, but we must confess to a misgiving that even yet we do not clearly and comprehensively conceive what the Church is. We understand better what some people think it is, but that is another matter. The Report gives us a résumé of the legal position in regard to matters under dispute, viz., ceremonies, ornaments of church, vesture of clergy, images, and connected regulations. Statutes are cited from the times of EDWARD VI., ELIZABETH, CHARLES II., and VICTORIA. Then there are rubrics and canons of different dates, and still further there are the decisions of the Courts in the important trials that took place in the nineteenth century. "The result is," says the Report, "that the ceremonies and ornaments which the law prescribes, or tolerates, must be ascertained by reference to that which was acquired at different dates . . . all so remote from contemporary English life that the most recent is separated from the present time by more than 240 years."

Very naturally, and we might almost say inevitably, the usages of the Church are nowhere, apparently, in strict accord with the law. This, however, is not solely due to the lapse of time. The Report admits that "throughout the post-Reformation history of the Church of England" there has been "a looseness of practice" covering a wide area. "Nor does it appear that any systematic attempt to enforce general conformity to the rubrics has ever been made except upon three occasions—(1) In the reign of ELIZABETH, after the advertisements were issued in 1566. (2) during the primacy of Archbishop LAUD (1633 to 1646); (3) in the period following the Restoration of 1660." "On none of these occasions was the result wholly satisfactory," the Commissioners say, and, remembering ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S Day, 1662, we may cordially agree with this opinion. As to the question whether the Crown, or the Bishops apart from the Crown has or have the right of making new law for the Church, there exists some difference; but the Commissioners are staunch in their resistance to the theory that the Bishops can override or modify the law as to services, rites, and ceremonies. That the law might be altered so as to permit variation at the discretion of the Bishop they are ready to admit, and one of their recommendations is to this effect; but that the Acts of Uniformity "bind Bishops as well as other clergymen" is their explicit statement, and we are thus led to the conclusion that, whatever else it is hypothetically or in fact, the Church is an organisation subject to Parliament. It is not a law to itself. That conclusion is clear.

But it is when we ask what the Church is in fact, what doctrines it stands for, and what ceremonies it maintains, that the scene becomes chaotic again. The Report enumerates a long list of "present breaches and neglects of the law." One of the most interesting of these is the violation of the rubric which directs that the "Creed of ST. ATHANASIUS" shall be used on certain days. The Dean of Westminster informed the Commissioners that in the Abbey services on those days a portion only of the Creed is sung "as an anthem," six verses being omitted, and the language of a seventh altered. Bishops report, in reply to inquiry, that "the omission of the Creed is not uncommon," but anyone who is pleased to hear this statement, will not be pleased to learn that "owing to frequent episcopal insistence on obedience to the rubric in recent years, it" (i.e., the omission of the Creed) "is less common than formerly." Readers may recall the fact that last year, both in the Southern and Northern Convocation, resolutions were passed in the sense of commending relief from the legal necessity of reciting the Creed, and the Commissioners report in favour of this relief. So far, so good; but next we are plunged into a medley of things done or neglected in defiance of the law. Notices are omitted that should be given, others (the usual parish notices) are given though by strict law they should not be; special services (e.g., harvest and dedication festivals) take place, addresses are given in the Confirmation Service, and the Benediction is usually given after sermon at Evening Prayer—all these things being contrary to the law. People of a certain type may be more interested to learn that the practice of making a collection during Morning or Evening Prayer is illegal.

All these and many other things of the kind are reported as having no serious significance; but there follows a list, as long or longer, of "Breaches having significance." And here, we regret to say, we leave the region of frank and open disregard of a law felt to be obsolete, and enter upon ground where words are strained and usages are introduced under false pretensions. It is in this connection that any plain-spoken Englishman must feel shocked anew at the double-dealing which mars so much of the ecclesiastical side of Christianity. Is the clergyman doing a forbidden thing? Keen eyes appear to discern it, but plausible excuses are given. This looks like a "ceremonial mixing" of water and wine—no, the reply is, the priest is doing it "unceremonially." Is this a wafer, an illegal form of "the bread" in the Communion Service? No, it is bread "such as is usual to be eaten," but it has been so pressed and shaped as to "resemble a wafer." Is the celebrant deliberately concealing the "manual acts" of consecrating the elements? No, he is only accidentally preventing the view. Is this church illegally incensed? No, because by arrangement with the Bishop, or otherwise, the incense is burned at some point before or after the service, and therefore not "ceremonially"; and if the censer is swung it is not for the purpose of "censing persons or things," which would be illegal, but in order to keep it alight.

The Commissioners notice some practices which they vigorously denounce as of more serious significance. Such are celebrations of the Sacrament without communicants, children's Eucharists, and the use of the Canon of the Mass, with details in the celebration which need not be described here. The Reservation of consecrated bread, which is placed by evasion where its "tabernacle" seems to be out of sight, but is still visible; hymns to the Virgin, veneration of images and roods, confession, and prayers for the dead all have a place, it seems, in the church that actually exists, and whether justly or not depends upon the exact interpretation of the law—no easy matter. Among the manuals described we observe some that explicitly commend the consecrated elements to adoration, and children in particular are told: "The consecration is now near; in a few moments Jesus himself will be present on the altar"; "Adore on bended knee as you pass the Blessed Sacrament."

Well, what is to be done with it all? The report gives no uncertain sound. First it urges that greater "power of self-adjustment" should be conferred upon the church; then, the letter of the law being revised, obedience might be reasonably expected. But if recalcitrants are still to be found, they must be purged out, and if the Bishops cannot secure obedience, the Ecclesiastical Courts should be appealed to. And all this seems very plain and simple, but the fencings and limitations and provisos that accompany the schemes of reform are many, and they go far to cloud the mind with a doubt whether any real reform can be effected. After all, the question is what reform is desired? Is the Church of England a body in which the vote of the majority can determine what is right in ritual and doctrine? Or is it the depository of ancient traditions which must be guarded and transmitted unimpaired, and about the validity of which the members are not free to judge? So far as we can discover the church itself is not yet sure which it is. Doubtless the theory of very many of its clergy holds by the latter view, yet in practice they seem to feel that present-day life and thought have their own right to be heard in religious matters. As for the bulk of the laity, we imagine there is considerably more sympathy with the former view, which would indeed seem to be a necessary corollary to the Parliamentary control of the Church. Between the two views there cannot be harmony, and to the end of the story, whatever that will be, we must expect similar "lawlessness" in the Church." Let us comfort ourselves with the belief that, despite all its inconsistencies and the absurdity of its claims and pretensions, the Church of England represents a genuine force for righteousness in the land, and let us wish its saner heads an increasing power in its councils.

SUMMER IN DAVOS.

Davos is empty. There is the Swiss population, of course; but who considers the Swiss population? There are Italian labourers to extend the hotels, bridle the turbulent torrents, and do other rough jobs that no true Switzer will touch; but, of course, they do not count. There are even a few hundred foreigners here—at least, the Kurliste says so—but they must be in the big sanatoriums, or else confined to their chaise-longue, for they are not to be seen on the promenade. The loveliest time of all the year in Davos (and the cheapest) is the time when the pleasure-seeker keeps away.

The explanation, too, is easy enough. Other places, more accessible than Davos, are lovely now. But what winter in all the world can compare with our winter? The matchless rink is abuzz with skaters, some of whom do endless miracles in four square yards, some sweep round the course on speed-skates with great, dreamy lunges, some practice their edges with frantic determination, and some glide contentedly on the flat of their skates and watch the rest. The huge snowy slopes are dotted with ski-runners. The Klosters road is dangerous with bob-sleighs. A ceaseless trail of toboggans goes up with the funicular to the Schatz-alp, and darts daringly down the winding way. We always find or invent occasion for a fête or two; banners of all nations wave salutes to one another; the people are laughing in seventeen languages, and the Kurkapelle seems to be playing somewhere all day long. Then when the races come on—the big championships on the rink, the cup races for bob-sleighs on the Klosters course, the flash of flying garments on the ice-slope—what an unimaginable time! The snap of cameras goes on like the clapping of a mill-wheel, the merry sledge-bells are never silent, and over this realm of the Frost-king stretches a sky of unbroken blue, set with such a sun as seldom dazzles us in Britain. The concerts, dances, and novel entertainments of the long, dark evenings need hardly be thought of. They are only past-times, to kill the gap between day and day. The daylight doings are our real occupation. There never were such gay Januaries as ours in this city of invalids.

When the ice grows sloppy, and the snow begins to melt, and the gorges of the Zügen-strasse are dangerous through avalanches, away goes this merry population like "ghosts from an enchanter fleeing." In May, when the Swiss lowlands are a paradise of fruit blossom, greenery, and flowers, our high valley is a dreary expanse of brown grass and black pine woods. Then the crocus comes in millions, followed by gentian and cowslip; fur-anemones cover the Schatz-alp; the spruce pines all at once put out bright green shoots; a week later the larches have donned their undergarments; the meadows grow as green as those by Thames or Avon; and in June they carry such an opulence of wild flowers as no field, even in Hampshire, has ever dreamed of. And this, though the floor of our valley is high above the top of Ben Nevis.

On each side of the meadows the pine-woods rise, some fifteen hundred feet, and over them tower great, bare Scottish hills, sometimes enwrapped at this season in true Scottish mist; above all, the jagged peaks, which are never quite free from snow. The vista towards the Tinzenhorn and his fellows is, for majesty of outline, as well as for change and grandeur of colour, unsurpassed in Switzerland. That is quite as it should be, for our valley is no mere up-start, the creature of a mountain stream, but one of the old Alpine aristocracy. Its two great ranges were made by the original wrinkling of Mother Earth—half frown, half smile—which created Switzerland.

There is a new sound in the air, the rush of torrents. We learn to recognise the voice of each. In the daytime the Schiabel, with its palpitating gusts of sound, or the Alberti-tobel—a Samson among streams—commands the ear; but at night the deeper note of the Landwasser, like that of the sea heard far inland, sounds solemnly. In winter the cataracts were columns of ice, the streams tunnelled a murmuring way through snow, and the valley was silent.

The winter visitor who thinks he knows Davos—every sledge-ride, every safe ski slope, and every beaten way—finds, if he stays on till summer, that he has everything to learn. The well-known paths branch out into innumerable tracks, which lose themselves on the high slopes, or guide him to undreamed of nooks. He ventures, with a strange sense of daring, over safe ways to points which a few months ago were beyond the maddest enterprise of folly. The ascents lead him imperceptibly from feat to feat, from strength to strength, until to his own surprise he is a mountaineer. The valley lies no longer between wood and wood, but between ridge and ridge of the two big ranges. He strays on through heartsease and campion, gentian, and flowers with no English name, up to where rare anemones grow among Alpine roses. He rests at times in the peace of the pine forest, which is the very home of peace. He reaches the last scant herbage beneath the peaks. He gathers his first Edelweiss. He looks out over the tree-tops and stares with amazement at his own familiar mountains. Familiar? Yes, in a sense, but transformed. It is only to his fellow giants that a great hill reveals his real majesty. And see, too, how the several peaks join hands one with another, how they rank themselves in ranges, and obey the plan of their creation. To understand the Highlands one must look down from the summits, not up from the valleys.

The most beautiful object in the Davoser-tal is one which the winter sportsman never sees. He is acquainted with a great snow-flat, in one part of which is an ice-quarry, but how could he imagine what this becomes in summer, the lovely lake, bordered with reeds, flowery grasses, or low rocky-cliffs, and mirroring the innumerable shades and lights of the pine-forest, the Seehorn, Sciahörner, or massive Rhätikon? Almost all lakes are beautiful, and quite all mountain lakes; and all have their own character, their own moods: Think of Loch Katrine and think of Windermere—which is lovelier? Ever the one before our eyes. This great, still water, the looking-glass of such skies and heights, has also its own incommunicable self, its private charm. Walk by its margin through the pines, or see it from the Jakobs-horn or Wannengrat, far below—it is always the centre of beauty, and the rest, however magnificent, is but its setting.

The Alpine climbers who come here in summer are all of the true breed, lovers of the mountains. They do not climb for the cheaper sort of glory, since there is only one peak hereabouts whose fame is known to the crowd. But there is no better centre for varied mountain scenery, and no better school for the aspiring mountaineer. It is not necessary, though, to dare the fatigues and perils of the high-mountain tour, if what you seek is natural beauty. Merely to repeat, on foot or on wheels, the sledge-rides of the winter is to see Nature in all her moods—majestic, gentle, terrible, winsome. The post-route to Alvaneu and St. Moritz leads through gorges and over precipices which only one road in Switzerland, the Viamala, can rival. The valleys carved out by the side-streams Hüela with its water-fall, Dischma; the real head-water of the Rhine; Sertig, which flows through Clavadel the fair—are a new world of wonder and delight. One sweep of the eye in the Dischmatal takes in the winding, rushing river, the meadows buried in flowers, the mottled woods, and, under the same blue arch, the awful, sheer, snow-laden glacier of Scaletta.

July brings us pompous Alpine hawkweed, and orchids, which lift up a haughty splendour, like queens in revolution time, under the very edge of the scythe. Those only survive which lurk

In the lone copse, or far sequestered green,

And shine without endeavouring to be seen.

July brings us thunderstorms, too, that leap into our valley like bacchanals, cut the darkness to rags with their lightning, and set all the giants around roaring and growling. And suddenly, one morning, we are back again in January—in an endless waste of snow, set with forests of Christmas-trees. Next day we are in white flannels, playing croquet.

In the Independent Review we always look with great interest to the "Notes on Current Events." Among the articles this month the two of most practical importance to our people are Mr. and Mrs. Ramsay Macdonald's on "Sweated Home Industries," and Miss Margaret McMillan's on "Citizens of To-morrow," on the proper care for the health of children, as the essential foundation of proper education. The World's Work and Play has, as usual, some capital full-page portraits, the frontispiece being of Mr. W. J. Bryan, while there is an article on his chances for the Presidency. There are some charming illustrations of the article on "The Uses of Heather," and very interesting ones of that on "Money in Mushroom-rooms."

We have already noted that Dr. Croker's delightful article on "The Ignominy of being Grown Up" is in the July Atlantic Monthly, half of which belongs to August, for it is only published here in the middle of the month. In the same number is an article on "Ibsen," by Mr. Edmund Gosse.

IMPRESSIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

IV.

"THAT it will probably clear towards ten o'clock" is a useful and comfortable faith when by arrangements made, baggage and provisions packed upon the "Rig," and our vanity a little tickled by being "the first to make the full round this season," we greet a wet morning from the steps of the Field Hotel. Mount Stephen's 6,000 feet of rock and snow are largely lost in swirling clouds, while opposite him, across the narrow valley, Burgess and Field, with the densely wooded pass between, some 3,000 feet above us, share a like fate. Up the milky stream of the Kicking Horse towards the great Divide, down it to the serrated Vanhorne Range, what views there ought to be and are not: Steadily down comes the rain. A few onlookers seem to think we shall not start, but we have no time left for adjournments. Therefore, with a reserved liberty of turning back as a judicious sop to prudence, we begin the first stage of our three-days' excursion to the famous Yoho Valley—a seven miles' drive through quiet woods round the base of Mount Burgess to the Emerald Lake. Did they mock at us, those two great owls that lumbered heavily from tree to tree in front of us, bending down the slender tops as they lighted from time to time to gaze solemnly upon us? Clearly, such foolish persons excited no alarm in them.

It was no idle flight of imagination that named this lovely lake "Emerald." Even on this wet, sunless day it well deserves its name. We shall see it again in the full blaze of sunlight from that track away up the hillside, 2,000 feet above it, on the right, just where the clouds are obscuring the peaks, and speculate much on the causes of the marvellous colouring of this and other lakes in these parts.

At the foot of the lake, the chalet, on a little hill set in the trees; at its head a stretch of flat stream-intersected land—land also dotted with the loveliest yellow orchids; beyond a wall of rocks with tumbling streams, above which, mingled clouds and snowy tops. Nine o'clock, and still the rain comes down. But by the chalet waits the best of guides with his four Indian ponies, his gun for a chance bear, his axe for cutting firewood, and his perfect indifference to any kind of weather. Too late to turn back now, when such attractions are dangled before us. So, pile the luggage and provisions on the patient pack horse, get on what scant supply of wet-defying garments—not overmuch—we have, good-bye to the friendly lady in charge of the chalet—last person we shall meet till Saturday afternoon—and slowly away in single file along the margin of the lake, over the orchid-bearing land, up the winding path that climbs the rock wall, and into the clouds.

Mid-day sees the first halt by Summit Lake, a green tarn surrounded by graceful pines and set among snowy peaks, scantily visible now. Near an open, grassy, flower-strewn space stands a rough log hut, canvas roofed, affording welcome shelter. A fire is quickly made in front, water boiled, and provisions unpacked. The weather actually threatens to improve, then changes its mind again. An hour's rest for man, woman, and beast, and then up and on again, with faint hopes of getting above the clouds.

We have passed out on to the western side of the Yoho Valley above the timber line, are moving just beneath the tongue of a glacier, with glimpses of its snow-fields beyond, fording the many little streams which descend from it, catching away across the valley glimpses of the great Takakaw Falls, whose thunder comes steadily to us across the intervening depths. This should be a very great view, says our guide. It is, we think, a sufficiently grand scene to counterbalance a very considerable wetness and a growing stiffness which makes walking an agreeable change.

A heathery knoll among spruce pines; on the one side a tiny Emerald Lake, on the other a sharp descent of some hundreds of feet to the Laughing Falls Creek, making steady music on its way down to the valley. Through the trees in front, glimpses of a fine glacier set in white peaks among the now lifting clouds—altitude about 6,000 feet. Three white tents pitched among the trees forming three sides of a little square—all clean and fresh—not used as yet this season. In the centre a noble fire, horses turned loose and saddles and baggage piled in safety from the too-curious porcupines. Rain over, clothes changed or dried. This is our first camp, and great is our satisfaction therein. It would take too long to tell properly of the cooking and eating of the evening meal, which ranged from soup to dessert, laid on a white cloth spread in one tent upon the heather; of the flowers that grew about us, notably white heather and pink calmia; of the beds in another tent—red blankets upon pine boughs and twigs, even the unnecessary luxury of sheets, specially brought with us and judiciously aired at our fire, all most warm and comfortable; of the pleasant talk by the fire, as the night drew on, to the sound of many waters; of the novelty and interest of it all.

A wonderful valley this, with its noble precipices and fine waterfalls, dense forest giving on to shining glaciers, white peaks above, and rushing waters below. Wonderful also is its weather. You shall eat your breakfast in thick, soft falling snow, glad that through it you can feel the glow of the camp fire reaching to your open tent, and by noon be rejoicing in the hot bursts of sunshine which alternate with sharp showers of hail. You shall have the grandeur of driving cloud and cloaking mists, succeeded by the glory of a cloudless blue and blazing sun, with every summit sharp against the sky, and every snow-field sparkling clear. Flowers it has many, and beautiful, but predominantly, in June, heather, white, green, pale yellow, and every shade of red. Creatures are there—bears, goats, sheep, even at times a mountain lion, and such smaller fry as marmots, mountain beavers, squirrels, and porcupines. But the bigger ones are shy of putting in an appearance, and must be taken more or less for granted. A valley without a trace of cultivation, without a house of any kind, without a road—as yet. But it has a trail that carelessly traverses slippery screes, that sometimes condescends to cross water by rough wooden bridges, at others prefers the simpler plan of going through it; that winds for hours among the woods, a black streak inches deep in soft decaying vegetation, much cumbered with rotten logs, unwieldy boulders, and fallen trees, where pedestrian pride is glad to be pocketed and get on horseback; that takes no account of steepness; that, never wide enough for two abreast, takes a special delight in contracting itself as it winds around the face of a precipice, or across a slope of hardened mud pitched at an angle only less than perpendicular—places where your horse's feet send the stones and loose earth clattering far below and you feel a mistaken preference for the imagined greater security of your own.

Many and wonderful are its points of view—not least among them the site of its second camp. A stretch of sward along the side of a noisy, foaming stream, sheltered on all other sides by trees; across the stream a belt of lofty pines, and close behind them a great rock wall capped by snow and ice, down which roars, not half a mile away, the great Takakaw Fall, making a plunge, it is said, of 1,200 feet, tossing clouds of spray, and thundering at you through the quiet night. Beyond the trees, on all sides, glimmering through them here and there, and more plainly visible looking up the stream, range many a lofty peak and snowfield, somewhat solemn and ghostly in the evening light. The man who cannot be happy here as he smokes his pipe by the blazing logs must indeed be strangely out of tune.

Not the least noteworthy point about this valley is the manner of leaving it. Once more you scale its western slopes, reaching by a new route the little Summit Lake, then, breaking away to the left, climb for miles high above the Emerald Lake, with views ever changing and expanding around you, up to the Burgess Pass. No great height can this boast of—only 7,200 feet—but you shall find there an outlook (or, rather, many outlooks) difficult to be surpassed, and not to be described here—save, indeed, that at one point you shall front the full 6,000 feet of Mount Stephen from rocky base, by glacier-swept shoulder, to snowy top, framed in a gap of the woods. Three thousand feet below you shall see Field and its white stream and toy houses; behind you a view totally different but equally wonderful; about your feet the heather and the golden in lilies; above you the bluest of cloudless skies, with a sun still high and strong enough to make the dark woods below inviting. Through them lies the steep descent. You plunge into them, and the best of excursions is a thing of the past.

Soon very really to be so, for a road is being built into the great valley; hotels will follow, and with them too many of the people whose proper sphere, if they only knew it, lies rather in the Blackpools than the Yohos of this world. With their advent rare flowers will become more rare, and interesting creatures more scarce. One, however, may be trusted to hold his own—the pervading porcupine, for doth he not specially love anything that humanity has handled, from axe-shafts and bridles to tin cans; and is he not specially “protected” as being the only edible animal that, with his slow, waddling run, is unable to escape from a starving but gunless man. A curious character he is, the basis of it distinctly pig, with a touch of the monkey in his extreme inquisitiveness and climbing powers and the way he looks at you, of the duck in his manner of walking, of the peacock in the way he spreads his quills and gives himself airs. Much hated is he in camp, where he is given to breaking in at night, devouring many things, upsetting all things, and leaving his noxious quills lying around. There is a distinctly Semitic business touch about him, and he accumulates much grease. Wherefore, let him be preserved for the benefit of hungry men and the amusement of strangers.

Go, by all means, to the Yoho, or on some similar expedition (and there are many such to be made), if you wish really to see something of this country. May you be as fortunate in a guide. Courteous and gentlemanly, young, but with the varied experiences of a soldier, a farmer, and a trapper, strong and skilful, whether to manage horses, arrange a tent, build a fire, or cook a meal, I see him now, lightly sitting his horse, as he heads our little procession and leads the pack-horse by one hand, guiding his own with the other. Driven from the trail by some fallen tree, how cleverly he steers a new way through the thick wood. Wonderfully, too, do these Indian ponies (Cayuses) pick their way. What will they not step over, clamber up, or slither down? Sometimes they are a little provoking by their habits of miscellaneous eating (nothing comes amiss), and stoppages to that end, sometimes a little ill-tempered with another, or astonishing you by leaping instead of fording a stream; you nevertheless grow to an absolute confidence in them and admiration for their endurance and skill. Why use them at all, for, after all, the distances are not great? Well, one does walk a good deal. If “noblesse” does not “oblige,” stiffness does. But heat and mire and mountain streams do afford a fair excuse, even to a good pedestrian. Moreover, it is the habit of the country.

GLIMPSES of other lands are often interesting, especially when they are the scene of daily life for some of our friends. Mrs. Harding, better known to many of our readers as the Miss Cadman whose faithful and intelligent work for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall was much appreciated, tells us some facts about Antofagasta, North Chile, where she now resides. The town, which is built almost on the shore, is not an earthly paradise by any means—“the streets, or most of them, are narrow and evil-smelling in the winter, so I can't imagine what the summer will be like.” Houses of four rooms are rented at $300 to $400 a month. There are no vegetables in the district; indeed “there is not one scrap of any kind of vegetation” on the mountains, rocks, and sandy soil around. Still, it is a good place for business, and the sea and mountains are always interesting. Even so far away unexpected meetings take place, and Mrs. Harding met at Valparaiso a former secretary of the Essex Hall Recreation Society, Mr. W. H. Parr.

TENNYSON'S “IDYLLS OF THE KING.”—“GARETH AND LYNETTE.”

II.

By REV. W. LAWRENCE SCHROEDER, M.A.

“GARETH AND LYNETTE”²² fitly exemplifies Tennyson's power of narrative. As a story-teller Tennyson might have taken highest rank. In those poems, such as “Dora” and “Rizpah,” where the story is the essential thing, he is without spot or blemish, but in the “Idylls” we have a confusion of allegory and symbol, moral reflections and prophetic utterance, so that our enthusiasm for the mere story is somewhat dampened. In “Gareth and Lynette” the story may be disengaged.

The idyll tells us of the growth and worthship of “the last tall son of Lot and Bellicent,” Gareth of Orkney. Within his heart kindled the desire to do his Maker's will:

“To sweep
In ever-highering eagle-circles up To the great Sun of Glory, and thence swoop Down upon all things base, and dash them dead;
A Knight of Arthur, working out his will,
To cleanse the world.”

But his mother yearned for the comfort of the youngest of her children. “Hast thou no pity upon my loneliness?” she criss, when Gareth presses for her consent to his departure for the court of Arthur. “Both thy brethren are in Arthur's hall; Albeit neither loved with that full love I feel for thee, nor worthy such a love”; stay: “follow the deer By these tall firs and our fast-falling burns. So make thy manhood mightier day by day; Sweet is the chase: and I will seek thee out some comfortable bride and fair, to grace Thy climbing life, and cherish my p. one year.” But Gareth feels he is made for more strenuous things: “Follow the deer? follow the Christ, the King. Live pure, speak true, right wrong, follow the King,—Else, wherefore born?”

We cannot but sympathise with Bellicent's longing for the abiding presence of her boy. She makes a somewhat unworthy effort to retain him, but finally consents to his plea on the condition that for a twelvemonth and a day, Gareth, disguised and unknown, will in Arthur's hall hire himself “to serve for meats and drinks Among the scullions and the kitchen knaves, And those that hand the dish across the bar.” Silent awhile was Gareth, then replied: “The thrall in person may be free in soul, And I shall see the jousts. Thy son am I, And since thou art my mother must obey. I therefore yield me freely to thy will.” For a time his outward purpose was perplexed by the wistful fears of his mother, “till an hour, When wakened by the wind which with full voice, Swept bellowing thro' the darkness on to dawn,” he rose, and with two retainers, went his way to Camelot.

As they drew near, the mystic aspect of the city in the changing mists daunted them. The seer with his “confusion and illusion and relation, Elusion and occasion and evasion,” bewildered them; but Gareth opposed to all such feeling the hearty laughter of an untried heart, and so with all good cheer entered the city of his dreams, full of the purpose that maketh strong.

"Out of bower and casement shyly glanced

Eyes of pure women, wholesome stars of love;

And all about a healthful people slept
As in the presence of a gracious King."

Gareth's thought of chivalry and truth and righteousness was confirmed by the action of the King in delivering judgment. Arthur rectifies an injustice committed by his father Uther; he helps his enemy, a widow, against her enemy; he rejects Mark's offering of cloth of gold because of the ignobility, the meanness, and the treachery of the Cornish king: "Mark hath tarnished the great name of king, As Mark would sully the low state of churl." Arthur grants Gareth his boon; "so Gareth all for glory underwent The sooty yoke of kitchen-vassalage; Ate with young lads his portion by the door, And couch'd at night with trimy kitchen-knaves." He was willing to fulfil to the utmost the conditions laid upon him by his mother; he turned the spit, drew water, hewed wood; he "wrought All kinds of service with a noble ease That graced the lowliest act in doing it."

Away in the north his mother sorrowed for his presence; her heart repented "of the word she made him swear;" she sent him arms and "loosed him from his vow." Gareth quickly sought the King and told his story. "Make me thy knight—in secret! let my name Be hidden, and give me the first quest. I spring Like flame from ashes." The King smiled at the enthusiasm of the boy, and "half-unwillingly Loving his lusty youthhood, yielded to him," first mentioning that Lancelot must know all. The same day "there past into the hall, A damsel of high lineage, and a brow May-blossom, and a cheek of apple blossom, Hawk-eyes; and lightly was her slender nose Tiptilted like the petal of a flower": she craved a boon. The King inquired her name and need. "Lynette my name; noble; my need, a knight to combat for my sister, Lyonors. She lives in Castle Perilous; a river Runs in three loops about her living-place; And o'er it are three passings, and three knights Defend the passings, brethren, and a fourth And of that four, the mightiest, holds her stay'd In her own castle, and so besieges her To break her will, and make her wed with him."

She asked for Lancelot to do battle for her sister, but Gareth eagerly claims the quest, and, to the utter amazement of the court, Arthur grants his boon. "On the damsel's forehead shame, pride, wrath Slew the may-white: she lifted either arm, 'Fie on thee, King! I ask'd for thy chief knight, And thou hast given me but a kitchen-knave." Lynette's delicate aristocratic sense of what was fitting to her need was outraged by the conduct of the King; turning herself, she fled, took horse, and passed beyond the city gate. Gareth, no laggard in the quest, quickly followed; his whilom companions of the kitchen, whose love he commanded, Crowded round him, "threw up their caps and cried, 'God bless the King and all his fellowship!'"

And on through lanes of shouting Gareth rode Down the slope street, and past without the gate."

Kay the seneschal, with mischievous purpose in his heart, followed; but rode "thro' silent faces," out beyond the gate. Arthur, careful for Gareth, sent Lancelot after, to keep watchful guard over the youngest of his fellowship. Lynette in scorn bid Gareth "hence." "Avoid, thou smellest all of kitchen-grease," and in token of her delicacy, "nipt her slender nose With petulant thumb and finger." A more authoritative voice commanded Gareth to return: "We lack thee by the hearth." Turning, Gareth saw Kay, "the most ungentle knight in Arthur's hall." They shocked together, and fortune blessed the younger man; "Kay fell shoulder-slipt," and Gareth resumed his way.

The maiden refused to acknowledge his prowess; but coming to a wood "nigh as full of thieves as leaves," she admits she has lost the way, and that Gareth may perhaps be of service. "Sir Scullion, canst thou use that spit of thine? Fight, an thou canst." On they rode, reviler and reviled, until an appeal for help from a servingman whose lord had been bound by thieves, extorts from Lynette her consent to Gareth's offered service.

"Down among the pines
He plunged; and there, black shadow'd nigh the mere,

And mid-thigh-deep in bulrushes and reed,
Saw six tall men haling a seventh along;
A stone about his neck to drown him in it.
Three with good blows he quieted, but three

Fled through the pines; and Gareth loosed the stone

From off his neck, then in the mere beside Tumbled it; oilily bubbled up the mere."

The baron, one of Arthur's friends, offered Gareth reward; but Gareth sharply refused it: "For the deed's sake have I done the deed, In uttermost obedience to the King." Lynette, however, maintains her stupid pride, and belittles the fight: "Deem not I accept thee aught the more, Scullion, for running sharply with thy spit Down on a rout of craven foresters. A thresher with his flail had scatter'd them. Nay—for thou smellest of the kitchen still." At the baron's table she refused to eat with Gareth. The baron, "half-ashamed and part-amazed," seated "Gareth at another board, Sat down beside him, ate, and then began" to acknowledge the strength and skill whereby Gareth had saved his life. On the morrow, the maiden and her knight went their way. "Lead, and I follow," spake Gareth; but Lynette replied in haughty tone, "I fly no more: I allow thee for an hour. Lion and stoat have isled together, Knave, in time of flood." "To whom Sir Gareth answered courteously, 'Say thou thy say, and I will do my deed.'" At last they came to the river of loops, to the passing held by Sir Morning-Star. Lynette offers her champion, the kitchen knave of Arthur's hall, and at the call of the knight the battle is prepared.

"O daughters of the dawn,
And servants of the Morning-Star, approach, Arm me."

At his voice,
"From out the silken curtain-folds,

Bare-footed and bare-headed, three fair girls

In gilt and rosy raiment came; their feet
In dewy grasses glisten'd; and the hair
All over glanced with dewdrop or with gem
Like sparkles in the stone Avanturine.
These armed him in blue arms, and gave a shield,

Blue also, and thereon the morning star."

And Gareth gazed silently on the beauty of the scene, until aroused by the taunts of the knight he cried: "I spring from loftier lineage than thine own," and with the words, threw himself into conflict and charged at fiery speed. In the shock both knights were thrown: the fight continued on foot.

"And Gareth lash'd so fiercely with his brand,

He drave his enemy backward down the bridge,

The damsel crying, 'Well stricken, kitchenknave!

Till Gareth's shield was cloven; but one stroke

Laid him that clove it grovelling on the ground."

The increasing change in the mind of Lynette is indicated in the words: "Methought, Knave, when I watch'd thee striking on the bridge, The savour of thy kitchen came upon me A little faintlier; but the wind hath changed; I scent it twenty-fold." The second riverloop was guarded by Noon-day Sun, with "red and cipher face of rounded foolishness." The battle was short: "Four strokes They struck with sword, and these were mighty . . . but as the Sun Heaved up a ponderous arm to strike the fifth, The hoof of his horse slipt in the stream, the stream Descended, and the Sun was washed away."

Gareth, by his lance, drew him home, and sent him to the King: Then, to Lynette, "Lead, and I follow." Quietly she led. At the third passing the river was spanned by a bridge of treble bow: Beyond the bridge "all in a rose-red from the west, and all Naked it seem'd, and glowing in the broad Deep-dimpled current underneath, The knight, that named himself the star of Evening, stood." He was wrapt "in harden'd skins that fit him like his own." Lynette in bringing forth her champion cries, "Both thy younger brethren have gone down before this youth: and so wilt thou, Sir Star." Answering "a hard and deadly note upon the horn" . . . "with slow steps from

stained

Pavilion, forth a grizzled damsel came.

And arm'd him in old arms, and brought a helm.

With but a drying evergreen for crest,
And gave a shield whereon the Star of Even,

Half-tarnished and half-bright, his emblem shone."

The fight was hard and fierce, and Gareth half despaired; but from the maiden came shouts of encouragement: "Strike, thou art worthy of the Table Round—His arms are old, he trusts the harden'd skin—Strike—strike—the wind will never change again," and Gareth smote with stronger stroke, until at last his sword clashed the Knight's, and "brake it utterly to the hilt." But with that, the battle moved in closer wise, till finally, Gareth, straining to the uttermost, lifted his enemy bodily and "hurl'd him headlong o'er the bridge." His victory is complete, for now the maiden, won by strong devotion, bids him, "the knightliest of all kitchen-knaves," ride at her side: "Thrice my love hath smiled on me," she sings.

They talk together, and Lynette tells Gareth of the rock whereon with holy hand of hermit hath been fashioned the allegory of "the war of Time against the soul of man." Gareth, exultant, thinks himself immune: "There rides no knight, not Lancelot his great self, Hath force to quell me." His valour soon was tried, for Lancelot, delayed by Kay, and misled by the damsel's "error thro' the wood," had swum the river-loops, and so overtaken the twain. Gareth had taken the shield of Morning-Star, his own being cloven. Lancelot, thinking Gareth had been slain, cried: "Stay, felon knight, I avenge me for my friend." In the shock Gareth's pride had a fall; at a touch of Lancelot's spear, "the wonder of the world," he "went sliding down so easily": "that when he found the grass within his hands he laughed." Explanations follow. Gareth tells Lynette who he is, but Lynette is angry: "Knight, knave, prince and fool, I hate thee and for ever." She does not like to think that her high-born sense of what is fitting should so belie itself as to trick her judgement of Gareth's nature: "Worse than being fool'd of others, is to fool one's self." But in the quiet of her watch over the tired and fight-worn Gareth, she regains her better mind: "full merry am I to find my goodly knave is knight and noble." Lancelot offers Gareth his charger and shield, so that in the last great fight with Night and Death, he may wage the better war. Gareth is eager to fulfil his quest: "Hence, let us go." In silence they moved across the silent field: Gareth seeing the fall of his foe in the shooting of a star, hearing the noise of victory in the whooping of an owl.

Lancelot, in his concern, "urged all the devisings of chivalry" upon Gareth. But Gareth replied, "Here be rules, I know but one—To dash against mine enemy and to win." "Heaven help thee," sigh'd Lynette. Now they come to the flat field beside the Castle Perilous, whereon was pitched "a huge pavilion like a mountain peak," sundering "the glooming crimson on the marge." By it hung a long black horn. Thrice Gareth blew, then, "after long hush—at last—The huge pavilion slowly yielded up, Thro' those black foldings, that which housed therein. High on a night-black horse, in night-black arms, With white breast-bone and barren ribs of Death, And crown'd with fleshless laughter—some ten steps—In the half light—thro' the dim dawn—advanced The monster, and then paused, and spake no word." Gareth, wrought into indignation by the sight, yet feeling somewhat the horror of it all, nerved himself for the shock. The horses charged, and Death was cast to ground; "with one stroke Sir Gareth split the skull." "Then with a stronger buffet he clove the helm as thoroughly as the skull: and out from this Issued the bright face of a blooming boy, Fresh as a flower new-born." Life from death: revelation in victory: the glory of eternal life.

And so the story ends, the quest is accomplished. Gareth has proved himself a noble knight. Time and habit have been vanquished in the strength born of high ideals; the terror of death has been lost in the beauty of God's greater revelation.

It is impossible not to be struck by Tennyson's sincerity, artistic, moral, and spiritual. The idyll breathes the freshness of youth; it glows with a beauty born of deep meditation on the eternal warfare of soul and sense, and its issue in victory by the service of love. In the hands of Tennyson, the old story given by Malory becomes instinct with modern meanings. A phase of chivalrous service becomes the type of Christian conflict; the soul is stirred to righteous independence by the recital of Gareth's humble acceptance of the conditions whereby his spirit was proved. We may criticise if we will, but the idyll "Gareth and Lynette" will ever remain as an inspiration to strenuous living, as a joyous solace to the toil-worn worker in the ever-widening fields of human life.

THE VAN MISSION.

CROSSHILLS (NEAR KEIGHLEY).—The Van has now arrived within the zone of our Chapel-lane Chapel, Bradford, and thanks to the influence and liberality of the minister, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, the mission will not suffer for want of musical assistance for many days to come. It was to be expected that the attendance at the services would, by comparison with those at Skipton, be small, but an unwelcome surprise was in store for the missionaries at Crosshills, for it was soon learnt that the major portion of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were absent on their annual holidays, while those who remained seemed indisposed to lend an ear to religious matters. On the first evening the visiting missionary, the Rev. John Ellis, spoke, the Rev. Wm. Rosling, of Bradford, occupying the seat of the chairman, Mr. Harry Brown playing the harmonium. There was no difficulty in counting the congregation at any time. On Tuesday the principal speaker—and it may be added, singer—was the Rev. Henry Cross, of Dewsbury, who discoursed for half an hour to a score or so of adults. On that day and the following day we were favoured with the assistance of Mr. L. A. Smith, who trained out from Bradford to play the hymns. On Wednesday the Rev. John Ellis prefaced his discourse on Unitarianism, a Gospel for Our Day, with a short address to the assembled children, who subsequently sang remarkably well, but although there were constant changes in the company, the number attending never exceeded a score of adult listeners. Some interesting conversations took place after the meeting and during the daytime samples of literature were left in the hands of many of the inhabitants, and the visiting missionary was satisfied that interest had been aroused, and that the place was worth re-visiting at any other time than during the parish feast.

BINGLEY.—The Rev. John Ellis had himself arranged for the Van to occupy a splendid site in this market town, and each evening of its stay, except Sunday, large audiences congregated round the speakers. Special thanks are due to Mr. Harry Brown, who came punctually on each occasion to preside over the musical part of the programme. On Monday the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones brought two of his choristers, Master Harold Heaton singing the "Better Land" and "The Children's Home," and Master Arthur Greenough "Angels ever Bright and Fair," and "Consider the Lilies." These much appreciated items on our programme no doubt largely contributed to the success of the meeting, which was supported by a dozen or so of our friends from Bradford. The missionaries always prefer to see a muster of their co-religionists on "first-night" to any other, their presence attracting the natives. On this occasion the company, which numbered sixty adults at the beginning, grew to fully four times this figure during the singing of the final solo. Close attention was paid to the address of the evening delivered by the missionary, the subject being "The Grounds for Faith in God," and at the end there were 150 adults present. The Rev. John Ellis was followed by the Rev. Henry Cross, who spoke on "Salvation" for a quarter of an hour. When questions were invited, a good deal of opposition was offered by a man who has charge of a gospel tent now in the town. He enjoys a wonderful memory for texts, with their chapter and verse, and loudly and emphatically contended that the Unitarian teaching concerning the universal fatherhood of God was contrary to Scripture and fact, contending that some people are now, as others were at the time of Christ, children of the devil. The meeting terminated at 9.25, when the crowd numbered at least 300, composed of people of all classes.

On Friday the term of the meeting was from 7.45 to 9.55, Mr. A. Simpson, of Shipley, and our Bradford choir, leading off with a solo, "Come Unto Me," which had the desired effect, no less than 250 adults responding to the invitation, thus securing a splendid congregation for the first speaker, our kind-hearted friend, the Rev. William Rosling, who, in response to a telegram, came over from Bradford to give a twenty minutes' address, calculated to make clear the Unitarian attitude towards the Bible. Very few, indeed, of the 250 adults left the company as far as could be observed, and when the reverend gentleman concluded his remarks there were nearer 350 adults in close proximity to the Van than the number at which he began. Some questions were again put by the gentleman of the Gospel Tent, who seemed quite unable to treat his Bible as anything less than an infallible oracle. However, with his assistance, the company now amounted to 400, who gave a most patient hearing to the Rev. John Ellis's earnest discourse on the nature of Jesus Christ, 450 being a moderate estimate of the number present throughout its entirety. Seven-eighths of these were men of all classes. Mr.

A. Simpson then sang the solo, "If with all Your Hearts," to the great satisfaction of all. Numerous questions poured in upon the missionary, the audience bringing the meeting to a close at the head of a few of the opposition, who started the orthodox doxology, the crowd joining very heartily, especially with the last line, "Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost."

The Salvation Army are in the habit of holding Saturday meetings on the small site where the Van was in possession, and their representatives requested that our meeting should not begin till eight, at which hour they marched off unwillingly, leaving the bulk of their gathering to hear the Unitarian preachers. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones was once more the welcome occupant of the platform, and again the treble vocalist, Master Arthur Greenough, sang solos, the number of those present rising from 150 to 250 during his first song. The Rev. Henry Cross took the office of chairman, and after the Rev. W. H. Eastlake, of Idle, had addressed the company for twenty minutes, he spoke for a similar period to a company numbering fully 350 adults. Before the meeting was invited to put questions Master Greenough rendered the sacred song "Gentle Shepherd," his fine ringing voice coupled with the clearly enunciated words of the beautiful song stirring the religious emotions, it is to be hoped, of even the most hardened believer in everlasting perdition. A lively time followed the questions, the early ones being replied to by the Rev. Henry Cross, and, after he had left to catch a train, the Rev. W. H. Eastlake dauntlessly offered himself as a target for the energy of the questioners, some of whom showed much excitement. It can hardly be believed, however, that their views were at all representative of the bulk of the people at Bingley; though evidently Unitarian thought has much to conquer there. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones closed the meeting at 10.5 with a few remarks calculated to allay any resentment present, but for nearly an hour later, large groups discussed matters among themselves, and many demands for Van literature were gratified. On Sunday the Salvation Army had another meeting alongside the Van, after which two free-lances of the extreme evangelical type addressed the passers-by from chairs, but the Van held itself in reserve for the next week's work, and the old doctrine of Salvation by substitution was once more proclaimed to an apathetic audience, who were invited to spend an eternity of bliss with the believer rather than an eternity of woe with the unbeliever.

SURE stands the promise—ever to the meek

A heritage is given;
Nor lose they earth who, single-hearted, seek

The righteousness of heaven.

LONDON CHILDREN AT BILLINGSHURST.

At this holiday season it may interest some readers of the INQUIRER to hear that for a second year a party of 62 children from the Domestic Mission at Bell-street, Edgware-road, have had a most successful holiday at Billingshurst, under the careful superintendence of Mr. Street, his wife for several days, and Mr. Saunders, his assistant; the arrangements for billeting out the children having been previously made by Mr. Lansdown as last year.

Field Cottage, the rent of which is paid by the Holly Hill Jubilee Fund, usually under Mr. Lansdown's supervision, was handed over to Mr. Street for his fortnight there, and was the centre of cooking operations for the whole party—together with the next cottage, where Mrs. Yarrow, the caretaker lives, and the way in which she and her assistant cooked and kept going the whole machinery of living for the party was a marvel. Over Bank Holiday, too! The tent in the field close by, somewhat starred in its roof, sufficed to keep off the hot sun, and to show the rows of ruddy faces therein gathered four times a day, glowing with ever-deepening colour and brighter sparkling eyes.

Cricket and various games were played in the large and airy field, or in the heat of the day little groups sat about, the boys finding curios and the girls weaving wreaths of hawkweed and certainly both good listeners to stories read or told.

Rambles into woods hard by all joined in, and bathing was indulged in by the more adventurous. On Sunday we all walked along the road about twenty minutes to the little old chapel, more than half of which the children filled, and there we had simple services, and really listened to capital addresses given by Mr. Street and Mr. Lansdown morning and evening.

When I left after three happy days the children were already collecting gifts for their London home people—one treasure, a 1d. bottle of ink "for mother," was luckily exchanged before catastrophe.

Sudden illness in her home had unfortunately deprived the party of the services of a valuable "mother," who had proved her worth as assistant last year.

I did not enter the cottages where the children slept, but the often quoted sayings and doings of "our lady" showed the kind of relation existing between them and their hostesses, who, I hear, often did for their charges more than was in the bond.

Weather favoured the party, and I trust that now another set of children from Bermondsey are having as happy a time at Billingshurst.

You can never read bad literature too little, nor good literature too much. Bad books are intellectual poison, they destroy the mind. Because people always read what is new instead of the best of all ages, writers remain in the narrow circle of the ideas which happen to prevail in their time; and so the period sinks deeper and deeper into its own mire.—Schopenhauer.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bermondsey: Appointment.—On the first Sunday in September, Mr. Jesse Hipperson, of Norwich, will (as lay worker) enter upon the charge of the work here in succession to the Rev. Eustace Thompson, who leaves at the end of this month, after a faithful and useful pastorate of four years, to take up duty at Belfast Domestic Mission (Stanhope-street). Mr. Hipperson, who was formerly a Wesleyan, was, in April last, approved by the Advisory Committee of the South-East Provincial Assembly, as competent to act temporarily as lay worker, while endeavouring to equip himself further for the regular ministry.

Chester: Appointment.—The Rev. David Jenkin Evans, of Cwmbach, Aberdare, has accepted the call to be minister at Matthew Henry's Chapel.

Chowbent.—The Atherton Journal of July 27 says: Saturday last being the date of the golden wedding day of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Eckersley, the bell of the chapel at which they are regular worshippers, viz., Chowbent Unitarian Chapel, was heartily rung on the morning of that day in celebration of the happy event. At the same hour, on behalf of the trustees and the congregation, a deputation consisting of the minister, the Rev. J. J. Wright, and the secretary, Mr. J. Gregory, waited upon Mr. and Mrs. Eckersley in their home at Fulwell, and presented to them an album, containing a beautifully illuminated address and seventeen remarkably fine pictures of the exterior and interior of Chowbent Chapel. Mr. Eckersley, on receiving the album in the name of Mrs. Eckersley, himself, and family, desired the deputation to convey to the trustees and congregation not only their deep and sincere gratitude for the kindly and thoughtful feeling which had prompted such an appropriate presentation, but also to say that the album would be most highly valued by Mrs. Eckersley and himself, and also by their family after them. The family, Mr. Eckersley remarked, had been associated with that religious society in Atherton from its origin. The religious society referred to, we may say, dates in Atherton from 1645, the present chapel being erected in 1721.

Ilford.—Owing to the absence on holidays of three or four families who have so far been the mainstay of this congregation, there was only an attendance of twenty-six last Sunday evening to hear the Rev. G. Carter. This congregation, which is now definitely banded together by membership, is fortunate in its two chief officers. The chairman, Mr. E. R. Fyson, is the editor of the Ilford Recorder and Mr. Walter D. Welford, of photographic fame, is the honorary secretary. Mr. A. J. Naylor and Mr. Russell, two members of the Committee, seize every opportunity of explaining the principles of Unitarianism in the local press. The immediate want here is a suitable meeting place. At present the services are held in a room situated over a greengrocer's shop. It is an extremely noisy position, being only a few feet from the tramway terminus. However, after several months' search for a suitable site, the committee now have some plots under consideration, and it is hoped that one of these may soon be obtained as a site for a permanent building. There is no doubt that with a building of their own the congregation would rapidly increase.

Newry.—On Sunday week the Rev. G. V. Crook preached a vigorous sermon on "Unitarianism and the Future," in the course of which he said:—"Dean Stanley was a Unitarian in everything but the name. He openly avowed that the orthodox dogmas of vicarious atonement, eternal punishment, the two natures in Jesus Christ, and original depravity were ecclesiastical mistakes. When Bishop Gore tells us that a man should believe the unambiguous historical statements of the Creed of which he is constantly required to say 'I believe,' are not such men as Stanley, Arnold, Newman, Jowett, and even Bishop Gore himself excluded thereby? The writer of the essay in 'Lux Mundi' cannot deny that new wine has been put into the old bottles. The same fact manifests itself in Presbyterianism, Congregationalism, and Wesleyanism. A leading Presbyterian minister has recently recorded his aversion to the Westminster Confession, condemning its doctrines of original sin, endless punishment, Biblical inerrancy and the Trinity, closing his remarks in these words: 'There is no such God as the God of the Confession; there is no such eternity as the eternity of the Confession.' And does not the recent Scottish Church crisis reveal this fact that Presbyterianism has been putting new wine into their old bottles. How fully Congregationalism is filling the new wine into the old bottles is well seen while listening to the penetrating power of the youthful preacher in the London City Temple. And have not Professors Beet and Mitchell taught the Wesleyans that their old bottles cannot contain the new wine? If by some irresistible call all those in the various Christian denominations, and outside of them, who hold views similar to those which Unitarians cherish as their own, should come forth and range themselves under a common banner, great indeed would be the multitude."

It is a work that deserves the study of all who desire to understand the real causes of some of the most pressing of our national problems. Reform in these directions may be too much to hope for, but at least Mr. Jesse Collings has done his best to show its necessity and its ruinous alternatives."—The Times.

"In its broad and general outlines all social reformers will welcome the plea of Mr. Collings. He sees the immanence of the disease. He knows that feudalism is flourishing. He cannot acquiesce in the utter destruction of all that stands for England outside the feverish cities, and he proclaims in unfaltering accents the fundamental verdict of history; that a country is strong in proportion to the number of its people, who come into direct contact with the land as freemen; that the dearth of the landed population has always been the signal for a national degeneration."—Daily News.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ONE of our friends takes us up genially in reference to the brief speech of one word which we attributed last week to Emerson. He goes so far as to suggest that August heat has made us "nod," as 'tis said Homer himself hath nodded ere now; still, he adds that he may be himself the nodder. He says—"My distinct impression is that it was Thackeray, not Emerson, whose speech at the Athenæum in Manchester consisted in little more than the one word 'Gentlemen.' There was a representative gathering on the occasion; Thackeray had got his speech off by heart, and told a particular friend present what a treat he (Thackeray) was going to give him. Thackeray stood up, memory failed, he turned to his friend, and said 'I am so sorry for you,' and, to the audience, 'you little know what a speech you have missed,' and sat down." Surely a story so circumstantial must be true, and doubtless our friend on return from holiday will verify his impression.

WHAT, then, can an August editor say for himself? If Thackeray, an editor of repute, could forget, how much more our humble self? But now a curious fact emerges. Emerson did make a "speech" of the kind, though writing currente calamo, our memory was at fault in locating the occasion in Manchester, where he was specially successful as a lecturer. On turning up our authority, we find it was at the dinner of the Saturday Club (Boston) in honour of the Shakespeare Tercentenary that Emerson rose to speak, "looked about tranquilly for a minute or two and sat down serene and unabashed, unable to say a word." So that if our friend's authority, and ours, are to be depended upon, there are two such "speeches" by great men on record. Whether to admire most Thackeray's ready pleasantry or Emerson's tranquillity, "serene and unabashed" is a nice point. We incline to the latter.

VALPARAISO, Santiago de Chile, and other places whose names are less familiar, have suffered severely from earthquake. What the number of persons killed has been, it seems impossible as yet to estimate. But the loss of life has been considerable, while the hardship awaiting crowds of survivors is extreme. Driven from their homes, from homes stretched in hopeless ruin, they shelter where they may and how they may. In the face of these convulsions of nature, we are helpless, and can only extend our sympathy. We can, also, perhaps, learn a lesson which these calamities seem to contain. For all our yearning after security, the powers of the world determine that our life shall be one of insecurity. That is a truth we are in danger of forgetting, and it may well be that we suffer more in our dread of unknown chances than we should if we faced the risks with greater sang froid. People who live nearer to the reckless moods of nature do this to a greater extent than we in London imagine. And there is little doubt that they are happier for their spirit of reckless disregard of evils which cannot be insured against.

CHINA is the latest of the countries to be seized with the desire for political innovation. The following brief telegram from Reuter's agency may be left to speak for itself, whether as a jest played by the Orient on Western credulity, or in what other sense, we do not pretend to decide. But, if any serious purpose lies behind it, we shall certainly be obliged to furbish up our knowledge of the Asiatic land, the very names of whose provinces we cannot at the moment recall :—"The Dowager Empress intends to summon a conference of high officials, including several Viceroys, to discuss the adoption of a Constitution. The Commissioners who recently returned from their tour abroad recommend a gradual change to Constitutional government, taking ten or fifteen years to educate the people to adapt themselves to the new régime."

A CORRESPONDENT sends us some particulars of the action now being taken by the committee of the Georgia Relief Fund. The appeal for subscriptions has already produced over £100 and largely increased funds are needed if the work is to be carried out. We may mention that among other names on the committee are those of Canon Scott Holland, Mrs. A. Sidgwick, Mrs. Murray Macdonald, Mrs. Herbert Smith; the hon. sec. is Mrs. N. F. Dryhurst, and the hon. treasurer, Mr. S. R. Scott, Lloyd's Bank, Hampstead.

THE condition of affairs in Georgia is described in the appeal of the women of Georgia to the women of England :—"A disaster, terrible and unprecedented in our history, has befallen our country. By the order of the Russian Government the central and western provinces of Georgia have been invaded by Cossacks and soldiers. Four towns and two hundred villages have been destroyed and burned; fields, gardens, and vineyards have been devastated; the cattle and household property of the peasants have been looted. The people, who were disarmed beforehand, sought shelter in the forests and mountains. Some escaped, but those who did not fell victims to the brutality of the Cossacks, and were ill-treated, imprisoned, and shot." And the assistance it is proposed to render is stated by our correspondent. "It has been suggested that the supply of seed-corn and building material will be very fitting means of meeting the present distress; but closer inquiries may suggest other means of relief. We are in touch with those who can advise us wisely on these matters, but you will easily understand that the names best worth mentioning are just those which we cannot give."

SOME remarks of Dr. Horton's at a picnic convention held at Harrogate have been causing a mild excitement in missionary and evangelical circles. As is not unusual, Dr. Horton has had to protest through the press that he did not mean so much as his hearers imagined he had expressed. He did not say that missions are not successful, but only that if the churches would spend as much on the mission field as the country sank in the Transvaal war, they would be able to achieve more. But he did contrast the 1s. 6d. a head which church members are supposed to subscribe to missionary societies with the undoubtedly larger sums spent by some ministers on tobacco, or by deacons on summer holidays.

IF Dr. Horton had asserted that foreign missions are not succeeding, he would have advanced a proposition which, as regards most countries, few would have been found to dispute. A further charge which Dr.

Horton was thought to have preferred, and to which he adheres, has raised a good deal of strong feeling. "Ministers who do not believe in missions are traitors to the Gospel. Can anyone dispute this view? How can any man preach that Gospel unless he believes in preaching it all?" In short, the New Testament in every line, possibly in every doubtful text, is to be accepted as it stands. Happily there are men in the evangelical communions who do not accept this view. But if they are to be dubbed traitors, it is little wonder that so many pass from these churches to a clearer atmosphere.

GENERAL BOOTH is again enjoying his summer motor car progress. We are led to wonder whether next year we may not have to chronicle the journey of King Booth. It seems that some unduly sceptical persons have been speculating on what will happen on the death of the present commander of the Salvation Army. In the first place, General Booth replies that he does not intend to die yet, and when the time does arrive, it will be said, "The General is dead, long live the Generalship." From which we conclude a hereditary descent has been decided on.

THE General is reported to have described the work of the Army in grappling with the question of unemployment as "a systematic, almost a scientific remedy. It was not soup doles and charity that the genuine working man wanted, but work—producing wages in remunerative employment." Now, wages, in the ordinary sense of the word, is exactly what the Army for the most part does not pay. The social work of the Army has many excellences, though it is hardly so large or so successful as is often supposed. But it does not and it cannot cope with the difficulty of the genuine working man. Nor can it, we are afraid, carry out the work of re-peopling the country side by the purchase of small holdings and the settlement of town workers thereon, even though it is done "without damaging the lawns and estates of the better classes."

THE Garden City at Letchworth is progressing. One of the latest items of news from that quarter is that the well-known publishing firm, Messrs. Dent & Co., has decided to remove its works from London and to erect a building at Garden City, in which 250 workers will be employed. The complete success of the scheme originally mapped out by Mr. Ebenezer Howard depends largely upon the establishment of suitable industries. It is satisfactory, therefore, to learn that a fifth factory is now in course of erection, and that other proposals, including that mentioned above, are taking practical form. The provision of workmen's dwellings is one of the pressing needs in preparation for the increase of artisan population that will come with the completion of the factories now being erected. The need is not indeed a remote one. Last Saturday Mr. Dent and a party of his bookbinders visited Letchworth in a special train, assisted in the ceremony of cutting the first sod, and enjoyed the hospitality of the present residents at the tea table.

THE SITUATION OF THE CHURCHES IN FRANCE.

I WAS waiting for the publication of the Pope's instructions before writing another letter to the INQUIRER on ecclesiastical matters in France. However interesting for us, the internal contests of the little Protestant minority are of small importance in the general state of religion and church in that country, compared with the great struggle between the Roman Catholic Church and the French democracy.

But the Pope has delayed long before publishing his commands. To be sure, we knew already by the Encyclical Veementer nos that he condemned strongly the separation between Church and State as an impious and iniquitous and sacrilegious violation of the rights of God, and indeed we did not need such a solemn address to be acquainted with the constant doctrine of the Roman Church on this matter. We wanted, however, to know what practical instructions Pius X. was to give to the thirty-six millions of Roman Catholics who are now in France legally liable of that regimen. It seems that the Pope has been much troubled about his resolution, for he waited until August 10 to sign his address to the Archbishops and Bishops of France, and it has only been published on the 14th.

Nevertheless, I daresay that after such long expectation we are not much better informed than before. The Pope, indeed, does not only condemn once more the statute of separation; he forbids also to the Catholics the organisation of the associations for worship (associations cultuelles) which the new French law has ordered. He forbids even the constitution of other associations which might be reconcilable with that law and at the same time more in harmony with the Canons of the Church, so long as the law remains as it is. Thus it seems at first sight that the Pope condemns the French Catholics either to rebellion against the legal power of their country or to temporary cessation of public worship.

But immediately after this severe order he invites the Bishops to use all lawful means, which belong to all citizens, to dispose and organise religious worship, and the faithful people to follow his instructions with steadiness and perseverance, but without insurrection or violence. What does such language mean? It is so clear that there are already three or four different interpretations. Some say that the Pope wishes to promote an amendment of the law, that he wishes the new congregations to be organised according to a type, which should be legalised afterwards if the Government is not to close all the churches in France. Others think that the hard condemnation of the "associations cultuelles" which are prescribed by the new French law, is only a doctrinal one, that the Pope intends to keep safe the principles of the Church, but that he will tolerate the foundation of some type of congregation, which will not quite agree with the legal form, and yet be acceptable to the Government. Thus he would have saved the independence of the Church in its relations with the State, maintaining its right of organising itself as it likes, without a positive rebellion against civil authority.

Let us take an example. Instead of organising in every parish a worship association whose members would be enabled by the law to control the ecclesiastical authorities every year in the general assembly of all those who subscribe; each bishop might, for instance, create one single diocesan association with a few members only, e.g., only with the curates and the vicars of the diocese, the faithful people being admitted in the churches of the association as guests and not as members. So the bishop would be still more than before the master of all the curates.

All these solutions are, however, mere suppositions. We do not know what the Bishops will do. Probably they have received private instructions about it; the laymen have nothing else to do than to obey passively. But the question now is whether people will everywhere be as obedient as the Pope thinks. It seems to me very probable that the Pope and the Cardinals, nearly all foreigners, who had to decide what French citizens ought to do towards the legal Government of their country (!), intend to raise much trouble amongst the people by prohibiting the celebration of worship in all parishes where the Government will require the strict application of the law, and that they hope thus to force the State either to change the law or to tolerate associations which will not be entirely legal.

Troublesome prospects indeed! For in the actual situation of our political world it seems that a change of the law would probably make it more severe against the Church. The anti-clerical majority of the last elections is so enormous that a capitulation of the Government is not likely. But what will be the issue of such a struggle? The Roman Court thinks surely that after a few years the majority would be overpowered by the claims of religious people, and that is not impossible. On the other hand, however, the attitude of the arbitrary clerical power may hasten the disaffection towards the Church which has increased so strongly in the last years. In some parts of the country, for instance in Bourgogne, the majority of the population would accept easily the suppression of public worship; but in other provinces it would not be so.

The leaders of the Roman Church do not seem to dread the danger of a schismatical organisation, although the circumstances are very favourable for it. If the Roman Catholics refuse to found legal worship associations other Catholics may organise them and lay claim to the use of the churches and the succession of the actual parishes. A slight change of Article 4 of the Bill would make the organisation of such schismatical congregations very easy. If only two or three Bishops were consenting, we might have a Gallican Church in France like the Anglican Church in England. Our friend Paul Sabatier has pleaded with eloquence this cause of reform in the actual body of the Church. But I do not believe that there is faith enough amongst the liberal Catholics in France, a few highly cultivated men excepted, to make such a Church likely to live, at least now. Our people must go through a period of unreligion before a religious reform would be successful.

The present circumstances are very favourable for the extension of Protestantism. In some boroughs people will perhaps organise a Protestant "association cultuelle," if the Bishop suppresses the Catholic cult; but I do not think that a general movement of that kind is near, and Protestantism itself in France is not actually fit for the broad propaganda which would be necessary, as it is weakened by its internal divisions. The readers of this paper know already about them; let me add some new points to my former letters.

The expectation of the Central Party that the orthodox group might enlarge its spirit, moderate the oppressive power of its board (commission permanente), leave to the local congregations a larger financial, ecclesiastical, and especially dogmatic independence, has not been realised. The Synod held at Montpellier in June (which must not be confounded with the Liberal Assemblée de Montpellier, which came together in November, 1905, and about which I have written in former letters), has enjoined the subscription of the confession of faith to all ministers, and ordered its insertion in the statutes of all worship associations, refusing to admit equivalent forms. Financial pressure was also put upon the delegates of poor churches by some of the very orthodox rich subscribers.

The result of this authoritative policy was that a part of the churches which are adherents of the Centre resolved to free themselves from obedience to the Synod. Most of them, however, do not wish to live without bonds with other churches. The natural issue for them would have been to enter into the organisation of the United Reformed Churches (Eglises réformées unies), which has been established by the Liberal Protestants to secure the independence of the local congregations in a body of non-subscribers. But that seemed too bold to the men of the Centre. They could not bear the idea that they were going over to those Liberals, whom it is a tradition to hold for unbelievers, just as in England many Presbyterians or Congregationalists, or even members of the Church of England, who hold Unitarian beliefs, would vehemently refuse to become members of a Unitarian conference.

Thus, the Consistoire of Jarnac, in the south-west of France, assumed the task of calling together for October 11 delegates of all the churches which agree with the principles of that church, principles which are expressed in these words:—"Confessing Jesus Christ, only Son of God, who by his holy life, his teaching, his work, his death on the cross, his resurrection and by his present and eternal action procures salvation to men, and enables them to realise, with help of the Spirit, and by means of a fraternal church, the prophetic and evangelical ideal of the Kingdom of God; applying the Protestant and scientific method of free inquiry, aiming at the union of the Reformed Churches in France, &c." This declaration is very like that which was unanimously accepted by the Liberal Assembly of Montpellier; the only difference of any importance is the mention of the resurrection, whilst the Liberals avoided that word and spoke of the victory of Christ over death.

A part of the Centre has thus done too late what they ought to have done six months ago, calling together an assembly of all those who wish to maintain union between the reformed churches in France. We hope that much good will result from that enterprise. For the moment, however, the first result has been that the movement of organisation of the United Reformed Churches which was taken in hand by the Liberals, has been paralysed. Except in the Cevennes, and in the south-east at Nîmes, where Liberal synods were held with success, in the other parts of the country our friends are waiting the decisions to be taken at Jarnac, where most of them will surely send delegates.

If the Assembly of Jarnac really establishes a Union of Reformed Churches, including the Liberal congregations, there will be no harm, for it is indifferent whether the Centre goes over to the Liberals or the Liberals to the Centre, if the result is the same. But if the Centre at Jarnac is not high-hearted enough to accept the co-operation of the Liberals then the only consequence of its opposition to the orthodox synod will be the creation of a third group of churches, and we shall have the paradoxical conclusion that the most active partisans of union between the churches will provoke one division more amongst the Protestants in France, and that the friends of freedom in the churches will have weakened the Liberal group, which has so long represented the cause of freedom.

JEAN RÉVILLE.

A CUP AT LIESTAL.

WHAT was the name, I wonder, of that inspired silversmith who worked for Charles the Bold? Was he a Lombard, or a Tuscan, or did they breed such men then in Burgundy? We might be able to find out if Charles's household accounts are still to be seen, in Dijon perhaps, like the accounts of Philip le Bel in the Library of Geneva University. But the Prince who took nearly all his portable wealth into the field, and lost it at Grandson, strikes one as the sort of person who does not keep accounts. Great artists were not scarce in those days, the days of Lorenzo the Magnificent. Lippo and his pupil Sandro were both alive, the mighty Lionardo too; and Michael Angelo himself was just beginning to take notice, and say "ba-bagoo," when this cup was taken at Nancy. Was its maker accounted among the fine craftsmen? Or was he just a capable workman, one among a crowd, in an age when genius was cheap?

However it may be, he was a greater man than his princely patron. And yet this Charles of Burgundy was a great man too. I was never sure of it before, for his achievements as a leader and an encroaching vassal are such as any good football captain, born in his place, could have emulated. But here he is, portrayed in silver, look at him. I should know him among ten million; but that again is not much. I know him very well by sight already, ever since I saw his picture in the centre of the silken banner which the men of Soloturn carried off from Grandson. They keep it in their wonderful arsenal, where all the armour of all the ages, down to the rifles, blue uniforms and equipment of the twentieth century federal militia, seemed to be stored. The ages are at home in Soloturn. Outside Italy there is no western town, except Trèves, with an older history. It says so itself in decent Latin on its fifth century Burgundian tower, and the exception so generously conceded may be allowed to prove the rule. And in that same arsenal, close to Charles's tent—which is partly original, partly restored—stands a marvellous waxwork group, such as would have given Madame Tussaud, not to mention any silversmith, a nightmare; but it has its own grandeur, for it records a great sin and a fine repentance, and tells every Switzer, from Graubünden to Geneva, that the whole Swiss country is his fatherland.

Four years after Charles the Bold had lost wealth, courage and life (Gut, Mut und Blut) at Grandson, Murten, and Nancy, the confederates and their allies quarrelled about the distribution of the booty. (They had no time for quarrel until then, for after beating the Duke of Burgundy they had to beat the Duke of Milan.) They met at Stans to have it out with one another, and kept their tempers so ill that they were on the point of breaking up the council, and settling matters with the sword. The local parson did his best to pour holy oil on the troubled waters, but in vain. "Stung with the splendour of a sudden thought" he hid him to the cell of a venerable hermit, Niklaus von der Flüe, who came with his guide into the chamber just as the fiery delegates were leaping up to fling forth and sound the tocsin. The mild old man spoke, calmed his fiery countrymen, and led them to make a general treaty of peace and mutual aid, to share the booty without blows, and to admit Freiburg and Soloturn into their federation. So the tent which was found standing after Nancy came to Soloturn, and the cup which was found in it came here to Liestal.

I knew Charles's face already; but in the embossed centre of this cup, a patch not much larger than a penny postage stamp, I see his soul. Here is the man whose fine intellect was the slave of his will, whose will was an ever urgent ambition. Here is the prince who encroached so successfully, and yet so vainly, against the reptile Louis, and the bull-like burghers of Ghent, and the distracted emperor. I can see him carrying to Trier the royal crown which he was never to wear; raging with impatience before the gates of Neuss, and yet persisting against all reason in that futile siege. I understand how he persuaded himself that his own appearance at Calais would console our warlike Edward for the absence of the promised army. I know why he loved to see his own face at the bottom of every draught of his own vintage. I know, but I cannot tell you. You must go to Liestal and look at the work of this old world silversmith. But so much I can tell you—Charles's immense egoism was not all ignoble. He and his cause were one, La Bourgogne c'est moi. It was not the mean selfishness of a single man, but the glory of a great principality which drove him to ruin. This bold, bad man, had an element in common with Saul of Tarsus.

Still I stand to it, he was not so great a man as the silversmith who, with less stuff than goes to a florin, reveals all this. And the work of the greater man has lasted longer. Charles aimed at a kingdom; he worked with armies on square leagues, county upon county, of plain, forest, and vine-clad hill. But where is Burgundy now? Who among you can trace its ancient bounds? It is, of all things most hateful to its ambitious Duke, a mere anonymous district of France. The other man worked with his little tools on eighteen-penn'orth of silver, and here is his work—the countenance and character of Charles the Bold. And if Charles had succeeded? Still the craftsman were the mightier man. To tell the subtle truth beautifully is much harder than by battle and intrigue, blows and lies, to found a dynasty.

When you visit Liestal —. But first let me ask why you never do visit Liestal. You go straight through by a quick train to Luzern, Bern, or Zürich, and very few of you spare even a sight-seeing day in Basel, much less linger in that fine old city, and explore its delightful neighbourhood. Have you ever heard of the Council of Basel? or of Erasmus and his Greek Testament? or of the baptism of Jerome Froben, and his work? The antiquities, the museums, the gallery, the library of Basel are well worth your lingering. And you should visit Mariastein, where the child fell from the cliff, and was found safe in the Virgin's lap, and Säckingen, with its cat and trumpeter, and Basel Augst, with its splendid Roman theatre, and should walk through the lovely woodland by the side of the Rhine, and amid the smiling hills, with their frowning castles, to Liestal.

Liestal itself is a curiosity. It is a quiet little town, almost a village, is the capital of a state. Basel-land has its own laws and lawmakers, its own police, its own dialect. Within the memory of many still living, in the reign of William IV., there was war between Basel-land and Basel-city. Go to the Rathhaus, upstairs into the old justice-room, and ponder the dates and mottoes inscribed on its walls. When you understand them you will know more history, and realise what history is much more vividly than you do now. Then ask to see the cup, and you will be taken into the little office of the chief of police, who will take it out of his book-safe and give it into your hands.

When you visit Liestal, I say, you will observe that Charles the Bold was a generous drinker. A shallow dish, rather than a cup, shaped like the bowl of a champagne glass, rests on a broad, firm pedestal. It is more suggestive of a sparkling than a still wine: did he drink the sparkling Burgundy which we know to-day? It is a precious liquor, and I know of one last will and testament where this particular wine, apart from the rest, was made a special legacy. But it is sweet; and Charles—you have him now before your eyes—was a connoisseur, you perceive, in all such matters. I take it he drank the dry vintages which were also to be found in his duchy, though the coveted county of Champagne was never to be his; wine of Burgundy, I feel sure, and sparkling wine, was his tippie. And when he had honoured his toast, he saw this face, his own, strong and beautiful, resolute, and fine, the face of a tyrant, a saint, an artist, as fate might rule, but never of a sneak or a nobody. He tossed off his last bumper from this cup just before the fight began at Nancy, and looked into the cup as into a mirror. Two days later, that face was found, foul and discoloured, in a marsh, by his victorious foes. And here is the cup in the little capital of a Swiss canton, telling its thrilling tale, and asking its unanswerable questions.

E. W. LUMMIS.

SOCIAL REFORMERS.

I.—THOMAS CARLYLE.

IN a few short papers (arising out of a course of lectures on "The Prophets") I wish to bring to mind some of the more memorable social remedies proposed by "latter-day prophets." I must forego in this place the study of the principles advocated by that remarkable group of men who prophesied to the ancient Hebrews no less on social reform than on theology. It must be sufficient if we open our eyes to the fact that men speaking "with authority" are as real a factor in our public life as they were in that of Israel. They may not be relatively as prominent, their "authority" may be questioned and frequently questionable, but in their degree these are the men who stir the minds of their fellows. They not only indicate a route; they set mankind marching. The briefest review of the words of such men, however familiar their words may be, may quicken us afresh, even where their proposals appear for any reason impracticable.

The writers whom I propose to consider are of extremely varied types. The historian appears in Thomas Carlyle, the speculative philosopher in Charles Fourier, the politician in Joseph Mazzini, the art lover in John Ruskin, and the novelist in Leo Tolstoy. In regard to all but one—Fourier—most readers will be prepared at once to assent to the statement that, while the reputation of these writers with the economists may be small, their influence upon the mass of men is great. They may not be school-experts, but they are recognised as "seers," and it is through their visions, and those of men like them, that a spirit of life stirs in the breast of the people. Fourier is probably the least known by those who will read these lines, and some who know a little about him may wonder that such a Saul should be reckoned among the prophets. I think a wider knowledge of his works, his temper, and his influence will amply justify his inclusion; but this point may be deferred till he comes specially under review.

We begin with Thomas Carlyle (1795 to 1881), who, whatever may be said of his prejudices, style, rough wit, and, above all, his inconsistencies, was indisputably among the foremost in his day in pleading the cause of the poor. Born a peasant, inured to the hardships of a life which during long years was scantily furnished if not absolutely penurious, he lived all his days close to the humbler strata of the community; and though his days ultimately brought him high tasks and brilliant company, he never forgot his first love, his sympathy with the crushed and wretched of the land. We need but recall the names of some of his books, later as well as earlier, to see how, in spite of his raids upon the often profitless realms of politics he had ever a passionate desire to set right, if it were possible, the gross wrongs that embitter the lives of masses of men.* His friend Emerson was certainly not an inhuman creature, but the prevailing moods of the two men in face of the social problem were as distant as well could be. The American, the rustic student, was content to scatter his seed-words and let them grow, and for the rest to repose on the healthful ways of a universe which he considered very sane. The Scotchman, domiciled on the frayed edge of our huge bewildering London, ached over the miseries of the slaving multitudes, so long dumb, but in his day, struggling pathetically to find voice. Men knew of this passion in his breast, and we read of one and another piously wending to Chelsea to get illumination for their work as helpers in social reconstruction. Whether they got light depended on a good many things—on the health of the great man, on their power to take him in his humour, and, not least, on what they conceived light to be. Sometimes, literally and figuratively, they found the place filled with smoke.

If we go unwarily to such a man's writings we may experience something like the same fate. How ruthless this man of pity can be! It is not that with face impassive he enunciates coldly the irreversible law that swerves not from its path for all men's entreaties and tears. Carlyle speaks much of the "Eternities," but never in the mood that accepts their arbitrament with placid resignation. He lends himself to his divinities, and when they take action it is with something of a stormful man's passion and purposes. In return strange forces seem to stream into him, and at times he sets aside the pleadings of philanthropy with a savage scorn! "Might is right," he declares. You protest the notion is immoral. He hurls a great laugh at you and calls you names. Such a prophet is very trying to his pupils; but I suspect that the "sons of the prophets" of old did not find their masters' words all honey.

Admitting all this and much more, preparing ourselves for much contradiction of some things that we have considered quite unquestionable, hardening our brows like a flint against the brow-beating we are sure to get; above all, considering that this man, great as he was, was like the rest of us in frailty and wilfulness—we find certain main drifts of judgment in Carlyle's voluminous speech on the subject of social reform. Most conspicuous is his decision that the old order had a root of good in it, a principle which the new order has been too ready to depreciate if not to forget. Formerly men belonged. The greater number were once an actual possession of the few; but the few also, however much they might abuse their privileges, stood in clearly recognised relationship of duty to the many. Feudalism had at last to go; no one saw the necessity more clearly than the writer of that famous prose-epic, The French Revolution. Yet feudalism, and its characteristic monarchy, had to go only because its spirit was already gone. The eighteenth century still saw its forms enduring, but the times cried out for realities. The new order was, as yet, little orderly in Carlyle's early days, and we must allow for the intensity of his youthful impressions when we observe that he hardly seems to give credit for the considerable advance made toward social reconstruction in the course of his long life. The pertinent consideration is whether this social reconstruction is on the right lines, whether it is anything like complete, and how its progress may be accelerated.

Carlyle regarded the spirit of democracy as nihilistic. To take the sceptre of government from puppet hands is assuredly good, but to place it in the hands of the unwise is not good. Mere "zero and vacuity" appeared to him to have thus far resulted from abolishing "the old arrangement of things." On this topic he said much, of which no little still remains true enough to be worth renewed attention in these days of extended franchise. But the main point is that the policy of Laissez faire (which he regards, I think wrongly, as the inevitable result of democracy) is an impossible one. His insistence on the duty owed from man to man throughout society is emphatic, and the emphasis is as much needed as ever; though I do not think a candid examination of the statute book would support the charge of inattention to the condition and wants of the population at large. Parliaments have not let things slide, by any means; instead of leaving things to drift they have passed numerous laws conferring on the state or the local community power to interfere considerably with the life, industrial, domestic, and personal of the citizens. Indeed the complaint is not infrequently heard that too much interference takes place, and that the free life of the citizen is perniciously curtailed. But Carlyle, I imagine, would rather go the full length of German regulation of the civic life than sympathise with those who rebel against our milder system.

Where Carlyle would probably differ from some sanguine contemporaries is in regard to the exaggerated influence supposed to reside in Acts of Parliament; and without accepting his flouts and gibes at our big "talking machine," and its noisy adjunct, the Press, we may usefully ask ourselves whether we, too, may not expect too much from statutes and direct too little attention to those who live under them. It is here that democracy has vast leeway to make up. The personal factor is still the heart of the problem, and at the moment, when a new Education Act is being laboriously manufactured, we may opportunely ask ourselves how much or little we, and the majority of our fellow-countrymen, really do for the culture of the nobler faculties of the children. We may supplement the inquiry with another: is there not sadly too much of the policy of Laissez faire in our dealings with the adult population, too little real devotion to their culture and personal development? In Carlyle's view the remedy for social wrongs lay in righting the individual members of society. Remember how he spoke of that horrid "quagmire of pauperism" which is little, if any, nearer being drained, apparently, now than when he died, a quarter of a century ago. "It vitally concerns all British citizens to abate pauperism, and never to rest till they have ended it. Pauperism is the general leakage through every point of the ship that is rotten. Were all men doing their duty, or seriously trying to do it, there would be no pauperism." Doubtless, on hearing again this last sentence, the lawyer in us, willing to justify himself, will ask, "And what is my duty?"

I suppose Carlyle's reply, apart from such picturesque additions as he might think fit to make, would embody his favourite maxim, "Do the thing that lies nearest to hand," and it may be confidently assumed that if everyone did every day just what he has engaged to do, be he sweep or Poor Law Guardian, bricklayer, merchant, plumber, or preacher, there would be an immediate accession of vast dimensions to the well-being and satisfaction of all mankind. But our prophet, besides such general instructions, has his specific proposals to offer.

Drill your soldiers, of course; but drill also your workers. The battlefield is won by disciplined units who contribute with more or less understanding towards the desired achievement. Can the victories of peace possibly be won by a mob of undisciplined irregulars, who at best, recognise no esprit de corps, and at worst are actually warring upon one another? These and similar considerations were repeatedly pressed by Carlyle upon his contemporaries; and though he specially insisted on the necessity of first finding the "able man"—a discovery not easy—and then obeying him, I think his influence has greatly aided in promoting the spirit of trades-unionism, which at least aims at abolishing chaos in the industrial world. There are, doubtless, points open to criticism in trades-unionism. In the absence of the heaven-sent "able man" the common rank and file have had to get along as best they could, and many a mistake has been made in the process. The liberty of the worker has been limited injuriously at times, the interests of the community, as a whole, have suffered now and then in the pursuit of advantage by a section. Much progress has yet to be made in the direction of getting an intelligent grip of the facts of the business world, and of differentiating the highly skilled worker from the half competent. Nevertheless, when all allowances have been made, the benefits produced by the spread of this principle of combination have been indisputably great. Labour has largely organised itself, as capital has done; the next great step is the organisation of the two as vitally useful to each other. Meanwhile, who can doubt that the evils of "sweating" are due in great measure to the absence of the protection afforded to individual workers by mutual understanding and support? The difficulty of enrolling the "sweatable" in any adequate union is very great; but the successes achieved in the higher ranks of labour forbid despair even in regard to this. Carlyle's "able men," the Messiahs who shall bring deliverance to these wretched captives in our midst, are still awaited. Will they never come?

In Carlyle's day there was much talk of emigration, and he frequently recommended it as a remedy for present evils. Here again a clear success has been attained, so far as regards many of the emigrants. There is still room beyond sea for willing workers, and there is still need to facilitate migration from our crowded areas to the healthier fields afar. Yet one cannot resist an uneasy feeling that the remedy of emigration is, at best, a partial one. Good as a temporary relief from the pressure of congested population, excellent as affording a new life to those who are fit to embrace it, the policy of emigrating its children on any large scale must be fraught with great risks to a nation. Boatloads of vigorous young men and women put off from Queenstown every year; can this be regarded as good for Ireland? Does the condition of the common people there improve in consequence? Or must it not rather be the other way, as this annual draining away of their best goes on? From other countries in Europe, similar tides flow west. I shall not soon forget the great crowd of stalwart brown fellows whom I saw recently embarking at Naples for New York. Good for them, we trust; good for the great land they are going to; but how about Italy? Is not the policy of emigration very like a confession of social despair? Are we really to admit that in countries like ours, possessing enormous resources of wealth, both in money, and in national material—roads, harbours, means of transport, and the like—it is impossible to do at least as well for our sons and daughters as in lands where the inheritance from the labours of past ages is far less than ours, if it be not, indeed, entirely lacking?

It is not so much my task, however, to criticise, as to state the opinions of the great men I have named. "Carlyle," it has been said, "is a revolutionist at heart, but he is not an anarchist." His fervid denunciations of class-selfishness, of time-serving officialism, and not least of a spiritually bankrupt Church, still find their echo in many a disciple's heart, even where in the disciple's head there are doubts respecting his master's Cæsarism. If only the great heavens would send the infallible leader, the true prince of men, that we might follow him! But the heavens seem to bid us grope our own way for the most part, with such broken lights to guide us as we can find.

ALL force behind the changes of the world is One, whether it assumes the mask of this or that order of phenomena.—James Martineau.

THE essence of all vulgarity lies in want of sensation. Simple and innocent vulgarity is merely an untrained and undeveloped bluntness of body and mind; but in true inbred vulgarity there is a dreadful callousness, which, in extremity, becomes capable of every sort of bestial habit and crime, without fear, without pleasure, without horror, and without pity. It is in the blunt hand and the dead heart, in the diseased habit, in the hardened conscience, that men become vulgar; they are for ever vulgar precisely in proportion as they are incapable of sympathy, of quick understanding, of all that, in deep insistence on the common but most accurate term, may be called the "tact" or "touch-faculty" of body and soul.—John Ruskin.

MUSINGS.

By A MINISTER.

XLIV.

WHY does not someone write for boys the Romance of the Five Codices? It would be a true story of treasure-finding, hardly less thrilling than the tales of search for imaginary gold which now absorb them. By the Five Codices I mean, of course, the five great manuscripts of the New Testament, or of portions thereof, the carefully guarded prizes of as many cities—London and Cambridge, Rome, Paris, and St. Petersburg.

Codex A would come first—by courtesy. Well do I remember, myself a boy, hearing one of my elders say that he had just been examining with a magnifying-glass a single letter in "the Alexandrian," in the British Museum. I know now that he must have gone on a bootless pilgrimage; like many another scholar before him, to scrutinise for himself the bar across the O in 1 Tim. iii. 16. Whether the little stroke was an old line retraced, or a daring insertion, was a question over which the anxious critic then held his breath. The Revisers, when their turn came, decided that the reading, in any case, rested on no sufficient ancient evidence—Codex A being now held to be less ancient than at least two other manuscripts. How the precious volumes travelled from Alexandria to Constantinople, and thence into the hands of Charles I. of England, and how they remained in the possession of our kings until the Royal Library was presented to the nation by George II.—all this the romancer would fittingly relate in his own more moving way.

The adventures of Codex B would not be less stirring. Did not Napoleon carry it off as a prize of war from the Vatican Library, and did it not remain in Paris till its restoration in 1815? And did not venturesome scholars make many attempts to examine it, now more jealously watched than ever? Is it not told how they were permitted to see but not to copy—their pockets searched, and no writing materials allowed—and how one eager student, suffered at last to collate certain passages, could not resist the temptation to transcribe twenty pages, and escaped with punishment slighter than he deserved? If Pio Nono had not intervened with friendly aid, would the fac-simile of 1868 ever have been given to the world? And what more fitting close could there be for this second chapter than the desperate encounter between Burgon and the defenders of Rome against Alexandria?

Next would come an account of the discovery of Codex C, and our writer would tell how some scattered vellum leaves of a Greek Bible were cleaned and used again by a scribe in the twelfth century for some writing which he had in hand, the old writing still showing itself in places; how the stray pages with their double burden wandered from the East to Italy, and were taken by Catherine de Medici to Paris, to find a resting-place at last in the National Library; how, at the close of the next century, attention was drawn to the underlying text, but how little could be done until the application of a chemical tincture in 1834 brought more of its secrets to light.

Then would be told the story of another fragment, Codex D. After the sack of Lyons by the Huguenots, Codex B came into the possession of Beza—Calvin's friend and fellow-worker—who presented it to the University of Cambridge, and by his name it is now known. Many are the battles that have been fought over its bold departures from the common text, the best known being the famous passage in the Third Gospel: "On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath Day, he said unto him, Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law." So may we say of boys playing cricket on Sunday, What a pity it is that they think they are doing wrong.

For closing excitement, what could be better than the finding of Codex Sinaiticus, the most complete, perhaps the oldest, of all? "It was in 1884," the tale might run, "that Constantine Tischendorf, visiting the library of the monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai, chanced to see in a basket some leaves of the oldest Greek writing he had ever beheld. They were leaves of a manuscript of the Old Testament set aside for lighting the stove, and no less than forty-three such leaves did the visitor succeed in rescuing. In vain he asked for more, but fifteen years later, visiting the monastery again, and this time under the special protection of Alexander II. of Russia, a bundle of parchments wrapped in a cloth was, shortly before his departure, placed in his hands. He was allowed to keep it for one night, 'and that night it seemed sacrilege to sleep,' for there, spread out before him, was part of the Old Testament in the same writing, and the whole of the New. Before long, the monks were induced to present their priceless treasure to the great patron of their Church, and to entrust it to the safer keeping of the Imperial Library."

But, after all, a boy is a boy, and is happier, perhaps, with his buccaneers and cave-hidden hoards. Later on, he may understand how a man, possessed of all his senses, may yet rejoice over these poor relics "as one that findeth great spoil."

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. HUNTER AND THE ART OF PREACHING.

SIR,—All that is essentially related to the future welfare of our churches is a matter of concern to those of us who believe that they have a definite place in the development of the religious life of the country. Every arrangement which tends towards efficiency in attaining that end, however foreign it may be to normal methods, must always command our gratitude. Notoriously we are conservative, and, to no small extent, therefore unprogressive. Consequently, the disposition of those of us who are keenly anxious to see possible opportunities of service turned to the best account; is to welcome the manifestation of a spirit which cares much more for effectiveness than for tradition. The recent appointment of Dr. John Hunter as special Lecturer and Preacher at Manchester College is a distinct departure from custom. So far it exhibits an attitude of mind in those responsible for the conduct of the College, which gives us a pleasant sense that they are in earnest in the endeavour to equip students for the increasingly difficult work of the ministry as thoroughly as possible. Any question which arises is not on the general principle, but on the particular appointment. Is Dr. Hunter a man from whom such help is obtainable as is not being derived from the ordinary College staff, and will it have an appreciable influence in forwarding the main idea of the College? In my mind, he emphatically is not, and the appointment demands criticism and deserves censure.

We have many of us had opportunities of forming an impression of Dr. Hunter. There seems to have been a deliberate and not unsuccessful attempt to draw him into and attach him as closely as may be with our movement. Why, it is extremely difficult to see. Still, there is the fact. And, answering to our blandishments, Dr. Hunter appears to be very willing to turn us to account without identifying himself whole-heartedly with us. Now what impression does he make? I write, of course, only for myself, and I write frankly.

(1) I suppose he has been appointed as a noteworthy—a few enthusiasts might say a great—preacher, holding liberal principles. It is a good thing that a theological college for the training of ministers begins to show signs of realising the quite fundamental importance of preaching, and is no longer content to relegate it to the place of least importance in the curriculum. Apart from the essentially commonplace and familiar matter of his preaching, so highly decorated as to make on some the impression of originality, and tinged with so much orthodoxy as to give it piquancy to many modern Unitarian ears, is Dr. Hunter in manner and method an exceptionally fine preacher? No doubt, to some he is, but for my part I am bound to say I consider the hundred-miles-an-hour declamatory reading of a rhetorical essay or rhapsody is not the way in which to appeal to the mind, move the conscience, or stir the hearts of men. I do not wish to attack Dr. Hunter, or to deny that he has done and is doing good service in the common cause, but only to challenge the wisdom of his appointment to a particular post.

(2) Those who have been present at a service conducted by Dr. Hunter will know that in the devotional part he is practically inaudible. Even the lessons are read to himself. This method, which is unique outside the church of Rome, may have in his mind justification on some uncommunicated principle. The impression which it makes on me is that he is deliberately saving his strength for the sermon. And I do most deliberately say that the clear, audible, reverent conduct of the devotional part of a service is as much of first-rate importance as the well-spoken message of the sermon. Indeed, it may often happen that when the sermon awakens no response in the hearer's mind, he may have been deeply moved, raised on to the higher planes of thought and feeling by lesson and prayer. To add to our conspicuous failures in the conduct of public worship this of inaudibility would constitute no very obvious claim for gratitude on the part of the churches to Dr. Hunter.

(3) No small or unimportant part of a minister's life is spent, or should be, in the realisation of those exceptional opportunities of intimate friendship which make him, in a peculiar sense, one with his people, enable him to appreciate, interpret, and direct himself to the satisfaction of their deepest needs. On this point I write under correction, but, my impression is that Dr. Hunter has been the preacher almost entirely and not the pastor. Now, I assert that any influence, in the college which tends to lead to the church being identified with the pulpit as a mere preaching place must be highly dangerous to young men whose ideas of what is rightly to be expected of a minister are in course of formation. In brief, although Dr. Hunter finds a not unimportant sphere for the exercise of his peculiar gifts, it seems to me that he has no special qualification whatever for the work to which he is now appointed, but, on the other hand, that he is disqualified in various ways. And that I am not by any means alone in this judgment I have good reason to know. Is it not well that those responsible should be told that, in the opinion of many who are sincerely concerned for the well-being of the College, they have made a grave blunder?—Yours, &c.,

THE VOYAGE OF MAELDUNE.

FROM TENNYSON.

[This is the story of the man who sailed the seas to slay his enemy but found a friend instead.]

MAELDUNE was the chief of an island of the west called the Isle of Finn. The day before he was born his father was slain in single combat by the Chief of a rival clan, who also lived on an island some distance away. Thus fatherless from his birth Maeldune grew up with a feeling that was cherished by all around him, that a great wrong had been done to him which could never be repaired; and as he heard men tell and tell again of all the valiant deeds of his father, and how the young men honoured him in peace and followed him in battle, his heart burned within him and he vowed that he would kill the man who had killed his father. Every year that passed served only to strengthen his bitter resolve, and when at last he reached manhood, and was himself made the chieftain, he called his men together and sailed to satisfy his revenge.

They soon reached the isle where dwelt the man he sought. It happened that as the ship approached he was standing on the beach, but just as Maeldune, sword in hand, was about to leap ashore, a sudden violent gale swept the vessel out to sea. Like Ulysses at the mercy of the winds that drove him astray, the ship of Maeldune was driven along until she reached the Silent Isle.

In this strange place there was no sound of any kind. The waves as they broke on the shore, the brooks rippling over the gravel, even the waterfalls tumbling from the mountain tops made no sound whatever.

The pine trees uttered not a whisper, and the lark quivered high overhead without a song; "and the cock couldn't crow, and the bull couldn't low, and the dog couldn't bark." Wherever the seafarers wandered it was all as still as death, and worst of all they lost their own voices which grew thinner and fainter until they were no louder than the squeak of a bat. This so dismayed those strong men who were wont to raise their voices above the din of battle that with anger they left the shore and came presently to the Isle of Shouting.

But this was worse than the other, for on the top of the cliffs sat a score of grim birds which shouted, once every hour, with such awful human voices that the ox fell dead at the plough, and the corn withered in the field, and the roofs of houses fell in, and the houses burst into flame; and Maeldune's men were infected by the mad spell, and they shouted at one another till they lost all reason and began to fight and slay, and it was all that their leader could do to draw them off, some wounded, some left dead.

Very different was the Isle of Flowers which they next reached, guided by the breath of millions of roses carried far out to sea. As they drew near it seemed as though over the whole island, from summit to water-line, the clouds had been raining gems, topaz and sapphire and ruby, so did every inch of hillside and valley glitter with flowers. Passion flower, clematis, and convolvulus climbed up the cliffs, and the snow on the mountain tops was the snow of the hosts of lilies. Then Maeldune and his fellows landed and sang with great delight as they waded through the flowers, and in their glee rolled in the fields of crocus until they were yellow with pollen dust from head to foot; and the pollen in the air they breathed dried their throats and made them very thirsty, but there was no fruit of any kind with which to slake their thirst. So in disgust they tore up the flowers by handfuls and sailed to the Isle of Fruits. But alas! the juice of the fruits with which the island was laden was like wine, and it inflamed the tempers of the men until they quarrelled and fought, and had to be summoned back to the ship and reminded of the purpose with which they had left their homes, and which still remained unrealised. So next they passed by the Isle of Fire, which quaked with volcanic tremors and shot up crimson flames for miles into the sky, until they seemed to touch the stars. Then, some of the crew, maddened with excitement and the poisonous fruits, leaped into the fire, and the rest sailed away until they passed over a wonderful Undersea Isle, down upon which they gazed through the water that was clearer than air, and it appeared like a City in Paradise. There were massive towers and stately palaces, and round about stretched sweet quiet fields, so still and beautiful that it seemed as if they were asleep; and with the charm of it certain of the men were so overcome that they forgot that it was all under the water, and plunging in were drowned.

Then the stream of the sea and the wind that urged their sails brought the vessel of Maeldune to the Bounteous Isle, where everything that heart could wish for lay around them. Day by day at dawn a shining hand was extended from the cloud above and placed at the side of every man food enough for the day, so that no one needed to work, but sat idly gazing at the waves and listening to the gurgling springs and singing songs, until for very weariness of indolence they needs must play; but the play grew rough and boisterous, for they played at battle, and at last were fighting in earnest when Maeldune called them away.

And they sailed to the Isle of Witches, who were like the Syrens whom Ulysses saw and heard, who would have lured them to destruction had they not turned the helm about and hastened in another direction, which brought them in an evil hour to the Isle of the Double Towers; and this name it had received because on it were two towers, one of which was built of smooth stone, but the stonework of the other was carved all over with flowers. Now the earth was always moving beneath them as in an earthquake, and this made them knock violently against each other, while their bells clashed and boomed discordantly, and the frightened jackdaws flew screaming from their nests in the crannies. Then Maeldune's men took sides and fought against each other, half of them for one tower and half for the other; and while they fought till many were slain the thunder pealed over them in wrath all the day.

And then all that were left went back to the ship and hoisted the sail, and the salt stream in the sea carried them to the Isle of an Aged Saint. Many years had he lived there, and very old was he. His voice was low and gentle, and his eyes were sweet, and his long white hair and snowy beard reached to the ground. And he spake, and said: "O Maeldune, forsake this evil purpose of thine; leave the reward of sin to God. For how many generations has this fatal feud been kept up between the two clans?"

"His fathers have slain thy fathers in war or in single strife, Thy fathers have slain his fathers, each taken a life for a life; Thy father had slain his father—how long shall the murder last? Go back to the Isle of Finn and suffer the Past to be Past."

Then the men and their chief all kissed the fringe of the old saint's beard, as they knelt reverently before him, and he prayed with them and forgave them and blessed them, for a new heart had come to Maeldune; but this he himself knew not until he had left the Isle of the Saint and had come in sight of the isle of his foe from which he had been driven by the wind; and there stood the man who had slain his father. And the wind ceased to blow and the current to flow, and there was nothing to hinder Maeldune from landing and slaying the man—but he would not. Instead thereof he forgave him and departed, weary of his fruitless travels and all the shame and strife of them; and when, at last, with only a tenth of his men, he reached his own island he knew that the good and beautiful things of the world can only be fully enjoyed by those whose hearts are gentle and clean, and that to the heart that is full of wrath Paradise itself becomes a place of folly and a mountain of strife.

SOCIAL SERVICE.

WE have before us the CONSTITUTION OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE, the objects of which, as defined by its third rule, are "specified in the resolution approved by the meeting of the National Conference on Wednesday, April 18, 1906, viz. :—(1) Careful study of the social problems of modern civilisation ; (2) The undertaking of definite practical work towards their solution." Readers of the INQUIRER, as well as all those who visited Oxford last April, will not need to be reminded that exactly these problems of modern civilisation occupied the most prominent place in the discussions of the Triennial Conference. But the movement out of which the present Union has sprung has no official connection with the Conference. It presents its credentials as an independent association, and this fact seems to us not without significance. It indicates in brief the strong working of a tide of thought in our midst on the power of which individuals are borne to a single port. The thought of the Conference and the thought of the Union are superficially independent of one another, but they become one as being expressions of a single larger aim. Neither lays claim to any originality. On the contrary, their strength consists in ranging itself with social forces outside our own little societies. The stimulus to the enterprise was first given by those churchmen who founded the Christian Social Union, which has already its compeers in many of the Nonconformist Churches as well as in the religious Society of Friends. All these have their Unions, and one at least of them bears the comprehensive title of Sociological Society.

Now, mention of sociology reminds us that the movement in the Churches is part of and was preceded by a movement outside their borders. The societies we have mentioned, and many similar associations, may all be brought into a single view as expressions of the one immense thought which has modified so profoundly all our social theories. The idea is described in Professor Dicey's recent "Law and Public Opinion" as the growth of collectivism. We may, indeed, go further, and say that it is the emergence of the belief in society as itself a spiritual reality of the nature of an organism. Individual men and women are members of a community, and as such are more inextricably, more intimately bound each to each and dependent one on the other than the separate members and organs of the human body. This close-knit dependence of man on his fellows carries with it a growing consciousness of social responsibility. The body politic is afflicted with many and serious, even, it sometimes seems, with fatal ills. The sociologist investigates social causes and effects to discover, if may be, the impersonal conditions of national well-being. The social reformer is learning that deep underlying all personal defects which return in shapes of distress on the head of the sinner there are general causes in the nature of the industrial organisation which perpetuate and embitter poverty. Reformer and student alike recognise the arduous task which lies before them if these social problems of modern civilisation are to be solved, and the nation is to front the future with confidence and power.

Society requires what the churches ought to be able to give, requires what the religious spirit alone can contribute. Reform is necessary and sociological study is indispensable, but prophetic fervour and spiritual insight must be the channel by which the beam of celestial light shall enlighten our darkness. Can the new movement which suggests these thoughts, or can any other of the associations within the churches exert this highest sociological force? The world has felt its need of spiritual power if it is to deal drastically and thoroughly even with a housing question! In response to that demand of the spirit of the age numerous associations have sprung up within the churches, and they in their turn offer a challenge to the churches themselves. The service asked for is seemingly a simple and unpractical one. Nevertheless, the study which is demanded is the inevitable preparation for the ultimate endeavour to remove even those causes of physical or spiritual destitution which are due to the environment in which men live. Prophecy is not a substitute for knowledge, but an interpretation.

Since, then, the National Conference Union is seen to be in the line of social advance we welcome its appearance with a cordial greeting, and trust that its aims may be increasingly realised among us. If we are to offer any advice it will be to concentrate its energies on the social problem as a whole and not to be too easily allured by mere philanthropic activities for the alleviation of this or that particular symptom of disease. The task of the present day is threefold, and the cure is logically the latest phase. By that, of course, it must not be supposed that remedial action should wait until we can initiate the millennium by a stroke of the pen, for that time will never come. The social reconstruction to which men of all creeds and political parties are alike looking forward cannot be other than gradual. But if the conception of society as itself a reality and a living whole is true at all, it certainly implies that the action needed for reform must be the considered action of the nation itself acting through the State as its instrument. So far as the individual acts, and in the last resort there is no action except through individuals, he must act not as philanthropist, and not as churchman, but as citizen. As this must be so in the nature of the case, the work which lies before the union for social service is chiefly described in the first of its objects.

We are tempted to consider how far the Union or the Churches can advance along the first method of the three to which we have referred, in the direction, that is to say, of sociological investigation. The leaders of our churches cannot, as a rule, expect to be experts in social philosophy. To consider this subject further would resolve itself into the question of how far, or whether sociology should become a basis of ministerial study of co-ordinate importance with theology, and that is too wide-reaching a consideration at the present moment.

The remaining task, and the one to which the Union invites the churches is itself a large and important one. It is work to which the Church has throughout the ages devoted itself, not without success. Among the greatest of the preachers of Christendom was CHRYSOSTOM of Constantinople. Nothing is more characteristic of his work than the attempt to popularise the ethical knowledge and the moral ideals of his time, to illustrate them, and to enforce them by an appeal to the hearts of his hearers and the summons of religion and duty. This is work for the pulpit, for the Sunday-school, for the Young People's Guild. We want original thinkers, for social science is still in its infancy. But also there is a call for those who will zealously and patiently deal with the problems of modern society on the basis of what the original thinkers can teach us. All the questions which vex society to-day are economic and political questions, but they are also moral questions. They demand thought, and thought which must be followed by action, but above all they need to be pressed home again and again to the consciences of men. We are our brother's keepers, and that increasingly, as, with the growth of society, we become ever more dependent on one another. This is the thought which, sphinx-like, perplexes us to-day. We cannot dismiss it from our minds, even if we would.

And we would not. On the contrary, we believe that the very clearness of our conviction, painful though it often may be, is the voice of the God of the ages to the men of to-day. To those who possess this world's good^s or wisdom, and who have heard in the still low music of humanity the voice of the loftiest ideal, the task presents itself in irresistible authority of sharing the blessing of life in fraternal justice with those who are any way afflicted in mind, body, or estate. On this broad principle, it is possible to deal with all such special instances as those of unemployment, or of the living wage, or of education, or any of the innumerable other difficulties which defy but cannot ultimately defeat the advance of man.

This is the thought and this the difficult duty which the churches are asked to study and to consider, not as a thing of passing interest, but a matter of most vital moment to them as religious communities and to the nation at large. The gospel of JESUS is a social message, not one of lonely attainment, but of a life of brotherhood; that is also the aspiration which animates the hope of men to-day, and which MARTHEW ARNOLD has fixed on as the secret of his father's power:

"But thou would'st not alone
Be saved, my father! alone
Conquer and come to thy goal."

The proper work of a religious society as such is not to entrench on the functions of the State, not primarily to do the work of the sociologist, but rather to set before the minds and stamp into the hearts of its members the existence and the need of those in every town and countryside who in the midst of the abundance of wealth are so lacking in the means of livelihood that they are left without hope in the world.

PREBENDARY CARLILE of the Church Army is away from town on tour. He is willing to go anywhere to further the work of which he is the founder, and to assist the poor for whose uplifting the Army is in commission. It is necessary that the Church Army should have a fund of £100,000, because it proposes, within a twelvemonth's space to emigrate 20,000 people. It may do so; more probably it will have to be content with less than the number of sovereigns and emigrants. Nevertheless, many families will leave these shores, and, to judge from past experience, they will, when the chance comes, do well. But then, given the chance, they might have done well at home. Many of them, in fact, will be people who have not done by any means badly. The question of the unemployed is a perplexing one, and people are ready to jump at anything that sounds like a remedy, yet it is quite futile to expect to find this remedy in emigration. Past experiments have shown at least so much as that.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

THE company of great books always reminds me that the temple has its spacious outer courts as well as its inner shrine, and gives fresh pregnancy to the words: "thou art not far from the kingdom of heaven." There are some poets who may be called fitly, and in a special sense, religious. Dante moves among the great conceptions of mediæval theology, and he brings us at last into the presence of the Love, which moves the sun and the other stars. Milton accepts the Puritan theodicy of his time, and fills it with the splendours of his own imagination. Wordsworth interprets the Divine Presence in nature and his own soul, and his noblest verse is steeped in religious emotion. Shakespeare is not a religious poet in the sense in which Dante, Milton, and Wordsworth are religious poets. He belongs to the outer courts of the temple. He has no religious theory, either derived, or peculiar to himself. He leaves no impression on the mind, which can be called definitely religious. There is no reason to suppose that he was a very religious man, or that he was interested specially in religion. No breath from the eager religious disputes of his time reaches his pages. None of his characters are of a distinctly religious type; the Catholic saint and the Protestant devotee are both absent. None of them stand agaze into the mysteries of the Unseen, transfigured by the fervour of devotion. There are indeed occasional passages which have upon them the special marks of Christian romance, like the description of the death of Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, in "Richard II.":

"Many a time hath banish'd Norfolk fought For Jesu Christ in glorious Christian field,
Streaming the ensign of the Christian cross
Against black Pagans, Turks, and Saracens;
And, toil'd with works of war, retired himself
To Italy; and there, at Venice, gave His body to that pleasant country's earth,
And his pure soul unto his captain Christ,
Under whose colours he had fought so long."

But there is nothing here which has in it the note of personal confession or goes beyond the plain requirements of his art. A dramatist, who stood himself in his private belief quite outside the Christian faith, might have written thus. So true is all this that men have disputed whether Shakespeare was a Catholic or a Protestant, and it was possible for a recent critic to write an essay on "the absence of religion in Shakespeare" without running any risk of public censure or ridicule.

The truth is, as Professor Bradley has reminded us recently, "the Elizabethan drama was almost wholly secular; and while Shakespeare was writing he practically confined his view to the world of non-theological observation and thought, so that he represents it substantially in one and the same way, whether the story is Christian or pre-Christian.

He looked at this secular world most intently and seriously, and he painted it, we cannot but conclude, with entire fidelity, without the wish to enforce an opinion of his own, and, in essentials, without regard to anyone's hopes, fears, or beliefs." "Shakespeare," he says, elsewhere, "was not attempting to justify the ways of God to man, or to show the universe as a Divine Comedy." Of course, this is only another way of saying that he was dramatic to the finger-tips. The school of sentimental criticism goes astray fatally, when it tries to prove that it was his purpose to enforce certain lessons about human life and Divine love and justice. Shakespeare is never didactic. Even the great tragedies end with no theodicy or theory of restitution like the book of Job. The good and evil characters pass to where "beyond these voices there is peace," but no attempt is made to pluck aside the veil which shrouds the mystery. He was a humanist, and his work is the perfect flower of the movement of humanism, with its fresh, passionate interest in human life and all that befalls it, which began with the Renaissance. If his influence is of a kind that can be called moral or religious at all, the secret of it must not be sought either in the subjects of his plays or in any kind of direct teaching or personal belief. It is something indirect, a result unpremeditated and unforeseen. But many of the noblest influences come to us precisely in this way. They recall us to attitudes of mind, to channels of emotional experience, to the wider sympathies and to many aspects of human excellence, of which ordinary religious teaching takes little account. It is a pardonable straining of language if we apply the term religious—though perhaps spiritual would be a better word—to whatever enhances the dignity of life or renews for us the sacredness of the world.

Shakespeare was a humanist. He painted life as he saw it. He did not select certain types, which pleased him, and confine his attention to them. Nothing human came amiss to him. It is a motly crowd of people that moves across his stage; and he is not their critic nor their judge. With kindly humour he is interested in them all. Their characters are not refracted by his own mood of expectancy or gloom. They stand before us bright, vivid, real, in their habit as they lived. The consequence is that, leaving out of account for the moment the great passages of tragedy, an atmosphere of cheerfulness pervades his work, as of the sunshine and open air of a world in which there is much to enjoy. He banishes the winter of our discontent, and puts us in a good temper with life. Anyone who has this power of making us more keenly interested in the world, more generous and happy in our views of life, is a powerful ally of Christianity. Is there not in parts of the Gospels themselves an element of this Shakespearean good humour? It lies like a shaft of light across their matchless stories of human life, and helps to make them, apart from their deeper significance, the most simply beautiful writings in the world. But Shakespeare's gallery of portraits may do something more for us besides increasing our gaiety and good humour. It enlarges our knowledge of human life, and while it enlarges our knowledge, it enriches our sympathy. This is a service which the novelist is doing for us continually, but no one does it in so consummate a way as Shakespeare. As we turn his pages we are free of the liberties of the court, we feel the rush and excitement of battle, we find ourselves in the company of the subtle politician, the ambitious worldling, the gay lover, the country bumpkin, the motley fool. All types of men and women are there, and they are so presented to us that we understand them, why they feel and think and act just as they do. We are, most of us, very provincial in our views of life. Our standards, our judgments, and our sympathies are those of our class, our party, or our creed. Shakespeare gives us the franchise of the world. It is very near akin to Christian sympathy, that fundamental grace of the Gospel, this power of feeling with men quite not akin to ourselves in gifts and temperament, of entering into their hearts, and understanding the secret springs of their life; and with understanding come larger capacity for admiration, less disposition to judge, more tolerance of the infinite diversities among men.

But if Shakespeare is tolerant it is with a tolerance that is poles asunder from moral indifference. He never blurs the lines. He never asks us to admire what should be hateful. It is one of the discriminating sayings of Coleridge, that there is "no character in Shakespeare to which he has given a propensity to sneer or scoff or express contempt, but he has made that man a villain."

For his presentation of evil we must turn chiefly to the great tragedies. There we find it in its foulest and also in its most subtle forms—cruelty, lust, jealousy, rage, ingratitude, selfish ambition; and with them the flaws which mar the characters of the good and often involve them in the same tragic fate. All these Shakespeare found in the world, and, stern realist that he was, he put them all into his pictures of human life, extenuating nothing and yet setting down nought in malice. But to his clear gaze evil revealed itself as something more than a fact in the natural history of man. He saw it as a dark and hostile force in perpetual conflict with the good. When men treat with evil otherwise than as an enemy, when they try to make terms with it as a power to be coerced and used for their own ends, then it turns upon them to devastate and to destroy. This is the secret of the tragic element in human life, and it is the burden of Shakespearean tragedy. Macbeth, as soon as he yields to the temptation to compass his ambition by evil means, is caught in a fatal snare. We can watch the coarsening of his character, the disappearance of all manly and kingly qualities, the dark obsession of fear, till these are his last words, the unconscious verdict of the soul upon its own villany:

"It is a tale

Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, Signifying nothing."

The character of Lady Macbeth is drawn with the same close observation of moral facts. At first she is quite indifferent. She is not horrified at the murder of Duncan; she is only surprised that an old man should have so much blood in him. While her husband is haunted by strange spectres of the brain, she has recourse to her "facile realism." "What's done is done." "A little water clears us of this deed." But slowly the reality and power of evil are forced in upon the mind. Conscience awakens, not to remorse, but to terror. She cannot endure the darkness, and must have a light burning always by her. At last the moral fact grips her and strangles her: "What's done cannot be undone."

There is in Shakespeare an element of terrible impartiality in the treatment of this theme. The good and the evil, the cruel and the gentle share the same tragic fate. Evil is depicted in its progress and its wreck, as he sees it on the stage of the world. The rest is silence. In his later work, above all in the Tempest, there is a hint of the part which love plays as a spiritual force in human life, of its forgiveness and reconciliation and final victory. Even Caliban, in his low bestiality, is brought to a better mind:

"I'll be wise hereafter

And seek for grace."

Here, if anywhere, Shakespeare comes near to a Christian interpretation of life. But it is not wise to insist upon it, for even here he is still the sane observer of facts and not the preacher of a message. The significant fact is this, that the supreme humanist, who depicts things as they are with the closest approach to scientific faithfulness, represents evil not merely in its ugliness, but as something hateful and hostile, which the world is always trying to cast out and exterminate. We are at liberty to go beyond the dramatic point of view, and to inquire into the meaning of this fact. Underlying it for all who will think out the issue clearly is the spiritual truth, that the world means something, and that it means good. In whatever fashion we may interpret this ultimate meaning, at least it forbids us to be materialists. The transition is easy and natural from the moral facts, which Shakespeare sets down as he sees them, to their root in the righteousness of God. But the dramatist does not conduct us himself into these high regions of faith. He is a humanist to the last. He brings us to the place where the riddles of existence begin to crowd upon us, and there he surrenders us to a higher guide; even as Virgil leaves Dante at the threshold of Paradise: "Son . . . thou art come to a place where I, of myself, discern no further. Here have I brought thee with wit and art. . . . No more expect my word or sign."

It is this strict limit, imposed upon him by the conditions of his art, and probably by his own temperament, which makes it impossible to describe Shakespeare as a religious teacher in the ordinary meaning of the word. We do not go to him either for Christian doctrine or for the vision of God. There are ranges of spiritual experience which he does not attempt to explore. There are elementary needs of the human soul which nothing he has written can satisfy. But he will be numbered always among the chief helpers of mankind. When we consider the wealth of his achievement as a moral influence among men, how he has widened their horizon and enriched their sympathy, and confirmed them in the love of good; when we remember, too, how he brings us to the edge of life's dark mystery, and then, though he will be no longer our guide, leaves the way open for the teaching and vision of the Gospel, we can describe him most fitly as a prodigal dispenser of the bounty and joy of earth, who is not far from the kingdom of heaven. His place is among the forerunners, in the spacious outer courts of the temple.

FITCHETT'S WESLEY.*

THE purchaser of this book will find that he has got within a moderate compass and at a very moderate price a very excellent account of the life and work of John Wesley. The story is freshly told. Things that one had read before in Southey or Moore or Tyerman or elsewhere are still worth reading again in their new context. And the effect of the whole is to give the reader an intelligent and fairly adequate idea of Wesley, and of the origin of the Wesleyan Methodists. A certain buoyancy of style, closely connected as it is with the author's unfrightened frankness in telling his story, carries the reader along, keeps him active and alert, and ready to begin the next section as soon as this one is finished. It might justly be expected that in recording Wesley's spiritual experiences the author would treat them from the point of view of a Methodist theologian, and the reader will readily excuse, if not justify the extravagant estimate of Wesley which serves as an introduction to the whole work.

Again, so many of the facts are related as exceptional, so many of them do not seem incredible only because they are already well known, that the writer's undoubted tendency to use needless emphasis does not irritate, though it occasionally amuses the reader.

"It is no exaggeration to say that Wesley preached more sermons, rode more miles, printed more books, and influenced more lives than any other Englishman of his age, or perhaps, of any age. And the performance did not even tire him!"

But the work is not mainly made up of these easy generalisations. It is a study in Wesley. It is a courageous attempt to discover and to make known the secret of his strength, the limits of his power, the circumstances and characteristics that conspired to create his success. And hardly any reader will rise from the work without feeling his indebtedness to the writer's candour, good sense, and general trustiness.

The notice given of the parents of Wesley and of other members of the family should be well considered. The man who has had some experience of modern Wesleyan Methodism may be excused for thinking that the character of the connection is influenced not only by the traits it has inherited directly from John Wesley, but by the qualities and defects of the whole

* Wesley and his Century. By the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, B.A., LL.D., Smith, Elder & Co., 6s. net.

Wesley family. The father of Wesley with his intolerable self-importance, his majestic airs of superiority, his utter incapacity in practical matters, and his hard and unintelligent conduct towards the children who offended him; the mother of Wesley, energetic, optimistic, persevering, knowing everything about the management of children, except how to hold them in life and comfort them; Wesley's brother Charles, with just a touch of poetic genius in him, occasionally showing himself narrow, prejudiced, proud, but with a deep spiritual understanding that gave him power to translate the trembling incoherent experiences of awakened souls into verse that at one time breathed forth the impassioned language of prayer, and at another the rapturous expression of thankfulness, trust, and joy; these and the less-known members of the Wesley family seem to account for one and another characteristic of the Wesleyan people to this day. The Wesleys live again in the Wesleyans.

A considerable space in the volume is occupied with what one may call the philosophy of the Wesleyan Revival. John Wesley's conversion, his release or partial release from sacerdotalism and his evangelical reading of Christianity are made to account for a very great deal. It is very well to have all these matters set forth in detail that we may see them as Wesley himself saw them, as they appeared to his earliest followers, and as they are interpreted by a great many Wesleyans to-day.

But when Dr. Fitchett asks towards the end of his volume, "With what eyes would Wesley have looked upon a Rainbow Bible? How would he have dealt with all the new, fermenting unbeliefs, bred of science, or of half science?" he is reminding us that the Wesleyan reading of Christianity, important as it has been and is yet, is getting year by year to be less credible and less intelligible. An appeal to Wesley's experience is unanswerable, as long as that experience has its counterpart in the souls and lives of other men. But what if the time is coming, and is now close upon us when Wesley's reading of human nature, and his interpretation of the work of Christ, will seem as antiquated and inadequate as his reading of child nature and his scheme of child life seem to every intelligent man and woman now? That account of Kingswood School which is given under the heading "Wesley's Odd Opinions," may have more significance than the writer believed. Wesley drew up a time table for the children of Kingswood School, we are told, which was calculated to make them either lunatics or hypocrites. Very suggestive sentences are these—"As a matter of fact, Kingswood comes next to his own wife in the vexation it caused Wesley. Human nature was in quarrel with his dreadful time-table." In short, the Wesley doctrine at its earliest and best could not be applied to children. They were not the sort of beings Wesley supposed them to be. Can we wonder if by and by it should prove that the Wesleyan teaching was only temporarily and not eternally applicable to men?

Those whose investigations and inquiries are directed just to those problems that Wesley neglected, to child life, child nature, the development of the moral and mental life of the child, will be likely to arrive at very different estimates of grown men and women, of this world and the world to come, of God and Christ and Mankind from those that passed current with John Wesley.

That our age is defective enough in spiritual things, that our twentieth century has too much in common with the eighteenth century which in this book is represented in such unlovely colours may be regretfully acknowledged. A new Wesley is needed, doubtless. But not only his theology, and his scheme of salvation, his very inward experience will have to be different from that of his predecessor if he is to speak to the men of our day as Wesley spoke to those of his time. Meanwhile, this book, together with one or other of the abridged editions of Wesley's Journal, will give us an admirable and fairly adequate conception of Wesley and his work, of the time in which he lived, the doctrine he preached, of some few of his helpers and fellow workers, and of the astonishing success of his labours. The book is heartily commended.

STANDARDS OF CHURCH JUDGMENT.

In these days, in which society at large seems to go perpetually alternating between the two extremes of prying into its own manifold diseases, on the one side, and rushing to all manner of external stimulants, remedies, or palliatives on the other, and in which the Church, so far from teaching the world better, seems more and more prone to follow the world in its heedless ways, nothing can be more important than standards of judgment. I wish, therefore, to set down certain thoughts about these as they pertain to the Church rather than to the world, though I do not forget that they cannot well pertain to the one without more or less pertaining to the other. The rather close and direct observation and experience of years have led me to think that no churches in Christendom need a word of warning, of admonition, or of inspiration, on this far-reaching question more than do the churches of the Liberal Faith. Among these churches utterly false standards of judgment on ecclesiastical questions are getting more and more rife, while, within their borders, true standards tend more and more to be set aside by an over-busy officialism, or to be lost sight of by more or less confused and bewildered, not to say restless, congregations. Whoever, therefore, shall be able to say or do anything towards leading men and women away from the wrong and conducting them towards the right on these manifold questions, will deserve well of his kind, whether he gets what he deserves or not.

(1) Dealing with certain false church standards that are getting more and more self-assertive and self-contradictory in our ranks, I ask, by way of sample of what I mean, the attention of the readers of this paper to the utterly false standard of numbers in regard to our churches and Sunday-schools, which, of course, are inseparable. As a vivid, not to say painful, illustration of the significance of this utterly false standard of ecclesiastical measurement, I may be allowed to refer to the fact that I was, not very long since, present at a representative meeting of a certain section of our churches at which certain churches and Sunday-schools were being vivisectioned, and, in connection with which barbarous operation, one of the ministers present, with more or less direct reference to another, also present, ventured to say: "If I were the minister of a church which had a Sunday-school of only some twenty or thirty scholars, I should be ashamed of myself." There was, in the summary jurisdiction thus exercised, no reference whatever to the merits of the case in question, judged by far truer and higher standards, no question whatever as to the loyalty or the disloyalty to great principles and to daily duty on the part of the minister so assailed, nor as to whether or not he was better or worse than his assailant when tried by these truer and higher standards of Church life and work. The one fact fixed on was that the marked school was a smaller one than some others, a purely external and physical test being thus allowed, in the critic's mind, to decide the whole question of self-shame or of self-gratification. How any standard of measurement could be worse in itself or worse in its application I could not then, and cannot now, even so much as imagine. The minister thus falsely tested and falsely condemned could not, moreover, forget that, in the course of his ministerial life, he had, conjointly with others, been the minister of churches whose Sunday-schools numbered 350, 500, 600, or the like, and yet that not one of these larger schools had ever required half the amount of time and labour needed by the branded small school of 30 to 40. If the application of the false standard thus illustrated had been exceptional, it might well have passed; but it has, of late years, been exemplified so much and so often as to beg the whole question as between the small in bulk and the great in principle, which is vital to our churches. If ever anything was vital to them. The real point for all the ministers and members of our churches and Sunday-schools is not as to whether these are great or small but as to whether ministers, congregations, and school-managers, as a whole, are loyally and faithfully doing their whole duty in the light of the great principles for which they stand. No churches and no ministers whatever, of the Liberal Faith especially, have the smallest need to be ashamed of themselves because they are few in number, so long as they are true and loyal, while no mere bulk, or the counting of more heads than usual, can shield them from dishonour if they are not true and loyal. It is a further condemnation of the bad standard of measurement thus illustrated that, if it were applied, impartially all round, and if it were fully accepted, it would put to shame all our churches and all our ministers alike. Numbers, in churches and schools, as in all other things, are always relative and comparative; and so, whilst some of our churches and schools are small indeed, when compared with others of their own order, it is equally certain that the very largest of them dwindle into insignificance when compared with the numbers of the largest churches and schools in other denominations. Are, then, the adverse critics within our own ranks not only prepared thus to condemn brethren as able and as competent as themselves on an utterly false standard of measurement, but also to be quite as fully condemned in their own persons, by the same hopelessly bad test, the moment they compare themselves, their churches, and their Sunday-schools, not with the smaller churches and schools in their own ranks, but with the far larger churches and schools of Christendom as a whole? Their logic, or the want of it, leads straight to this question; while the question itself does but show what a miserable standard it is which they have thus adopted in part, and how its absolutely impartial adoption would but tend to prove what many persons have long asserted, that our churches and schools as a whole, are "a vanishing quantity," that they are "dying at the roots," or that "there is no hope for them," and that "while the work of their ministers is harder than that of the ministers of any other churches, it is also more utterly unfruitful." When critics are obliged thus to apply their own critical principles to themselves as well as to their fellows, it is high time for them to ask, very seriously indeed, whether they had not better look at once for some truer standard of church judgment.

(2) That there are some other equally false church standards of judgment in our Liberal Churches goes without saying, but, for lack of both time and space, I leave these and pass on to say a word or two on the true standards for our Liberal Churches, contenting myself with the treatment of one of these which seems to be just as typical on the right side as the external test of numbers is on the wrong side. I think I have already suggested, to all discerning readers of the paper, what the true central standard of judgment, for all our churches, schools, and ministers is, and must be. Loyalty, then, absolute loyalty to the great principles for which all our churches, schools, and ministers stand is the one supreme and sole word that here needs to be said and insisted on. No one, certainly no minister, in our ranks, should now need to be told what the great principles in question are. To me, at any rate, it gets clearer day by day that, if the central and essential principles of our churches and schools be not those of unreserved faithfulness to all human faculties and capacities on the one hand, and equally unreserved faithfulness to the leadings of the Spirit of the Living God on the other, then we have no locus standi in the religious world at all, no distinctive place to fill, and no distinctive work to do. It is by our several and collective loyalty to these essential principles that we must stand or fall, and I, for one, now as ever, must steadily decline either to be judged or to judge, in regard to our churches, schools, and ministers, by any other standard whatever. Of course, the more or less visible issues of such principles and of such loyalty thereto can never be matters of absolute indifference; but, in all such cases, as that of our churches more especially, woe be to the man or to the body of men who prove themselves so absorbed by the outward issue as not to be able to see the shining glory of the inward ideal, no matter what the passing church circumstances or the fleeting conditions of church life may happen to be.

We all want to grow, of course; but we should never forget that there is all the difference in the world between the growth of a Daniel Lambert and an Apostle Paul. With the one exception of the Master himself, there is no more magnificent personality in Christendom than that same "Paul, an Apostle of Jesus Christ"; but there was a time in his grand life when it was not exactly outward success that he had to boast of. If prayer be, as Coleridge characteristically said it was, "the mightiest energy of the human spirit," then it is equally true that all the spiritual energy I possess goes out in the prayer to God that all our churches, schools, and ministers might read, once again, and again after that, the piercing words of Paul, in which, writing of himself and his co-workers, he says, "Giving no offence in anything, that the ministry be not blamed; but in all things commending ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings"; and so on to "having nothing and yet possessing all things." Judged by these and the like grand words, Paul, in the light of transfiguring history, is himself transcendent; but tried, at the time, by any other than the most inner, the most spiritual, and the most divine standards, he must have been set down as a failure. Nay, indeed, it is equally certain that, judged by the merely outward issues of his birth, life, and death, even Jesus has not been a success. Only when judged by the spiritual and the ethical, and therefore by the divine and human in one, can Jesus and his religion be now vindicated in face of the civil, political, and social state of Christendom at this moment. Let those who will, then, insist upon it that we must have regard not only to the great principles for which we stand, but to their outward issues as well; but let no man fall into the huge blunder of looking more to the external than to the internal, to the transient rather than to the permanent.

(3) Reviewing all that has thus been said upon this great question of standards of church judgment, there can be no more doubt as to the lessons it teaches than as to the inner importance of the subject itself. No one can over-rate the significance of the fact that, while the outward test, for inward and spiritual things, is utterly bad in itself, it is absolutely fatal for the churches, the schools, and the ministers of the Liberal Faith. Nor, on the other hand, can anyone over-rate the significance of the rule that, while the test of absolute loyalty to great principles is essentially true in all cases, it is also the one test which we of the Liberal Faith should think of either for ourselves or for other people. The supreme lesson of lessons for all is the lesson which teaches us that we must, above all and beyond all, follow the inward light, and not be "disobedient to the heavenly vision."

W. MELLOR.

GATEWAYS TO THE SOUL.

I.—SENSE OF WARMTH.

IN a recent issue of the Hibbert Journal (January, 1906) in his article on "The Material Element in Christianity," Sir Oliver Lodge pleads for a recognition of the essential and indispensable use of the facts of nature and objects of sense in the development of the spiritual side of our being. Even if we are immortal spirits, the material vehicle furnished by our bodies is the necessary medium of manifestation, without which the world of matter could not be apprehended or have for us an effective existence. No vision, thought, or inspiration enters our present consciousness except through the brain. Our senses limit us, but, so far as they go, they tell us the truth.

If life has a meaning at all, we may reasonably suppose that our assuming an earthly body, our "logos becoming flesh," provided the best means of furthering our evolution. In that sense, the doctrine of the Incarnation is the central fact of Christianity and of every great religion. "In our flesh grows the branch of this life, in our soul it bears fruit." "All good things are ours; nor soul helps flesh more, than flesh helps soul." Such was Browning's view, urged in no spirit of paganism, but in full confidence that man was "a god though in the germ."

The tabernacle of flesh wherein we dwell, moves in a temple that holds a mightier Presence, who must be revealed as much as concealed in this material manifestation, seeing that without His indwelling life it could not be at all. Though a veil hide the inscrutable face, and we may gaze even upon the veiled mystery only through the bar of sense, some token of its meaning must be given in every flashing movement of its iridescent folds.

An effort will be made in these articles to deal with certain experiences of sense as avenues to the knowledge of God. Before treating of the specialised senses, it may be of interest to consider a "massive sensation" like warmth. I have ventured to connect this personal function with a cosmic function, which for lack of a better title may be termed "the glow of God."

The Breath of Winter.

If all terrestrial processes are reflections, symbols of the operation of cosmic energies, our summer and winter may shadow forth the giving and withdrawing of "that love, whose smile kindles the universe," the process of the creation and disintegration of a world.

To Northerners, the exercise of the sense of warmth is peculiarly grateful and comforting. Who has not felt on a chill morning in a badly-warmed church the inaptitude of the Oriental and essentially tropical image, "Thou art our shadow from the heat of life." Our eyes are hungering for light, our body is desolate for warmth. An icy blast from the North-east blows upon us, and under it we shrink and shrivel. It was here that Shakespeare found closest analogy to man's inhumanity—

"Blow, blow, thou winter-wind;
"Thou art not so unkind
"As man's ingratitude;
"Thy breath is not so keen,
"Because thou art not seen,
"Although thy breath be rude."

But when the rays of the sun beat upon us, and our face is fanned by a warm breeze from the south, we begin to bask, we grow expansive, we beam in response. Gratitude, affection, spring up easily and spontaneously.

Language and Experience.

These diverse human moods, engendered by a contrasted sense-experience, have registered themselves in the parables of our common tongue. Men speak of the cold glitter or the steely look of unsympathetic eyes. Intellectuality, divorced from emotion, is taken as indication of a "cold, calculating nature."

"If e'er when faith had fall'n asleep,

"I heard a voice, 'believe no more.'

"A warmth within the breast would melt

"The freezing reason's colder part;

"And like a man in wrath the heart

'Stood up and answered 'I have felt.'"

A trust in the higher things, a love of the unproven good belongs to the heart's warmth, and the man who embodies it is named "warm-hearted," "ardent," is seen to wear a "beaming" face, and to live the "radiant" life. Artistic discrimination makes use of similar terminology for the "warm tones" of a picture are contrasted approvingly with "cold tints."

A writer in the Book of Revelation in the "winter of his discontent," weary of the apathy and indifference of the Laodiceans, plunged into the familiar symbolism, "I would you were either hot or cold"; he would they gave their ardour, their enthusiasm to the cause, or opposed it with antagonism, negated it—but that callous "nothingarianism" was more than he could endure.

This symbolism we derive from the fact that we occupy a dwelling which has to be kept at a certain temperature, a certain luke-warm condition, that should vary little, though the environment change from the vigours of the coldest day in winter to the sultriness and oppressiveness of the hottest day in summer.

Whence our Warmth?

Yet our own warmth we do not make. The fuel of our combustion we take from the heavens. We borrow it in some form of bottled sunshine, whether from food or wood or coal. We cannot conceive of a more apt symbol of our utter dependence upon God who "holds moral relations with mankind" than this—all our life-energies are derived from the central star of our system—the sun. If the universe is a huge organism, in whose matrix the heavenly bodies are imbedded like so many organs, the sun is the heart of the solar system, and our earth one of the limbs that receives its vitality from that life-giving power. Detaching itself earliest (according to one version of the Nebular Theory) from the primitive space-filling Nebula, the sun became a focus which collected the divine energies and distributed them to the worlds that formed later. Were that fountain dried up, we would all become as the dead leaves that lie on the forest floor. All our energies, caloric, chemical, actinic, electric, vital, are derived from the sun. We feed and are nourished upon Solar rays. Heat is but a gross physical symbol of the life of God that sustains us.

Sun Worship.

There is sufficient reason why we turn, in spite of our scepticism, with lightened eyes and grateful heart to the sun; we retain something more than relics of ancient sun-worship; we enjoy the sense of present good, we feel the instant glow, there is an immediate response as the harp answers to the touch of a deft hand, as the eye straining for beauty kindles before a form of loveliness. In that glorious shekinah, to which so many eyes all the world over turn lovingly, lies a bond that unites diverse forms of religion—Zoroastrian and Christian, Hindu and Samoyede, Druid and Greek. Modern science has helped us to realise that in order to walk or talk, to work or play, in order that brain may respond to stimulus, or heart pump out oxygenated blood, the sun's strength must be drawn upon, the thews of Herakles must agonise. Those rays that come dancing across the abyss of space permeate and compass us from birth till death.

God is a Living Fire.

The sun is for us a materialisation of the Divine Radiance, an embodiment of the Divine Power, a focus of Divine energies—God in manifestation. And if we would seek a symbol of what God is in His unmanifested, unconditioned Being, if we would seek a physical counterpart of the Absolute, we must think of that shoreless vast of ether pervading interstellar space—the undifferentiated ether in which the worlds float as fish in the sea.

To describe it in the language of temperature, interstellar space is infinitely cold. It is at absolute zero. It is the dormant material out of which the worlds were made, quickened into existence, warmed into life. It is the vast quiet upon which the great breath was breathed, awakening it into motion and turning its passivity into activity. It is dead before the warm glow of divine love pulsates through it, starting spiral motion that built the atoms and clustered their families into wheeling orbs.

Imagine this cosmic warmth withdrawn! The whirl of worlds would stop, their massive bulk would be resolved back into the darkness and cold out of which they were moulded, and the infinite diversity of nature would fade into the indistinguishable, homogeneous, ether-sea, that can be neither felt nor heard nor seen.

Scientific Imagination and Experiment.

That the hypotheses of physicists which resolve the atoms that constitute matter into rings of force, or vortices of ether are not pure speculation, but intuitive glimpses into fact, is suggested by certain experiments. Though scientific theory regards the elements as various condensations of one primitive ether, chemists must of necessity deal with them as substances possessing permanent properties, distinguishing them one from the other. And these properties have been so carefully tabulated that the elements may be arranged in a scale one above the other as they exhibit the possession of more or less of these properties.

Yet it is found that when certain elements are submitted to extraordinarily low degrees of temperature, they lose these distinctive properties. They are frozen out. As lower and lower ranges of temperature are brought to bear upon these chemical elements, their internal properties disappear one by one; they are returning to a primitive condition whence they were derived. They are approaching the death whence they were warmed into life. Were the cold of interstellar space reached, matter as we know it would be destroyed; it would be resolved into the nothingness whence the glow of God awoke it to being.

Five Sense-Ethers.

Sense is response to etheric vibration: According to an ancient philosophy, the great breath acting upon the primitive matter of the universe, throws it into five states, having distinctive vibratory motions and performing different functions: In modern language, there are five kinds of ether. One affects us as sound, another as touch, a third as colour, a fourth as taste, a fifth as smell. A sense of warmth is a modification of the touch-sense, or responsiveness to stimulus from the tangiferous ether.

It is, of course, a sense relative to us: If we are warm, a less warm object feels cold. If a piece of flannel and a piece of steel be at the same temperature, the former will appear warmer by reason of more rapid radiation of heat from the latter. Passing one hand from cold water and the other from hot into lukewarm, it will appear hot to the former but cool to the latter. These are some of the illusions of sense. It shows that these experiences have to be continually corrected by the reason. The senses gather the experience, but the reason tabulates them. They are not sources of our knowledge, but gateways through which they enter. They tell us nothing; they simply allow action and reaction between the dweller in the palace of five gates and the world outside. It is the knower who knows, but it is through these doors the things to be known pass in.

Helen Keller.

So through this general sense of touch, out of which the special sense was modified, we are able to feel the glow of God's activity in the universe. We are reminded of the case of the girl, Helen Keller, deaf, and therefore dumb, and also blind—two of the widest gateways closed and sealed. Yet by the refined development of the sense of touch, communication was set up between the imprisoned soul and the world of men. When a good minister sought her out to tell her of the gracious Presence and the love of God, he found he had been anticipated. She already knew. He who is closer than breathing and nearer than hands and feet, had already been there. "I have felt Him like a great warmth," she told her teacher. Without vision of His wondrous world, without hearing of the wonderful symphonies in life's orchestra, she had not been shut out from the Presence. "I have felt Him as a great warmth."

We who both hear and see may have missed this token. But He is close at hand in food and fuel. He sits at table; He shadows the hearth; as you sit by the fire on a winter night, conversing with friends or dipping into the great treasures of master-minds, you are basking in a portion of the sunshine derived from Him who is "clothed with the sun." The glow of God percolates through you: Primeval forests gathered it ray by ray, caloric by caloric—that fire, that heat, that warmth, is God's smile for you: To find Him you need not go farther afield.

And it preaches on behalf of Him who sent it. "As ye have freely received, freely give." Down in the alley there is hunger and cold; there are pinched, wan faces and sullen hearts; will you not go? In return for the goodness of life, what better thing can we do than move kindly among our kind? For if we would reform the base, what more excellent way than that set forth in the old fable of the contest of wind and sun, to pull off a wayfarer's coat: The wind puffed in his face, twisted and tugged at him, tore at him, trundled him—but failed: The sun merely bathed him in his warmth, and of his own accord the wayfarer doffed his coat. There is the everlasting parable of the conquering force of gentleness: There is the final condemnation of all aggressiveness and resistance: To reform the world, do not bring a crowbar but a sunbeam: Leave cold criticism to the cynic and the battering ram to the iconoclast; but for your part, diffuse the radiance of kindness, beam upon your enemy, wrap him in your warm sympathy, and he will grow expansive and radiant and happy, and therefore, by natural consequence, he will become useful and benevolent and good:

J: TYSSUL DAVIS.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE.

III.

(1) Learn by growing. Be more to-morrow than you are to-day.

(2) There is no contentment for the content. No real repose for the torpid soul. It is not sleep for which we truly yearn, but life. Therefore look up, step forward, and be alive.

(3) There are God-created, divine, human beings who seem becalmed, just floating over the mud flats; there are human vessels drifting, the sport of every wind that blows. There are once noble ships with torn sails and shattered spars. There are derelicts on the ocean of life, and often the coast lines are strewn with wreckage. You are your own soul's captain, keep to the bridge!

(4) Because you cannot know all is a poor reason for thinking you can have no knowledge. As though a man on a bright morning should fear to take one step into the perfumed woodland world before him because the little he can see is so much less than all. What you need to know, you can. From your heart say "Send me!" and you will see where to go.

(5) Every living thing is led by a motive that transcends itself. The cup of moss is filled with one drop of pearly dew; the dew thus held washes the pantry shelves in the tiny domestic economy of the moss household, and trickles off with this supply to the tender rootlets of the thirsty fern beneath; the fern revives, unfolds, and under its arched frond a crimson spider nests; the silver woven web catches a flying seed! The moss, the fern, the spider's web, built better than they knew, they served a higher end, the forest stands upon their tiny deeds. No one is alone.

(6) Are you helping on and lifting up? Or are you holding back and keeping down? If God uses His moss-cup and fern frond and spider web to advance the harmony of His Universe, how much more must He desire to use you!

(7) When we feel the divine desire to be of use, not merely to attain happiness, then our hearts beat with the pulse of the eternal, then we hold the hand of the infinite.

(8) God is burning our ships behind us, he is destroying the old rough instincts of the human race, and replacing them with hopes and ideals which urge us toward a fuller, grander, better life. It was once enough to find the pleasant, and enjoy it, now men know that peace cannot rest in the self-sheltered soul, that the noblest power is not in gaining, but in giving.

(9) The soul's higher temple is built of something more than duty, and justice, and uprightness, it claims the fire of burning joy and the rapture of passionate devotion. All that art, music, drama, mean to their inspired workers, religion means to hers and more. Passion, inspiration!

(10) Can you ask God for the satisfaction you are craving? The fulfilment of the hope upon which you have set your heart? Strength for the work you attempt? All is well then!

IMPRESSIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.—V:

SURELY if snow and ice, solemn woods and lofty crags, blue sky and green water, were ever skilfully combined, and tuned down to the concert pitch of newly married couples, it is at Lake Louise. Whether from the abundant presence of such persons, or that of a too luxurious hotel, the many elements of grandeur which are in that much-advertised spot do take on in fine weather a touch of softness which seems foreign to their nature. Still, it is a wonderful place, especially when you get away from the hotel and the crowd, which comes and goes at the rate of fifty or sixty a day. A very perfect picture it is, as from the hotel verandah you look over a mile of green water, flanked on the one side by a couple of thousand feet of rock and scree, on the other by a thousand feet of dark steep woods topped by a group of fantastic peaks, on to a broad expanse of glacier and snow that seems almost to reach the water's edge—so perfect as to suggest a touch of art and deliberate combination for effect.

Some 1,200 feet above, where the forest dies away—a forest fearfully alive with mosquitoes and their various relations—lies Lake Agnes, nestling beneath a group of noble cliffs, with its foot at the edge of a precipice over which its waters escape—and from which is a great, far-reaching view—a wilder scene. These two waters, with the little Mirror Lake lying between them, form the much-talked-of "Lakes in the Clouds"—a name hardly warranted, seeing that the highest falls well short of 7,000 feet. But it is ungracious to criticise such lovely places, and probably one would not do so, had he not been specially told to admire them above all things, and been surrounded by so many people faithfully doing their duty in that respect.

No such critical spirit awakes as you tie up your horses by the shore of the Moraine Lake in the valley of the Ten Peaks, where hotels are not nor do many tourists come, where the silence is broken only by the roar of avalanches, now on this side, now on that. Ten great peaks there are, rising from beds of snow and ice, some snow streaked and some stark and bare, which in a quarter circle on the east face the masses of Mount Temple on the west. Between them lies the lake, also of the same wonderful colour, set in dense forest. Along its margin the worst of trails soon lands you in a pathless wilderness of boulders, trees dead and living and rushing streams, a place to be seen and felt, not described; protected as yet by the 22 miles of riding necessary to visit it—a performance somewhat trying to the bones and muscles of the novice. Long may the Government defer their projected carriage road, and the advent of the honeymooner be delayed.

The last day comes, and is of a heat and brilliancy unsurpassed. Shall it be spent in visiting yet another of these lovely lakes? Paradise Valley sounds tempting. A happy inspiration decides, notwithstanding, in favour of going up for cooler air and wider outlook. "Fairview," well named if ever mountain was, rises, to a mild 9,000 feet in all, above the shores of Lake Louise, and a few hours steady walking sees us on its top; introduces us also on the way to a new and interesting creation, fondly termed by us our "Mountain Lion," proving in reality to be only a wolverine; gives us moreover, among many other charming flowers, once more the beloved big anemones, and an old Swiss friend, the pink silene.

It is a true rocky top, no mere ridge, with sharp descent all round, and a view, it is hardly too much to say, of the Rocky Mountains—a glorious farewell point. On the south an amphitheatre of peaks, snow-fields, and glaciers close at hand, with every detail clear in the strong glowing light. Mount Temple, with his noble, spotless summit, whose thick snows overhang deep, dark precipices, and break away down them in loud-sounding avalanches. At their foot nestles the tiny green Lake Annette. Lower still runs the dark ravine where lie the woods of Paradise Valley, cut sharply off by the black cliffs of Sheol, over whose shoulders some of the Ten Peaks raise more distant heads. To the right of these our nearest neighbour, double-headed—is it The Mitre?—with a cold, dull glacier crawling down its side. Still further to the right sweep round the spacious snowfields of Mounts Lefroy and Victoria, sending their ice-tongues down towards the head of Lake Louise, green sketches of which lie visible more than 3,000 feet below us. Deeper down still, as we turn towards the North—it must be a good 4,000 feet below—stretches the great valley of the Bow River, visible from east to west for—is it fifty or a hundred miles?—broad and wooded. Through it runs the railway, the boom of whose engines comes faintly up from time to time. Westward up the valley lies Mount Hector, not ill-described as a "great buttressed mass," and in the distance the Bow Lake glances in the sun. Eastward down the valley the reddened smoke of a forest fire spreads a half-transparent veil, through which come dim outlines and suggestions of the peaks that lie around Banff. Across the valley, what a weltering sea of mountain ranges spreads from east to west, snow and rock (rock mostly as we view their southern sides) in an endless variety of wild and rugged forms. And one remembers that for hundreds of miles so it stretches until it dies away in the frozen North. White, fleecy clouds are floating overhead and casting deep moving shadows across the great valley, while a fresh breeze stirs occasionally and makes pleasant a temperature which down below is getting near 100 in the shade. Very quickly do the hours pass here. Very gratefully do we acknowledge that the Rockies have given us of their best on this last day.

It is a far cry from British Columbia, with its magnificent scenery, its teeming fisheries, its wealth of mine and forest, and warm valleys, across the rich prairie lands of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, now one great sea of tender green, and glad in the promise of an unequalled harvest, along the still wild and beautiful shores of Lake Superior, through the settled and prosperous lands of Ontario and Quebec, with glimpses of the busy cities of Ottawa and Montreal, to the simple column on the Plains of Abraham by the great St. Lawrence which marks the spot where Wolfe died. Yet the chain of events which has bound all these great Provinces, with others, into the Dominion of Canada, England's greatest and most prosperous colony, is to be traced back to the heroism of that man. It is not unfitting, therefore, that the last spot to be visited should be the scene of his death and victory, the last flowers be gathered around his simple monument.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It will be a source of gratification to the many friends of the Van Mission to learn that a second van for next year has been given by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., and Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P.

THE recent growth of sentiment in favour of peace between the nations imparts a sense of buoyance to Concord, the journal of the International Arbitration and Peace Association. This is not without cause, for undoubtedly within the last few months there have been many signs of promise. There are signs that even Governments are becoming more pacific, and they are undoubtedly influenced for good by the prosaic difficulty of depleting the people much further of their wealth for the maintenance of armaments which are always useless except when they are mischievous. The press also has on the whole assumed a less provocative tone, and in this it reflects the feelings of the peoples. The popular anti-militarist movement in France does not stand alone, but finds an echo even in this country. We must not, however, forget that England is the chief offender in respect of extravagant naval and military expenditure, and therefore there is need for Concord to continue its labours with unabated resolution.

CONSIDERABLE light is being thrown on the devious ways of ecclesiastical policy in connection with the law of the Associations Cultuelles in France. The Siecle and the Temps give full accounts of the meeting of the French bishops in May, and of the decisions then taken, and full summaries of the revelations have been appearing in the Times. It would seem that the bishops virtually accepted the law. Pope Pius X., in his Encyclical, speaks as though they had rejected it. The Temps naturally relies on its own account, which clearly emanates from someone present at the debate, and speaks of the "equivocation by which the Holy See attempted to establish identity of views between its immediate entourage and the French episcopate." We also learn from the Temps that the Pope was really very angry with the bishops, and petulantly exclaimed in private, "They have voted against me; they have voted as Frenchmen." If the saying should be an invented one, it nevertheless succinctly sums up the situation:

THEY have voted as Frenchmen; It is an unpardonable offence, since in the mind of the Pope he is above France, or shall we say England. The integrity of a nation is to be nothing; the authority of a conclave of cardinals to be everything. Were it possible to have some holy authority which would weld the nations to one fraternity it were good. But such power must proceed from the peoples. The time has passed when the Roman See could be the spiritual centre of Europe. The time has come when every battle offered to Rome's political usurpation is a battle for human freedom.

THE Russian revolutionary party, or rather the section of it which carries out the policy of Terror, has been prompt in retaliation for the suppression of the Duma. The advisers of the Czar have chosen to rely on force, and blow answers blow with astounding rapidity. One day we read of an attempt on the life of General Kaulbars, and of the death of General Minn. On the same day bombs are thrown in the house of M. Stolypin, titular premier of Russia, and although he escapes numerous others are killed. A lapse of a few hours and General Woularlarski, Governor of Warsaw, is slain. And so the tale goes on. Those whom the people kill or aim to kill are leaders. The names of many of them are notorious for deeds of savagery. But the people whom the authorities kill and torture and imprison are for the most part nameless men and women. What is to be the outcome of this duel à outrance between Russia and the Russian Government it is not possible to say. One can only hope that amid this welter of strife some divine providence is shaping the issue to happy results.

WE cannot but feel sympathy for the little daughter of Mr. Stolypin, who was so terribly injured. She at least was innocent of wrong, and she comes before us as a representative figure. Her sufferings are the sufferings of so many among the children and the women. The women, however, are not all among the non-combatants. From the early movements of a generation ago, and right on from then till now, nothing has been more striking than the daring skill and endurance of the Russian women. Still there remains the great majority of the women and all the children who would live a quiet life. For them all there is insecurity, for many wounds and death. The nation is one, and all must suffer until some victory is achieved over the forces of oppression which arrogate the name of government.

THE Master of Elibank, junior Liberal Whip, has made a speech which occasions lively feelings of satisfaction in the Conservative press. Utterances of public men which prove so thoroughly entertaining to the opposite party are usually spoken of as indiscretions, but they serve to give piquancy to the last hot August days. The junior Whip makes two announcements, of which the first is that the Liberal party will soon be obliged to enter on a crusade against the Labour or Socialist party. Liberals are individualists, and therefore oppose the demands of Socialism which are summed up under four headings: as the public ownership of means of production, the necessary antagonism of Capital and Labour, the right of every man to demand work from the State, and the duty of the State to provide it. Undoubtedly some Liberals oppose these claims, but what of the Liberals who are also Fabians? Apparently the party must be divided into those who follow the Junior Whip and those who do not. The second proposition which has attracted attention, is to the effect that the Liberal party must stand on its own legs. We do not know whether a committee, consisting of Sir H. Fowler, Mr. Masterman, and Mr. Basil Lupton, has been appointed to select a ground on which this modest ambition may be practised.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

IN the history of Christian doctrine we find some notions continually reappearing in new forms, and with new names, but all based upon the assumption that Christian doctrine contains an inner hidden knowledge, a kind of esoteric gnosis, and that the chief thing is to get hold of this knowledge, as it will make a man superior to ordinary Christians, and exempt him from the ills to which flesh is heir.

The ancient mysteries which played so great a part in Pagan life, and which, probably through the medium of Gnosticism, entered the Christian Church, encouraged the idea; and though organised Gnosticism did not survive the decay of the civilisation in which it arose, its spirit may be detected through the middle ages, and in our own time it has been revived in some remarkable forms, amongst which are Esoteric Buddhism, Theosophy, and later still what is known as Christian Science.

This latest phase of Gnosticism has made remarkable progress in the United States of America. Founded but a few years ago, it is now a rich and powerful sect, its adherents being chiefly recruited from the wealthy and leisured classes. The number of these must be very large, and the great cathedral so recently completed at Boston, at a cost of two million dollars, is one of many indications of the rapid growth of the sect.

When ancient denominations are struggling hard to just maintain their ground, and in many places are not doing that, it is strange to observe such progress in a sect which is but of yesterday, and one is moved to ask what it means.

To what is due this phenomenal growth expressing itself in solid edifices which are hardly erected before they have to be enlarged?

The movement, it is true, has not been tested by time, but its remarkable extension at least proves that it answers to some human need, and gives to that need at least a temporary satisfaction. There must be an element of truth in it, however much there may be of falsehood.

The main truth which it proclaims appears to be the very real relationship between physical and spiritual health. Faith, according to the Christian Scientist, is something which influences the body, purging it of disease, reviving, reconstituting it. It can even quicken and invigorate the senses when sight or hearing are impaired. For example, this is a specimen of many a Christian Science anecdote. It is related of a little girl who was near-sighted:—

"The teacher had written some stanzas of poetry on the board for the children to copy and commit to memory at home. She (the little girl) had been accustomed to go up close to the board to copy her school work, but this time, as she said, 'I sat still in my seat with my hand over my eyes, and kept saying, "God is my sight; I am His child, and my sight is perfect, for He is perfect." When I looked at the board again I could read every word.'"

The process adopted by the little girl, the Christian Scientist would apply not only to near-sightedness, but to other ailments, and where those ailments are (like so many) due to nervous disorder, to depression, and want of will-power, there can be no doubt the effect is marvellous. The Christian Scientist would treat the body through the mind, instead of treating the mind through the body, claiming, as Mrs. Eddy, the founder of Christian Science, asserts, that the soul contains the body, not that the body contains the soul. The real seat of disease is the mind; that once healed, the bodily symptoms will pass away.

There are thousands of sufferers, especially amongst the leisured classes, who really need a spiritual tonic; who, with minds diseased, must, according to Macbeth's wise physician, "minister to themselves." They need a bracing of the will, and any system that can urge them to exert the will must be a god-send to them. Christian Science comes to such as something new; it appeals to the spiritual part of them, and it induces them to believe in that reserve of spiritual force which is in every human being, but which other systems have ignored. The utilisation of this force yields wonderful results, and is as the revelation of a new heaven and a new earth.

Instead of justifying depression and fretfulness by ill-health as though the soul were the helpless slave of the body, Christian Science teaches the spirit to rise above the flesh and to act as its master. The man who believes his body is his master will so act as to make it so. He will be what he supposes himself to be—the slave to his nerves, his stomach, his appetites, but he who believes his soul to be the dominant factor, the real ruler, will have his belief justified. According to his faith it will be unto him. As Jesus declared again and again, it is, essentially, a question of faith. Faith was and is the great curative agent. Christian Science emphasises this truth, and so recalls to the Christian consciousness what it was in danger of forgetting. The thing that many religious people constantly forget is the necessity for frequent renewal of spiritual life. It is as necessary as repeated cleansing of the body. Conversion is not something to occur once for all—it must be constantly repeated.

To attempt to account for a low, apathetic spiritual state by any physical infirmity which accompanies it is to make a false diagnosis. It is not primarily due to such an infirmity, which is but a symptom, and no tinkering with the symptoms will do much good while the root of the disease, viz, faithlessness, remains untouched. Do you desire healing? Then according to your faith be it unto you. "Faith absolute in God," in love, in life, is what you want. God is love, and God is life, and He is ready to impart Himself as such to you; but you must believe it, for until you believe it, it is, for you, as though it were not.

Professor James, of Harvard, the eminent psychologist, "sees a similarity between the mind-cure movement and Lutheranism and Wesleyanism," and anticipates that its rapid growth and therapeutic triumphs make it possible that it will play a correspondingly great part in the evolution of popular religion. For instance, to the question, "What shall I do to be saved?" Luther and Wesley answered, "You are saved now, if you would but believe it."²² And similarly to the question, "What shall I do to be sound, whole, well?"²² the mind-curer answered, "You are sound and well already, if you did but know it."²²

But, while fully admitting the truth—truth long neglected—in this movement, it must also be admitted that in practice there have been some painful as well as satisfactory results. The distressing trial which ended so unsatisfactorily the other day by the disagreement of the jury, revealed some of the more repulsive aspects of Christian Science. But, without for a moment attempting to justify all that has been done in its name, it is possible to retain and assimilate the truth which the new movement contains. All that is true in it really belongs to our Common Christianity, and can be utilized without entering the new sect. It is an error to suppose that by so doing, by joining the sect, we should obtain some magic secret and have some esoteric gnosis revealed to us. It should rather be ours to make the most and best of what we have, and are. It is not truth we lack, it is rather the assimilation of truth. The truest Christian Science is contained in that great utterance of the fourth Gospel: "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine." Old things will appear new if they are pressed into the service of practical life. If Christian Science prompts us to do this, it will not be that science, that gnosis, falsely so called, of which Timothy was warned, and which was but "a profane and vain babbling." Instead of being in opposition to the faith it will be in accord with it. "The way to give new freshness to familiar truth," says Coleridge, "is to begin to live it."

The verification of Christian truth by life is the true Christian Science.

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

ARISTOTLE ON CONDUCT.*

MR. MARSHALL, in his work on "Aristotle's Theory of Conduct" has presented the world with a valuable treatise, and one that will, we imagine, be found to possess permanent worth. In the opening of the preface he states: "In the following pages an attempt is made to present Aristotle's Ethics in a readable shape"; and he adds "It is not, and cannot be made, a popular book." We agree with him in that estimate, though Mr. Marshall has so far succeeded in his prime aim that he has presented Aristotle's theory in the most attractive and popular form of which we know.

Aristotle's treatise, in spite of many good translations, cannot be said to be generally read. It has always been studied by the thinker and scholar, but has been taken up by very few ordinary readers. Its value has hence been a value chiefly for ethical theory rather than for actual conduct. Mr. Marshall's attempt is an attempt to bring out more of its practical worth, to enlarge the circle of its influence as a guide to life and to the formation of character. He writes: "It is chiefly, as a practical treatise or manual of daily conduct that the Ethics may be read with profit. In its motives are analysed and actions described and defined with great skill and clearness. Nowhere, perhaps, within an equal number of pages, can more shrewd observations on character be found, neither in the Characters of Theophrastus nor in Bacon's Essays, a work with which the Ethics, on its practical side, has much in common." It is not, however, only on account of its analysis of motives, its descriptions of forms of action, and its shrewd observations on character that the Ethics has this practical value. This attaches to it on account of its fundamental teaching, and its broad healthy outlook on human life and conduct. In this connection one might make mention of the following points—(a) the teaching that human happiness, which is human good, lies in the right exercise of human faculties. Good is attained through activity, or, as Mr. Marshall has himself well put it, "the exercise of practical intelligence on things immersed in matter and subject to the disturbing and incalculable influence of necessity and chance, and to the refractory nature of matter itself, constitutes happiness for man." (b) The emphasis on the good that lies in the exercise of intelligence, particularly of the theorising intelligence—"The application of pure reason to the data of necessary truth." As we to-day might put it, Aristotle believed in the happiness that comes through thought; believed, indeed, that thus the supreme happiness was to be gained. His work is thus an incentive to the exercise of thought. In this, and every age, men have been only too ready to let others do their thinking for them, and to repose on conclusions that are in no sense a product of their own thought exercise. (c) The "social" point of view from which the Ethics was written. The individual, in Aristotle, presupposes society; his life is bound up with that of the social whole of which he forms part. The Ethics, rightly understood, supplies a corrective to those individualistic interpretations of our moral life which the mind is so prone to rest in, and from which it can, indeed, shake itself free only with effort. (d) The doctrine of the mean, as expounded in Aristotle, the tendency of which as it is studied is to cultivate the spirit that avoids excesses and extremes in any direction.

It is in such general underlying conceptions that go to form the outlook of the ethics that its practical value largely consists. We have here an exposition of some of the most important and most essential elements of the Greek Spirit, and to have that spirit brought into closer touch with the spirit of our own age, to have it more with us as a living influence, would be of all things most profitable. To the accomplishment of that end Mr. Marshall by his attractive presentation of the Ethics has made no small contribution.

In his treatment of Aristotle's work he has followed a good method, which is all the better from the fact that it involves a certain amount of repetition. There is a special introduction to each chapter of the Ethics; then follows a paraphrase of the text, and finally a section of explanatory remarks and illustrations. There is also a full general introduction to the work, and a very useful index at the end. Occasionally an illustration is not very carefully worded as, e.g., the one given on page 241: "Careless, extravagant, good-natured Charles Surface does more harm to society than Aristotle allows when he contrasts him with the saving illiberal man." That reads as if Charles Surface were alluded to in the Ethics!

As regards the general interpretation given of Aristotle's theory, many will be found to dissent in some degree from the view set forth in Mr. Marshall's book. Mr. Marshall is often a little inclined to read his own ideas into the language of the Greek philosopher, and to rely on a few plausible "proof texts" when he does so, which at best give a very partial glimpse into Aristotle's real thought.

"The rule of right conduct, according to Aristotle," writes the author, "is given by the consensus of opinion in the society in which the agent lives; by what people actually think, and not by what the agent or any one else might wish them to think." This is Mr. Marshall's view of the basis of morals, but whether it was Aristotle's is the question. And so the author insists throughout on the contingency of all morality, in the necessary variableness of its standards, on the impossibility of any absolute difference between good and evil. He shows how what in one nation at one time has been accounted good has been accounted bad by other peoples at other times. He takes "slavery," the receiving of interest, and theft and murder, and shows that they have been very variously regarded; draws the conclusion that good and evil are merely matters of general "opinion," and thinks that this is the rock base of Aristotelian ethics.

In this we dissent from him. Were the "consensus of the opinion" the touchstone of all morality in Aristotle's view then in writing a treatise like the Ethics his main endeavour would necessarily be the plain one of determining, or showing people how to determine, the consensus of opinion, which would provide them with the only key to all good and all evil. Yet, this is precisely what Aristotle never attempts. If you ask the question, "What is Good?" you do not find Aristotle giving answer, "Good is just what people generally believe is good." On the contrary, he says: "Good is what brings happiness, and happiness comes through the proper exercise of one's faculties, and if you want a practical ethical standard follow not the crowd but the 'mean,' as determined by the reason by which a prudent man would determine it." And so when he examines the various virtues and vices he does not strive to lay bare what the consensus of opinion is respecting them, deeming that that will show the extent of their goodness or badness; but he examines them in accordance with the standard he has erected, and which he has obtained by bringing reason to bear on ethical experience.

Further, Aristotle's standard is not a variable one. Adopting it would not give varying results as to what is good or bad according to time and place. Following the mean would in no time or place lead a man to steal or murder, as he shows, nor make him do to-morrow what to-day he determines to be unjust. There is a certain form of "absoluteness" in Aristotle's ethical outlook which is apt to be ignored by commentators. When Mr. Marshall comes across anything that reveals this he simply brushes it aside, saying that here Aristotle advances something that is very questionable, or declares him to be quite inconsistent. So, on page 134, he says: "Aristotle goes on to advance the more questionable proposition that there is no medium in extremes, and that actions like theft and murder are blamed as soon as named, and cannot be either better or worse." The fact that such actions may be tolerated in some communities does not make them any better according to Aristotle, and the idea that these or any actions derive their final ethical value merely from the consensus of opinion existing in a given social whole respecting them is consequently not Aristotle's idea. Again, on page 303, it is admitted in dealing with the question of justice: "Aristotle must have meant what he certainly appears to say in the chapter before us, namely, that there is a natural, universal, and invariable justice as well as a conventional, partial, and changeable one." This, the author declares, is a mere poetic fiction, and expresses his surprise that Aristotle after having traced correctly the genesis of moral conduct should at last have been carried away by it. Such a criticism simply points to a lack of comprehension of Aristotle's theory. In speaking of a "natural" justice, Aristotle applies a term he would have applied equally to any virtue. Man's ethical constitution is to him "natural," and right conduct is his truly "natural" conduct—conduct in accord with the natural law of his being. Right conduct is discoverable by the exercise of reason on the facts of experience, that is, experience in the social group. And the result of such reason and experience is to disclose lines of action that have ethical worth apart from any of the prescriptions of mere convention. As Grote says, by referring principles of conduct to the intellect (i.e., reason) Aristotle determines their "evidential value and dignity." We have to adjust the merely "relative" view to this fact to get Aristotle's true view of ethics. This feature in Aristotle was seized on by the Stoics, and further developed in their philosophy, and in our opinion they built on something elemental and basal in Aristotle.

Though thus we cannot altogether agree with Mr. Marshall's exposition of the ethics we consider that he has produced a book of great value, and our hope is that it may be reissued in a somewhat curtailed and cheaper form, and so come within reach of a larger class of readers.

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

OUR great thoughts, our great affections, the truths of our life, never leave us: Surely they cannot separate from our consciousness, shall follow it whithersoever it shall go, and are of their nature divine and immortal.—Thackeray.

THE more readily we admit the possibility of our own cherished convictions being mixed with error, the more vital and helpful whatever is right in them will become; and no error is so conclusively fatal as the idea that God will not allow us to err though He has allowed all other men to do so.—Ruskin.

A POET'S FAIRY GLEAM.*

THE other children tell this wonder-story of how they went to look for their little brother Peterkin, who had died :—

"He was once our cabin-boy, and cooked the sweets for tea;
And O, we've sailed around the world with laughing little Peterkin.
From nursery floor to pantry door we've roamed the mighty sea,
And come to port below the stairs in distant Caribbee;
But wheresoe'er we sailed we took our little lubber Peterkin,
Because his wide grey eyes believed much more than ours could see,
And so we liked our Peterkin, our trusty little Peterkin:

"Come, my brother pirates, I am tired of play;
Come and look for Peterkin, little brother Peterkin,
Our merry little comrade that the fairies took away,
For people think we've lost him, and when we come to say
Our good-night prayers to mother, if we pray for little Peterkin
Her eyes are very sorrowful, she turns her head away.
Come and look for Peterkin, merry little Peterkin."

They wanted very much to know where little Peterkin had gone, especially when they had heard mother and father talking very sorrowfully, and he bitterly, of their loss, and the "poor fairy-tales" in which he also once believed. The children cannot understand—

"Why heaven should not be fairyland,
A part of heaven at least, and why
The thought of it made mother cry,
And why they went away so sad,
And father still quite unforgiven,
For what could children be but glad
To find a fairyland in heaven?"

Dick, their eldest, who is home from school, tells them they must find the "Smallest Flower"—

"For, since within its leaves lay furled
The secret of the whole wide world,
He thought that we might learn therein
The whereabouts of Peterkin."

So they started on their quest, and, in spite of grown-ups, who "cannot understand," and never will, "how short's the way to fairyland," quickly found the way, by the little lad's grave in the churchyard, into the "Forest of Wild Thyme." They are grown so tiny in that forest that the lady-birds appear like monsters as they fly past, hurrying to the house that is on fire; and then they have wonderful adventures, not without terror at the creatures they meet. They hear the hare-bells toll for poor Cock-robin, and see a monstrous cockchafer and a lizard, and then have a horrible experience in the parlour of the spider, who is a sentimentalist and a moralist. But already before that they have heard the echo of a song of hope from Little Boy Blue, urging them to their fairy quest :—

*"The Forest of Wild Thyme. A Tale for Children under Ninety." By Alfred Noyes. 1905. (Blackwood, 5s. net.)

"Little Boy Blue, if the child-heart knows, Sound but a note, as a little one may;
And the thorns of the desert shall bloom with the rose,

And the Healer shall wipe all tears away;
Little Boy Blue, we are all astray,
The sheep's in the meadow, the cow's in the corn.

Ah, set the world right, as a little one may.

Little Boy Blue, come, blow up your horn!"

And out of the spider's den they are rescued by a troop of fairies, whose king sends them with two guides, Pease-blossom and Mustard-seed, further on their quest. They are jolly little fellows, who take the children through into a yet smaller world than the forest of Wild Thyme, and bring them at last to the gates of the City of Sleep. There are many hapless people waiting there outside; but for the children the gates open, and they lead all the others in. There they find the city in festival, and all the children's frolics blending with a deeper gladness.

"Then we saw that the tunes of the world were one;

And the metre that guided the rhythmic sun

Was at one, like the ebb and flow of the sea,

With the tunes that we learned at our mother's knee;

The beat of the horse-hoofs that carried us down

To see the fine Lady of Banbury Town;
And so, by the rhymes that we knew,
we could tell

Without knowing the others—that all was well."

For at last, in the tumult of rejoicing, with the swings and the see-saws marking the time, "mixed with the song of the whirling stars," they heard the song of the ultimate mystery, of the child that was born in Bethlehem :—

"The wise men came to greet him with their gifts of myrrh and frankincense,— Gold and myrrh and frankincense they brought to make him mirth;

And would you know the way to win to little brother Peterkin,

My childhood's heart shall guide you through the glories of the earth.

"A child was born in Bethlehem, in Bethlehem, in Bethlehem;

The wise men came to welcome him, a star stood o'er the gable;

And there they saw the King of Kings,
no longer thronged with angel wings,
But croodling like a little babe, and cradled in a stable."

It is a "fairy fable" that the lovely song tells about, but a fable that goes to the heart of truth. And thence, from the City of Sleep and Dreams, they go yet further, and come

"At last, to that sweet House of Grace
Which wise men find in every place—
The Temple of the Smallest Flower."

The fairies at that point have to say good-bye to the children, "for we, poor fairies, have no souls"; and the children enter into the heart of the Smallest Flower, and their search is over, for

"Through the splendour and the glow
We saw four angels, great and sweet,
With outspread wings and folded feet,
Come gliding down from a heaven within
The golden heart of Paradise;
And in their hands, with laughing eyes,
Lay little brother Peterkin.

"And all around the Temple of the Smallest of the Flowers

The glory of the angels made a star for little Peterkin;

For all the Kings of Splendour and all the Heavenly Powers

Were gathered there together in the fairy forest bowers

With all their globed and radiant wings to make a star for Peterkin,

The star that shone upon the East, a star that still is ours,

Whene'er we hang our stockings up, a star of wings for Peterkin."

It is a lovely vision, and so the children woke, and their mother's voice was softly saying—

"See, they are sleeping by the side
Of that dear little one—who died."

They tell their father all the wonderful story, and by the children he also is led into the way of Peace.

It is a poem of nearly a hundred pages, and we have not quoted all the most beautiful and touching things in it, though we have quoted so much. We shall not add a word of criticism. What we have printed here will be enough to show our friends who do not already know the book whether this poem is for them; and that is all we care to do. With all its quaint mingling of childish fancy with deeper feeling and the true poet's vision, we have found a rare pleasure, and more than pleasure, in the book.

DR. HUNTER AND MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

DEAR SIR,—May I point out that, so far as I can discover, your correspondent of last week, Addison A. Charlesworth, is not in any way connected with Manchester College.

His name does not appear on the list of students, past or present. He is, apparently, not an official, nor on the committee. He is not a trustee. He is not even a subscriber.

I suggest, therefore, that his "frank" communication as to the recent appointment of Dr. Hunter as preacher at the College is a frank impertinence.

And may I add, Sir, that, as it would have been becoming in him to have suppressed his uncharitable and uncivil remarks about a great and noble advocate of Liberal Religion, it would have been at least decent if you had consigned them to the waste-paper basket.

MEDIATED RELIGION.

BY THE REV. W. WHITAKER, B.A.

This grace wherein we stand.—Rom. v. 2

WHAT is it we demand from a religion? Ever since the arrival of Christianity in the world our demand has been a very high one. A religion must show us the love of God; make it plain to our faith as a constituent part of our outlook upon the world. It is not miracles we want, but a loving Father; not a mythology, but a heart answering our heart; not a philosophy, but forgiveness for our sins, a living mercy set up in a world of wrong, a purpose bent on the utter reclamation of all wanderers, a gate always ajar, a retrieval of all loss, and the horizons kept ever open for progress up and on. Can anything in the world give us this? In the ordinary course of affairs men are not conscious of anything of the kind. The love of God does not take its place among the axioms of society or the principles of State polity. The accepted inhumanities of civil intercourse give it the lie. The inevitable materialism of practical nations seems to leave no place for this dream of idealists and mystics. There are so many things against it. What is there for it?

There is obviously only one way in which a religion can effect for us such a gigantic result. It can only do it by making the world actually different—different from what it was before our eyes. The thing we are concerned about is the world of fact, not the world of silvery illusions that may pass through the leisured trances of a philosopher's noonday. There is to strike upon our dull and unbelieving eyes, which before only saw a world without God, the vision of a world in God; The world, we are accustomed to say, is a becoming, a growth, an evolution. What is it becoming? Whither goes "the consentaneous flowing, flowing of the world"? We speak of "God," but the only God we are interested in, or can even think about, is God as He is in our world. "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us" is our cry. Show Him actually here and working among men and doing the world's work. That we have been blind to His presence, though "so long time with us," is conceivable: but it is not conceivable that if He has been here He has made no difference to history, or been a negligible quantity in affairs. And a religion, in order to reveal to us the love of God, must make the world different. Sometimes we hear people speaking of what such-and-such a religion teaches: what Buddhism teaches, and how its teachings are different from those of Christianity. Really, this is but a small part of the matter. If a religion did nothing but teach, it would not be a religion in the true sense of the word. Much more thorough-going is the question, What does a religion exhibit and do? A religion is God-in-action: It wins its way by showing a better and finer ethical sense, a farther reaching love, a deeper comprehension of the mystery and beauty of life. It says "That which our eyes have seen and our hands have handled of the Word of Life, declare we." It says, "Come and see, the lame walk, the deaf hear." The teachings are important, but the religion is not created by them. They come after the religion has been born. Any great religion must set going in the world a powerful stream of human endeavour, a living tradition, a way of life, a habit, a temper, a mode of intercourse, a set of institutions. It is these that are the real revelation. The theory, the interpretation of these things is what constitutes the teachings of that religion, and they come later. The love of God has to be lived in human life before it can be spoken in human words.

It is in this way and no other that the Christian revelation of God has come to the world. Its whole character and shape are dependent on this powerful and salient fact: that the only way by which men may attain that calming, settling, fortifying conviction of the love of God for which they cry, is to place themselves in the line of His clearest manifestation in history. It is because thoughtful men do not always perceive this necessity that they so often hold aloof from Christianity. They think there is "something in religion" in a general sense. They hold some sort of belief in a God who is the Cause, the Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed. But they refuse to their Theism that enrichment and vitalising which Christianity might confer upon it. The reason is that they are pursuing a creature of their own making—a religion that shall be a generalisation, or lowest common measure, of all the religions men have ever held, of all the platitudes common to all creeds. Not the highest and most daring conceptions of the human spirit, but the barest and narrowest ideals are to be admired. All the famous world-religions are to be regarded as containing in germ the few elementary truths of Theism, mixed in various degrees with the superstitions that held them in being. The wise man is to stand calmly apart from all, and start a new religion more in accordance with the science of his time.

To say that this whole theory is based upon a fundamental misconception of religious history is but to touch its complete inadequacy and uselessness at one single point. It is for ever inadequate to the living needs of the soul. If we are men of religion, seeking amidst the confusions of our day to keep burning in ourselves the fires that have glowed for the world's regeneration in martyr and prophet, in prayer and song, in church and in the stricken field, in slum and in wilderness, through the most precious and human part of history, we shall be concerned to ask, How have the hero-saints always kept fresh in their hearts the fragrance and the sweetness of that sense of God's love, which is assuredly the world's biggest need to-day? Listen to the Apostle. "This grace—wherein we stand." This man had found the very beatitude of life. From grey, life had grown golden. Over all its enigmatic and violent wrong had come a peace and a charm that would take ages to wonder at, more ages to proclaim, and all eternity to comprehend. Upon a prospect of dark and furious hatreds of race and sect, where the very light that men cherished had been as darkness, there had supervened this tremendous change; and it might all be summed up in this one word "Grace." The life of man was neither a wallowing of beasts in their mire, nor the proud fulfilling by a race of noble giants of tasks which the envious gods would render vain. None of the old conceptions would serve. Life was one perpetual, ineffable, infinite Grace, an adorable mystery of Mercy. Men might live under a favour that could match all sin, and bind up every wound. The great fact about life was the love of God. The very thought of it subdued the heart and misted the eyes, and shook the pen in the writer's hand so that it tortured and strained the language of his great passages of faith till you had to read by jumps and guesses, and turn the reading into prayer. And how did all this wonderful, fresh intuition of the love of God come into this man's heart? It came, as religion must come, mostly if not always, from contact with other hearts, by a line of tradition, through an actual human system, by the living power of God-in-men; fire kindling fire, and life begetting life, and the new order rising out of the old, here as always. A great "grace" had been revealed to Paul, through men, through the impact of spirit on spirit, from the time that he had seen Christ in the face of Stephen, and onwards. And so it became the business of his days to explore and absorb and magnify, "this grace, wherein we stand."

It has been one main work of Christianity to drag out to the light this beautiful and powerful truth—that God comes through man to man. A religion is the organisation of the love of God. It is the democracy of God. We do not stand apart, worshipping in scornful isolation a God who is away from our brothers. We owe what we are to men. We are recipients of a divine-human charity. It is all grace—grace of God, and grace of man, and these two are the same grace. We never know what is meant by heavenly love till we have known earthly love: The affections of man's heart are the alphabet by means of which we learn to spell out the depths of the divine. The more we understand men the more we understand God. If a man do not love his brother whom he hath seen, how shall he love God whom he hath not seen? Christianity insists that religion is intrinsically a human relationship. To be religious meant to be in the Church—the spiritual Church—a member of Christ's body, a citizen of the kingdom. Not that Christianity made an original discovery of this truth: The Jews had their national patriotism, which went far to lift men out of religious individualism. The Stoics also tried to unite the self-centred soul with all other souls by preaching that men are citizens of the universe. But Judaism stopped short in its development; and Stoicism, even in the writings of the Stoic Emperor, did not get much power out of its world-patriotism. It was left for Christianity to make solidarity co-equal with individuality. It enthroned sacrifice. It showed how altruism and egoism might pass together beyond being catch-words of a theory into the holiest and fairest flower of human growth. Every brother brought something to the common stock, but each received again a thousandfold more than he brought. Each soul drank eagerly of the stream and knew itself in direct communion with God, and did not think it a difficulty that this communion was mediated—that it came about through the communion of saints. Not boggling at the foolish puzzles made in the schools, the Christian heart found it very clear and plain that it had God in the Church, and in Christ, and in the meanest brother for whom Christ died. This is the spiritual church. It is ever striving for the souls of men. Its prayers and tears are incessant for the salvation of the world from sin. It is the world of men seen in God—the world as God dwells in it. If a man would be saved, and know God, let him belong to that. How shall he fall into sin if he is truly within that charmed circle? Eyes watch him, hands reach to him from the innumerable company of the saints. This is the grace wherein he stands. Will he fool away his privilege? He may do so, yet the Divine Fact remains, and Grace waits, and the door stands open. Will he remain insensible, through pride of "modern thought," and disdain for the collective folly called a church, the chief avenue through which the Divine comes into our world? Yet, even then, he cannot help but reap some of its harvest of good, for if he speak of "God," it is inevitably the God whom the centuries' deposit of faith has brought to his notice. If he boasts that "character, not creed," saves, yet he means by character the ideal man in Jesus Christ. But if he be truly wise he will bow his head, and go the human way, and receive from men the grace of God.

The question of questions for our time is whether we are willing to take spiritual realities at their intrinsic value and not explain them away. For if we are in earnest with these deepest facts of our being, a great cry will arise in our hearts for the substantial truths of the Christian revelation. Whether we envisage the facts and needs of the spiritual life as "forgiveness of sins," or as "positive personal goodness," or as self-forgetting social effort, we cannot afford to dispense with the embodied living goodness which the Christian experience and tradition preserve to us, as it is gathered up and for ever imprinted on the mind and heart of our world by the great symbolic and sacramental figure of Christ. He is our living sacrament—at once both symbol of loving mercy and fact of it, shadow and substance, revelation and reality. There is no forgiving mercy, there is no consoling Divinity of Love known to Christian men, that is not shaped upon and filled out by the lineaments of that lovely Face. I know that the rationalist will here take offence, and think that we are slipping dangerously near to the swamps of metaphysical theologies. Oh, let us fling away such fears! To know Christ is to know the love of God, and to know it in the fullest way possible to men. Our newer theology does not isolate Christ, any more than it isolates God. "Christ" stands for undying love of all the good, of all the Christs, of the noble army of martyrs, of the faithful Son of Man and Servant of Jahweh crucified in all times and all lands for the hurt of the daughter of his people, bearing our transgressions, bringing to us the salvation of the Cross. It is through and by these that we are saved. Whether we know it or not, we stand in a great and wonderful grace. Who shall separate us from this love of Christ? Are we not bought with a price? The ages light up with its bursting glory, and the long story of man is transfigured into a new reading of the Gospel. The old preaching is truer than its apostles ever dreamed. The love and hate of Calvary are the world's epitome. Our faith is still directed towards a living and dying sacrifice; our redemption is still mediated; there is written over all our proudest achievement, there is whispered through all our humiliating failure, the one word "Grace."

OBITUARY.

THE REV. H. KELSEY WHITE.

It is with great regret that we have to record the death of the Rev. Henry Kelsey White, of Ashton-under-Lyne, at the early age of thirty-five. Until a few days before his death he had appeared to be in robust health, but then was found to be suffering from appendicitis, and although an operation was successfully performed, he sank rapidly on the following day, and passed away on the afternoon of Thursday, August 16.

Mr. White was a native of Cleethorpes, in Lincolnshire, where he was born September 13, 1870. He was for some time a board-school teacher at Hull, and as a member of the Church of England a regular Sunday-school teacher at St. Augustine's in that town; but coming under the influence of the Rev. H. W. Perris he became a Unitarian, and determined to devote himself to the ministry. In 1896 he entered the Unitarian Home Missionary College at Manchester, and having completed his course, became in 1901 minister of the recently formed congregation at Urmston, succeeding the Rev. W. C. Hall at Ashton in June of last year.

Mr. White was earnestly devoted to his work, and had already made his influence felt in the neighbourhood, beyond the borders of his own congregation. He was keenly interested in the building of the new church at Ashton, of which the foundation stone was this year laid. It is grievous that the early promise of his ministry should be so soon cut off. Mr. White leaves a widow, for whom the deepest sympathy will be felt.

The funeral was at Dukinfield Old Chapel on Monday week, and was very largely attended, the service being conducted by the Rev. Principal Gordon. Among those present were a number of Mr. White's brother ministers.

A MAN'S charity to those who differ from him upon great and difficult questions is in the ratio of his own knowledge; the more knowledge, the more charity.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XIV.—SIN AND PUNISHMENT.

WHATEVER may be said of the Doctrine of the Fall as a doctrine, there is undoubtedly a sense in which man has fallen from his first estate. We are at once nobler, and more debased, than our first ancestors. To them belonged the natural excesses which go with the struggle to multiply and to be strong. To apply the terms "lust" and "violence," terms of moral condemnation, to these excesses of animal instinct would be to antedate morality itself. But when, to the natural warfare without, had been added the beginning of a conflict within, then there arose the growth of a moral sense—and the growth also of an immoral sense. The development of intelligence carried with it an increased power of inventing evil. Sin, like a serpent, reared itself up, threw out new and monstrous shapes, brought forth unimagined issue. If earlier man was at all like the savage of to-day, he was only a child in vice; there are infamies amongst his civilised descendants which he never imagined. We may believe in the upward sweep of humanity as a whole, but in that sweep there are contrary motions—courses of madness and despair—which make for lower depths of wrong than were ever touched when the world was young. There is a sense in which adult life is a lapse from childhood, and there is a corresponding sense in which the last state of our race is worse than the first. For this state there can be no other name than sin.

Nor can we think of the triumph of goodness without thinking also of the punishment of sin. By punishment we mean something which implies reprobation. It is a common thing to say that sin is violation of law, that violated law avenges itself, and that in this way sin is punished. But laws do not "avenge" themselves; they are passionless and impersonal; the moral element is wanting, without which observance is not the same thing as doing right, and violation is not the same thing as doing wrong, and there is therefore nothing to chastise as wrong, and nothing to vindicate as right. Punishment is punishment only when it is connected with disapproval. A purely naturalistic explanation of sin cannot include the idea of punishment, for naturalism, though it may predict consequences, does not attribute blame; has a doctrine of causation, but not of retribution, still less of reprobation. To show that pain is punitive we must trace it back to displeasure, and state the connection in moral terms. What does this demand but that we should sometimes speak of the Wrath of God? To teach only the inexorableness of law is to teach a doctrine less moral than the old heathen notion of Nemesis.

The Biblical stories of the punishment of sin by flood and fire are very memorable and very salutary evidence of man's judgment on himself. In them he bears witness against himself, pronounces what he believes to be his own just sentence, and takes up the controversy of justice as the accuser, being himself the accused. They are signs, we may say, of a revelation within of the sinfulness of sin, and of the righteousness of punishment.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS: HOW HE FOUND A NEW WORLD.

ABOUT the time when printing was invented in Germany, and the wars of the Red and White Roses were making wild work in England, in the house of an honest weaver who lived beside the wall of the fair city of Genoa, there arrived a boy-babe, whose eyes made his mother think of the sea, and who, as the day happened to be St. Christopher's, received the name of that sturdy saint.

After schooling at home, and college in Italy, young Christopher Columbus was sent to sea before he was yet fifteen. The sailor's life was a rough one in those days, but he loved it. The sea was a world of mystery, too—mystery which, by and by, he himself helped to dispel—which kept men from daring to go too far beyond the Straits of Gibraltar—or the Pillars of Hercules, as they were called—save the coasting round the shores of Europe to carry on trade between the Mediterranean and the ports of England, France, and the Netherlands. As time went on, Columbus found his way to all these and other lands. Up the North Sea he went and away to Iceland and even beyond. "Wherever ship has sailed, there have I journeyed," he said. And still his passion grew to go farther and find out, what no man living could tell him, what lay beyond the setting sun, and to know the secrets of the world. When he became a captain he wanted to try and reach the North Pole, and to see if there were a way to China round the North of Russia—a North-east passage. But men were afraid to go far out of the beaten track, and wherever no one had been, they imagined it was impossible to go. Undiscovered lands they peopled with dragons and fire-breathing monsters, and men whose heads grew beneath their shoulders. A water-giant called the Bishop of the Sea was supposed to live beyond the Western horizon, and if any ship came within his reach his immense black hand was thrust up and dragged it down with all its crew. Finding that the air and the water grew hotter as they travelled towards the Equator, they supposed that if they went much further the sea would be boiling; while, as everyone then knew that the world was flat, there must be an edge over which the waters tumbled and roared into the regions of chaos and darkness below. To go in the face of all this needed an iron nerve. It needed also a great mind. Columbus had both; but he found it very hard to get people to believe that the earth was round, and if anything harder still to persuade others to come with him and see if they could not reach China by sailing across the Atlantic, and so right round the world.

Now it happened that off the coast of Portugal he, not for the first time in his life, was involved in a fierce sea-fight between Venetian merchant ships and pirates, and, Columbus's ship catching fire, he leaped into the sea, and, by the help of a spar, succeeded in swimming ashore, a distance of two leagues. He lived some years in Portugal, making maps and charts, and gradually collecting evidence to prove that the world was round, and that there were undiscovered countries across the Atlantic. If he only had ships manned and provisioned, he would go on a voyage of discovery. The King of Portugal would not help him, so he went to Spain. There King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella reigned together. Now Ferdinand was sly and cold-hearted, but Isabella was bold and generous. She was a Queen, too, who was not afraid of work, for she made all the King's shirts with her own fingers, and she admired such a brave, determined man as Columbus. But for fourteen years the King half-promised and still delayed to help him to start his expedition. Columbus was summoned before a council of monks and learned men at the University of Salamanca. But these were not as wise as they were learned. They only laughed at the great navigator for thinking that the world was round, and taught the children in the streets to mock him and call him madman.

So Columbus decided to leave Spain and try what success he could find in France or England.

He set out on foot with his young son Diego, to walk to Palos a port from which he could take ship to France. The boy being thirsty, they stopped at the gate of a monastery to ask for water. There, as they rested awhile, Columbus told his story of disappointment to the Prior, who was so moved that he went himself to the Queen, and she promised to provide two ships at her own cost. Some merchants then provided another, and said they would go with Columbus—but so reluctant were men to sail on the perilous voyage, that convicts refused to leave their prison to face such unknown dangers.

At last, however, all was ready. The good Prior came down to the harbour before dawn to bless the ships, and wish the travellers God Speed. No one ever expected to see them again. The sun rose, and with his finger of gold pointed the way to the Far West, and with a fair wind, the three little ships passed out of sight. Their names were the Santa Maria, the Pinta, and the Nina. Beset by storms their progress was slow. They had to stop for repairs at the Madeiras. Their provisions grew mouldy and stale, and at length were running short. Still on and on they sailed, without a glimpse of land until they were becalmed in the great sea of seaweed that lies in the midst of the Atlantic. The sailors grew mutinous, and if it had not been for the difficulty of finding the way home again, they might have thrown Columbus overboard. He promised them rich presents when the voyage was over, and especially to the man who should first sight land. He knew, but dare not tell, how far they had come. At last messengers of hope appeared in the form of a flight of small birds, which settled on the rigging and greeted the mariners with their merry twitter. So they knew they could not be very far from land. When the birds left, the helms were turned to follow them. But days followed with no further signs. The spirits of the men sank. Then some river weed and a thorn bush and a carved stick were fished up out of the sea—which last spoke of man and his arts. "With these signs," says Columbus, "they all breathed and were glad." One night when all but the watch had gone to sleep, Columbus still paced the deck. As he gazed through the darkness he thought he saw a light moving in the distance. It might be a torch in a fisherman's boat as he paddled along shore. Next morning, with the first streak of light, the boom of a gun fired from the Pinta was the signal that land had been discovered. There it lay, the low shore of an island. It was October 21, 1492. The long and daring voyage had ended happily. The discoverer and his men rowed ashore, and leaping from the boat, he knelt and kissed the sand. Planting the flag of Castile and Aragon, he claimed the island for his King and Queen, calling it San Salvador, or the Isle of the Blessed Saviour. A pleasing incident occurred when the mutinous sailors, throwing themselves at the feet of their Admiral, begged with tears that he would forgive them for their want of trust in him.

One of the vessels ran aground, and such violent tempests beset the homeward voyage that it seemed as if all knowledge of the discovery would be lost to Europe. According to the habits of those days, strange vows were made by the crews to the Virgin Mary if she would preserve their lives; and as they were preserved, the sailors kept their vows when they landed on the Azores, by going to church bare-foot, and in their shirts, every man carrying a candle 5 lbs. in weight.

The return to Spain was celebrated with great festivity. Columbus landed amid flags and bells and cheering crowds. He was received in state by the King and Queen, and told them his wonderful story.

Several times did Columbus go to and fro leading emigrants out to America and founding the colonies which made Spain the richest country in the world. But so little gratitude did these gold-seekers show for their leader that they finally threw him into prison and sent him back to Spain in chains. As Tennyson, in his strong, indignant words says,

"Chains for him who gave a new heaven,
a new earth!
Gave glory and more empire to the Kings of Spain than all their battles!
Chains for him
Who pushed his prow into the setting sun,
And made West East."

The great Queen, his staunch friend, died, and the mean-hearted Ferdinand robbed Columbus of his property and titles. And so, a poor man, old before his time, but with a calm, brave mind, he laid down and died at an inn in Valladolid, gently murmuring in Latin, In manus tuas Domine commendo spiritum meum—"Into thy hands, O Lord, I commit my spirit." He was a great, good man. Of his discovery he said reverently that God had given him the keys of the gates of the ocean, shut up with such mighty chains, and he had opened them.

ON GOING BACK TO SCHOOL.

THE school doors are re-opened this week for the children of the nation to enter in. Here we have one of those profoundly influential events which, because they are so ordinary, periodic, and unsensational, scarcely gain notice in the chronicles of the day, or attract even a passing consideration. The children themselves have marked the day, some of them grudgingly as they watched the dwindling store of the hours of play and frolic; some of them with insensitive forecast, and many others with eager anticipation. Perhaps the existence of this last group is the highest testimonial to the elementary school system, or at least to the teachers, through whose personality the system enters into the imagination of the child. To the parents also the time for re-opening the schools is an event of some importance in a personal sense, and with regard to the arrangements of the home. From now till Christmas time the lives of five million children will be regulated largely by the ringing of a bell, by the round of a clock say at 9 o'clock and again at 2 o'clock. That is just a symbol of the way in which the convictions of society, as worked out in its institutions, will day by day be wrought into the minds of the citizens of the future. It is because the influence of the school is so pervasive and far-reaching, because also these children, brought thus under control for ends they themselves cannot explain, are the men and women of the next age, that the return to school after the holidays merits our thought.

The dint made on the consciousness of the child by the return to school on the first day of a new term naturally varies in depth with his age as well as with his temperament. Those boys and girls who are of the middle age—middle aged, i.e., as school children—perhaps regard it with a comparative indifference, similar to that with which the middle-aged man of business looks upon his birthday. The child of eleven, who is already beginning to think himself more than a child, certainly has not, as a rule, the excited looking forward to the opening of the school which is usual with the youngsters who go this week for the first time. To him it is a day of mark. He has talked for weeks of this his venture into the unknown. There will be in all probability no other crisis (with the possible exception of marriage) so distinctly marked in his life history as this. Later on he will become wage-earner, but he will enter into that estate by gradual stages. Later on he will become a man, but he does not enter manhood with the abruptness which signals his transition from babyhood to schoolboy. It is little wonder if his mind thrills with unimagined vehemence. Wonder were, if he did not keep the family on tenterhooks as the hour approaches. Wonder is that while the personal issue is thus appreciated by the child, the social issue is so slightly realised by the nation. A figure may help us when we reflect that each year something approaching a million children reach the school age. If we were a people gifted with imagination, or if we had any genius for great public ceremonies of any order higher than a Lord Mayor's Show, we might gain much from some symbolic recognition and celebration of this great spiritual experience of the child who goes for the first time to school.

Other thoughts, and some of them disconcerting and serious enough, throng upon us if we allow the procession of the boys and girls who have just left school to pass before our eyes. For them the school bell rings no more. Such elementary education as the wisdom of the nation could, out of its great penury, devise, they have received. They are left now to the chances of the market. This sudden withdrawal of social guardianship would be explicable if the schoolboy did at a leap pass from childhood to manhood. He does become in some degree a wage-earner, and, as he achieves a measure of economic independence, he claims also too large a freedom from guidance and control. We turn them out of school alert, adventurous, industrious boys and girls, and leave them to walk alone the ill-marked paths and tangled ways of the Forest Perilous, wherein lies the castle of manhood and womanhood. Their own vigil they must keep, and their own knighthood gain. But for all that the nation which has taught them as children will yet be compelled to assist them in the great adventure. If they need social support from 5 to 14, they do not become self-sufficing then. This is the first of the difficult questions which force themselves on our attention when we think of the children who are leaving school. Another thought, one which is akin to this, and is, indeed, a special application of it, has to do with efficiency. At the present time public discussion is ranging round the possibility of restoring the old system of apprenticeship. Well, the old system is old, and we shall no doubt be unable simply to go back on it. It does, however, serve to mark the precise nature of the case which has to be met. Apprenticeship meant, among other things, this: that for the growing boy there was needed a directorate other than his own, and a discipline beyond what the home could supply. The master became the agent of the nation and represented social control in the mind of the young man. This was not always so in practice, for apprenticeship often became too selfish, too merely personal and mercantile. But in principle society, when it determined the indenture, constituted the act a social one. The need for such control and for insuring the acquirement of dignity and skill is at the root of the feeling after a modern apprenticeship system. If we turn from the case of the boy to that of the girl, the necessity is more overwhelming. Society wants women who have gained skill and power in all those arts of life which every mother has to discharge (always excepting the few who can purchase the services of others). Then society must provide a school and a discipline. At present little girls of twelve years old and under are expected to acquire knowledge which belongs to womanhood. Of course the lessons have to be rather unreal, and equally, of course, they are mostly ill learnt. It is in the years which follow the present school life that grown girls must be taught these things, if it be sincerely desired that the homes of the future shall be administered by women of skill and power.

But if the opening of the schools is thus so full of promise for the child of five, if it suggests such big issues in respect of the boys and girls of fourteen, what is to be said with regard to those other children who now are undergoing the influence of public elementary education. What are our ideals of education? The tendency at the moment is away from book learning. The age seems in agreement with the Preacher in holding "much study is a weariness of the flesh." The cry is for freer development of human power. The tendency to which we refer is more in the nature of dissatisfaction with the old system of "cram" than anything else. But it rests on a great change in national thought. Mere book learning has been found not to be the moral influence it was expected to prove; and the ability to write has been found not to lead to universal and prosperous humility. By small stages the school code begins to reflect the new thought. The custom of trying to keep babies to strict attention during a fifty minutes' reading lesson has become discredited. And if this is a small thing in itself it shows the direction of the current. In a word, the change indicates a much higher valuation of the imaginative powers and a relative depreciation of mechanical accuracy in repetition. Whereas the goddesses of the school have been the Daughters of Memory, they are yielding place to the Daughters of Imagination. The revolution here indicated is immense, and is entirely in harmony with the whole trend of present-day thought in social affairs. Closely related to this subject is that of the need for a greatly increased teaching staff. This is imperatively called for on every ground. Even from the point of view of mechanical efficiency, the classes are far too large; and, if we really wished to have an educated populace, the number of teachers would immediately be doubled. The demand for smaller classes is not, however, based wholly or chiefly on efficiency, but on the incalculable value and illimitable reach of personal influence between pupil and teacher. This force is an imaginative spiritual power, and is coming to be regarded as the transcendent interest in education. Such are some of the many considerations suggested by the reopening of the public schools of the people. There are many others which will occur to those who see in education rightly directed a mighty force towards social well-being. They all gather themselves up into one thought. Ideals of method such as those to which we have referred derive their significance entirely from our ideals of manhood. The schools are so important because on them and the use we make of them so largely depends the quality of the citizens of the next age. The central thought round which many subsidiary purposes cling is to be found in the conviction of the need for developing the sense of social responsibility. Boys and girls are to grow to manhood and womanhood in the faith that they are members one of another, and members of a social being which demands their loyalty. In this idea the demand for school meals reveals its secret. To join at a common table, and to receive the hospitality of the commonwealth will, it is thought, give to the guests instinctively a sense of being welcome members in a fraternity, and will react in creating a disposition of duty to that fraternity. The recent syllabus of instruction in citizenship rests on the same persuasion, and moves towards the same goal. The discussion of aims of education introduces us to the whole range of political life as surely as it drives us deep down to those forces which control destiny because they affect character.

My life shall be a challenge, not a truce.

GATEWAYS TO THE SOUL.

II.—TASTE AND SMELL.

THE humblest position in the scale of sense is occupied by taste. It is a sense in which a considerable proportion of the population is defective, without, however, suffering much inconvenience. That is also true, to perhaps a greater extent, of the sense of smell. The tendency of civilised life would seem to be toward rendering these faculties obsolete, for in savage life, and still more in animal life, they play a very important part. The usefulness of these senses is very plainly indicated by the way in which a horse will first smell and, if doubtful, will nibble at a strange offering, and then drop it as unsuitable. Domesticated animals, on the other hand, having so long had this discrimination made for them by proxy, will commit mistakes; for horses and kine will eat the yew and be poisoned by it. Children also have died through eating the berries of the Nightshade, though their attraction lies in their colour rather than their taste.

Their Purpose.

By means of these senses we would seem to be naturally endowed with a power of discriminating between wholesome and unwholesome food. Warning or approval is inherent in their exercise. I believe I am safe in saying that no sweet-scented plants are poisonous; and no offensively tasting foods are nutritious.

Their Place in Literature.

Modern criticism has established the canon that references to the pleasures of the table are bad form in a poem. Yet a large number of expressions in ancient writings and modern current speech derive their strength from love of food and drink. A special title for one who manifests a keen discrimination in appraising works of art or music or who responds with ready sensibility to their appeal is "a person of taste." The Scotch use the term sermon-taster. We still speak of conversation as being well-spiced with humour. "Taste and see the goodness of the Lord," exhorted the Psalmist. "Taste the good word of God" occurs in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Hunger and thirst have furnished some of the choicest similes in the Old and New Testament. "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God." Among the Beatitudes that come ringing across the centuries with sweet persuasion is one upon those that hunger and thirst after righteousness. Christ is reported to have said that his "meat and drink" was to do the will of the Father.

How little association, however, the sense of taste has with mental states is illustrated by the fact that we can hardly remember a taste; and in dreaming of a feast, people see the viands, but rarely dream of their savour. In Emile Rousseau has said that taste is the only sense which has nothing to say to the imagination, while smell strongly arouses the imagination, and odours are very closely connected with mental suggestion.

Smell belongs to a higher order. The place which incense has found in religious ceremony and the phrase "odours of sanctity" seem to indicate a case of special consecration.

Sensitiveness.

Though comparatively a coarse endowment, a refined sensitiveness has to be recorded in the exercise of this sense. Through the olfactory nerve the human mind can distinguish the presence of Bromine, though it exist only in the proportion of one thirty-thousandth part of a milligram in a cubic centimeter of air. Sulphuretted hydrogen, though existing but as one part in a million, makes itself felt, while musk may be detected though but two-millionth part of a milligram. The king in this realm of the multitudinously divisible would seem to be Mercaptan (sulphydrate of ethyl), which requires but 1-9,200,000th part of a milligram to make itself perceptible.

The Divisible-indivisible World.

By means of this finite-infinite miracle, Nature is able to make her rare things go a long way. All rare things are minutely common and universal; like radium, which is scattered through the world, myriads of whose molecules hide in every hand-breadth of water upon the sea; like genius, like saintlihood, like godlikeness, germs of which lie in every human breast.

As an instance of Nature's use of her rare substances, we may take coumarin. You have stood in the May-time beside a field of new-mown hay, and enjoyed the scent whose waft is redolent of sunny hours, bird-song, flower-radiance, and rustic happiness. It is a very humble-looking grass that distils this fragrance—anthoxanthum odoratum—and the total essence that scents the field could perhaps be carried in a single cup of the harebell. Common are the elements that enter into this odorous coumarin ($C_9H_6O_2$), but its fragrance is as precious as the spikenard that anointed the feet of the Master. Into such attenuated detail of refinement does Nature carry her united purpose of usefulness and beauty, and the gateway to our knowledge of such marvel is our sense of smell.

How we Smell.

In order that we may detect the presence of volatile substances through this sense, some kind of vibration must be communicated to the olfactory nerve and thence to the brain. I need not here cite the commonplace remark that we smell, as we see, or hear, with the brain—not the nose, eye, or ear. More so in the case of smelling than any of the others. The olfactory nerve is the only one directly connected with the hemispheres of the brain, where intellectual processes go on, being not a nerve at all, but a part of the brain in intimate connection with its anterior lobes. In this way has the close connection traced between odour and the imagination been physiologically explained.

The active motion in the fragrant substance is communicated to the odoriferous ether and thence to the brain, and as a result, if the vibrations are within a certain range, we detect smell. But, as there are rays invisible to us, and vibrations beyond our reach of hearing, so there are vibrations too subtle in the realm of odours to affect us. We cannot distinguish, as far as smell goes, the existence of hydrogen, oxygen, water-gas, and many others. Substances having a low molecular weight escape our detection by this means. As they become more dense, as they attain fifteen times the density of hydrogen, we acquire a faint smell. Examples may be taken from the paraffin series. Marsh-gas is inodorous; a heavier gas, ethane, gives a faint smell; butane, twice as heavy as the last, affords a very distinct smell.

Sense-Lore the Crudest.

We thus see that we can recognise through the sense only the crudest, the densest, the grossest among substances. Increase in density means increase in sensuous comprehension. The Logos must become very grossly enfleshed before we can see His grace and truth. But where He dwells in thinnest veils, we see Him not. As things become rarer, as they escape from the pressure of circumstance, break through the prison-house of gross materiality, we lose ken of them, though they be not lost. So that to understand the nature of even a common gas we need other faculties than furnished by organs of sense. Our knowledge of the world is, therefore, of necessity of the roots of the lotus plunged in the mud. We gain but glimpses of the leaves and stem which dwell in the water above, and nothing know of the pure blossom that bares its bosom to the sun and wafts its fragrance on the summer air.

"Here is the world," writes Emerson, "sound as a nut, perfect, not the smallest piece of chaos left, never a stitch nor an end, not a mark of haste or botching or second thought; but the theory of the world is a thing of shreds and patches."

That our known world is but a fragment of the world of fragrances is suggested by the keener sensibility of those born blind and deaf. It has been said of James Mitchell that he chiefly depended on smell for keeping up a connection with the outer world. He readily observed the presence and position of strangers in the room, and formed a notion of their character from their scent.

Mental Suggestiveness of Odour.

I recently read a long poem with the object of examining the part played in it by the sense under discussion, and was struck by the large number of references to aromas, perfumes, sweet-breaths, redolences, fragrances, that occurred.

The exercise of this sense makes up much of the charm of Nature. We love flowers for their shapeliness, we adore them for their colours, but when they possess the additional virtue of delicious fragrance our admiration is considerably enhanced. The garlic has very pretty flowers, but the odour compels us to love and leave severely alone. A favourite flower, on the contrary, is sure to possess a sweetness of scent, and is very likely associated with some romance, or inspiration in the life of its favourer. A waft of perfume will unlock caskets where dearest treasures of memory are hid, and flood us with a stream of sentiment which belongs to a long-buried past.

O. W. Holmes records that the herb everlasting, the fragrant immortelle of our autumn fields, had the most suggestive odour to him of all those that set him a-dreaming. "I can hardly describe the strange thoughts and emotions that come to me as I inhale the aroma of its pale, dry, rustling flowers. A something it has of sepulchral spicery, as if it had been brought from the core of some great Pyramid, where it had lain on the breast of a mummied Pharaoh. Something, too, of immortality in the sad, faint sweetness lingering so long in its lifeless petals. Yet this does not tell why it fills my eyes with tears and carries me in blissful thought to the banks of asphodel that border the River of Life."

For some similar reason Schiller kept apples in the drawer of his writing-desk for the value of their fragrance in suggesting poetical ideas. Thus the world of sense is indissolubly wedded to the soul-world, home of ideals that reach beyond our grasp, over which breathes the ambrosial air of affection and pass the honied hours that make "life a perfumed altar-flame." An experience that starts as sensation, passes into the mind, and is felt along the heart, and generating a serene and blessed mood links sense to soul, and makes the visible gateway an entrance to spiritual arcana.

"She keeps the gift of years before,
A wither'd violet is her bliss."
"Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory—
Odours, when sweet violets sicken,
Live within the sense they quicken."

The visible realm is not separated from the invisible; thought has raised bridges delicate and radiant as a rainbow arch whereon to pass from one to the other. Thus things seen and felt and touched and smelt become emblems of the most sacred moods and holiest moments. May not the planets and stars be symbols in the mind of God of the rapture of Creation, and their motion recall the radiant hour "when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy"? May not the perfume of field and woodland, moor and meadow, be as a sweet savour to the Lord of the world, linked in the Divine thought to a compassion more tender than a mother's, faithful and unforgetting?

The Fragrance of a Good Life.

"We are told by mariners who sail on the Indian seas," writes the author of In Tune with the Infinite, "that many times they are able to tell their approach to certain islands long before they can see them by the sweet fragrance of the sandal-wood that is wafted far out upon the deep. Do you not see how it would serve to have such a soul playing through such a body that as you go here and there a subtle, silent force goes out from you, bringing peace and joy into the homes of men and shedding a benediction wherever you go?"

It is such a subtle, silent force that streams from lives that are fostered by the milk of human kindness, and graced with that gentleness which, when it weds with manhood, makes a man. In familiar lines, Wordsworth has sung of these noble emanations:

"More sweet than odours caught by him who sails
Near spicy shores of Araby the blest,
A thousand times more exquisitely sweet

The freight of holy feeling which we meet,
In thoughtful moments, wafted by the gales From fields where good men walk, or bowers wherein they rest."

J. TYSSUL DAVIS.

TENNYSON'S "GRAIL."

I.

How can an ideal or a principle be at one and the same time morally obligatory and morally destructive?

Such is the question that presses on the reader as he closes the poem which Browning affirmed was Tennyson's "best and highest." And the question does not trouble merely the logician, or the man who seeks in poetry an ethical "criticism of life"; it equally arrests the ordinary reader, who naturally expects that a single subject in a single poem shall have some unity of interpretation. The "Grail," or mystic cup, in which the Idyll centres, symbolises some object of moral quest, some duty, principle, or ideal. So much is clear. It is also clear that the King views the pursuit of this with disfavour. It will prove, he says, the ruin of the seekers, and will "maim" the Order he has made. Now the King, on Tennyson's own authority, stands for "the highest of human men."* And the narrative carries out to a great extent the King's forebodings. The highest humanity, then, and poetic fact concur in deprecating a high spiritual ideal. Progressive morality is at war with itself. The "high" proves "too high," the "heroic" "for earth too hard." We are to content ourselves with macadamised precept, or else, breaking through at inner impulse or open vision, are to find ourselves following "wandering fires, lost in the quagmire"! Was "the Kingdom," then, an ignis fatuus? Was Calvary the hapless goal of disillusion? Does God indeed set false beacon lights, and mock us with "the consecration and the poet's dream"? The question at the head of this paper repeats itself.

Did Tennyson waver between Malorian narrative and lofty allegory and accept a crude compromise between the two? The theory has been advanced, but surely a slovenlier piece of conjecture, one, moreover, unworthier both of poet and subject, could hardly be formulated. We know that his conception of the whole cycle of the Idylls was, in the beginning, far from definite. We know that he protested against the coarse thumb and finger of ingenious comment. "I hate to be tied down to say, This means that" (Life, ii 127). But we also know that he put forth the Holy Grail with a Miltonic seriousness exceeding even the general trend of the Idylls. Anyone who doubts this will be convinced on reading the scattered notes in the Life.

There is another theory, that in his treatment of the subject Tennyson struck out an entirely new line; that, forsaking the adventurous mood of Malory and others, he makes the great Search yield the lesson of the superiority of abiding at home, not, indeed, in inglorious ease, but in the steady and orderly pursuit of social reformation. "The symbolism is wheeled right round," says Mr. Stopford Brooke;* "the search for the Grail is a mistake, an evil and not a good." Then what of Galahad? What of his solemn confession to Percivale in that tremendous moment before he is rapt to "the spiritual city"?

* See Life, vol. ii, p. 90.

"In the strength of this I rode,
Shattering all evil customs everywhere,
And passed through Pagan realms, and
made them mine,
And dashed through Pagan hordes, and
bore them down,
And broke through all, and in the strength
of this
Come victor."

So acute a critic as Mr. Stopford Brooke cannot let these lines pass. In a footnote on Galahad he adds, "I think there is more in it than this" (the social reform theory). "The image of the stainless knight, . . . independent altogether of ascetic theology, was one of the finest 'motives' Art could have," and this motive Tennyson preserved "even though his own view of duty was opposed. . . . The artist was stronger than the social moralist." That is to say that in opposing the vanity of the Grail to "the level of every day's most quiet need," the poet was arrested by the magnificent conception of Galahad as an art-subject, and the sermon had a dramatic interlude. Settle down, says the poem, organise reforms where you are, be an Arthur; but in the meantime here's a fine picture of an old-time ascetic who went abroad in dazzling armour and broke through all. This is not to be resisted. It goes counter to all the sermon says—like the hymns when chosen by the choir; but it affords a glorious interval. This not only takes Galahad right out of the context, placing the entire incident along with the shorter poem on the same subject, but it strikes out of the sphere of everyday duty the two most radiant spiritual conceptions of the Idylls—for, of course, we must regard Percivale's sister in the light we regard Galahad. To sum up, if "the search is a mistake," and the burden of the poem is the superiority of the "common task," and Galahad and the maiden form an artistic aside, then the common task is denied the eager note of a radiant spirituality—surely the very thing that the toiler in lowly fields most needs!

But the Grail and the search for it do not disappear with the ethical elimination of Galahad. One thinks of Percivale and Sir Bors and Lancelot, into whose spiritual fortunes the Grail enters. Indeed, it is interwoven in the fabric of the poem so variedly that if we are to conclude that the search for it is an evil and not a good, the idyll remains a hopeless confusion. May one be pardoned for saying, "I think there is more in it even than this"?

It is when we turn to the exact spiritual significance of the King that I venture to think a clue to the unity of the poem will be found. And here let it be frankly admitted that Art is powerless to interpret a piece of art spiritually conceived and wrought without a spiritual key. Allegories have gone somewhat out of fashion, and it is perhaps as well we should have a rest from them. The "teaching" of poets has become something of a bore, for the kind of mind the poets reach is one which abhors explicitness and definition. But while we rejoice in this as opening new vistas, let us admit that some of the greatest works of art in song and scene have been frankly allegories. Spenser and Bunyan, Dürer and Cervantes, are Art eternally, but they are eternally incomprehensible without spiritual discernment. They wrote and painted purely to "teach," and without a clue to their teaching their Art is landscape without sunshine. To sunder spirituality and Art is to pluck beauty from the bosom of God—and find it languish and die in an alien air.

In Tennyson's earliest notes for the Idylls, drafted about 1835, the King expressly stands for religious faith. True, "the allegorical drift here marked out"—to quote again the Life—"was changed in the later scheme of the Idylls" (ii. 123). The fact remains, however, that the poet thought it of sufficient importance to hand to Mr. Knowles as late as 1869 as a guide to the poems. Probably the "alteration" refers, inter alia, to an expansion of the King's significance from a principle to the embodiment of that principle in a life of "most glorious striving," in whom we see Faith living, working, fighting, rejoicing in the order he has made.

Be this our starting-point. The King stands for faith of (for lack of a better term) the "common-sense" type—the faith of a Wesley, a Priestley, a Gordon. Special vouchsafements are not made to this type of faith, for it does not need them. It is just common sense led and taught of Heaven. It is pre-eminently the faith of those who do the kind of work symbolised by Arthur's achievements.

Now, the search for the grail, be it noted, has its beginnings in wonders and excitements. When the rumour of Percivale's sister having actually seen the vision spreads among the rest, they are moved to prayer:

"Expectant of the wonder that would be,"

and

"Then came a year of miracle."

"Wonder" and "vision" are the words used throughout the poem for the Grail, except where the title-name is used. The fact of its being styled a "vision," and the King's words:

"One hath seen, and all the blind will see," indicate that it is something super-normal even in a spiritual order of things, the "blind" being men of equal religious fervour with Galahad and the nun. Even the King himself we must place among the "blind," since he had not seen the vision. Yet the King stands for "religious faith." What is it, then, to which religious faith may be blind? To spiritual things made visible. In that marvellous passage at the close of the poem Arthur confesses he has visions, but that they are visions of God, vouchsafed him in and through his calling and constituting a normal experience.

What, then, is the "wonder" and the "vision" which "one hath seen and all the blind will see"? In the past of human history it has taken many forms; the stigmata of St. Francis, the voices of St. Joan, the re-appearance of the departed, the sign of the cross in the heavens, the cup from which a saviour drank and the spear which pierced his side. Such visions are facts of history—i.e., they are as indisputable, tested by the common law of evidence, as the battle of Marathon. They are apparently isolated because their antecedents move on a plane invisible to us. We cannot blot them from History if we would, and we would not because of their magnificent results. Such wonders as the vision that arrested Colonel Gardiner are facts to which the whole Race owes a debt, if only as indicating the onward and spiritual trend of its destiny. In the making of mankind they are factors of immense moment. And what is true of the race is true of the poem. So far from the search for the Grail being a "mistake," so far from Galahad being the artistic aside in a delineation of practical faith, the one is essential to the other. No Galahads, no Arthurs; for both are faith, both spring from the same source; they differ merely in manifestation.

In a word, the poem brings before us two great types of Faith, harmonious, or only discordant when, as in Gawain, the element of insincerity, or, as in Lancelot, that of sin, or, as in Percivale, that of self-centredness, is present. But then self, sin, and insincerity are not of faith at all; therefore the King (work-a-day faith) says gladly to Galahad:

"For such

As thou art is the vision. . . .
Thy holy nun and thou have seen a sign."
And therefore it is that, while Arthur, with the inward vision, goes on his conquering way, Galahad, with the open vision, breaks through all and comes victor. So the two elements in the poem are perfectly harmonious. The "blind" King who fulfils his mission without "the light that never was on land or sea," and the radiant Galahad from whose side the actual sight of the Holy Thing never failed, are really one. The true significance of the Grail is seen in the types of men who, vastly differing, fill in the space between the King and Galahad—Percivale, Sir Bors, Lancelot, and Gawain. T. J. H.

ADMIRERS of the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and they are legion, will be glad to have the Sixth Lees and Raper Memorial Lecture, delivered by him last autumn at Leeds, and entitled "Law and the Liquor Traffic." The lecture contains much useful information as to legislation, actual and proposed, for the control of the trade, and Sir Wilfrid's well-known opposition to the newer schools of temperance reformers is again emphasised. He will have nothing to do with licensing schemes which recognise the probability of the traffic continuing indefinitely; on the contrary, he still calls for prohibition and the extreme policy. The lecture is instructive as an unofficial pronouncement for the United Kingdom Alliance. Among other points we notice Sir Wilfrid's expectation that the Liberal Government would, in its first session, undo the miserable policy of the Act of 1904. Always optimistic, he was in this too sanguine, but one still hopes that it will not be long before the false principles set up two years ago is abandoned.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCA- SHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT ON PUBLIC QUESTIONS.*

The Poor Law.

THE appointment of a Royal Commission to investigate and report upon the administration of the Poor Law throughout England and Wales is a symptom of a widespread and growing conviction that the time has come for great changes in, if not for the entire abolition of, the present Poor Law and the Boards of Guardians who administer it.

The principles which are supposed to be at the basis of the existing law may be quoted as follows:—"It is an admitted maxim of social polity that the first charge on land must always be the maintenance of the people reared upon it. This is the principle of the English Poor Law."—Nichol's "History of the Poor Law." "That every society upon arriving at a certain stage of civilisation finds it positively necessary for its own sake—that is to say, for the satisfaction of its own humanity, and for the due performance of the purposes for which society exists—to provide that no person, no matter what has been his life, or what may be the consequences, shall perish for want of the bare necessities of existence."—"The Poor Law," T. W. Fowle, Chapter I.

Earlier legislation under Elizabeth, in 1694, and George III., in 1819, went further than this, and distinctly enjoined the finding of employment and apprenticeships, and imposed penalties for neglect of such duties on the part of the Overseers, but the modern Poor Law of 1834, if it did not formally repeal such enactments, undoubtedly intended to modify considerably their effect, and we may take it that the quotations above given stand as fair statements of the intention of the modern Poor Law.

How glaringly the administration of the law has departed from these principles is plain from a few well-known and easily ascertainable facts, which space will not permit to be proved at length.

(1) The admitted and declared object of many Poor Law Guardians is not to see that the bare necessities of life are available for every inhabitant, but simply and solely to keep down the rates and limit the expenditure.

(2) Owing to the incomplete fulfilment of their legal and moral duty by Guardians, as a rule, a vast system of private charity for the relief of distress has grown up, largely, of course, exploited by fraudulent and idle persons; but finding its reasons for existence in the well-known fact that it is possible for people to die of starvation in spite of the existence of Guardians of the Poor.

(3) The extent and the abuse of this private charity has called into existence powerful and extensive societies for its organisation and control. The Charity Organisation Society has now become a second Poor Law administration, supported by voluntary agencies, and is in its turn becoming supplemented or replaced by Civic Guilds of Help, which have been already established at Bradford, Eccles, Halifax, Leicester, Swinton, and Pendlebury, and are contemplated in other places. It is interesting to note that the Liverpool Central Relief Society adopted almost identical methods in the carrying on of their work on the initiative of Mr. William Rathbone in 1887.

(4) Despite the fact that the avowed object of many Guardians is to save the rates, the proportion of expenditure actually used in the relief of the poor, and that spent in administration, building, &c., is reckoned throughout England and Wales as roughly two-thirds administration and one-third relief. It is in the vast majority of cases more than half for administration, less than half for relief.

(5) The variation in the practice of administration in different Poor Law Unions, sometimes bordering on each other, is enormous. Mr. Fowle gives the proportion of out-door relief to in-door relief when he wrote as 27.9 per cent. in the Metropolis, 84.9 per cent. in Wales, and 78 per cent. in the South-Western portion of England.

Some Guardians prefer to board out the children, others keep them in the House. Some pay an adequate sum to keep the old people in the homes of their children or relations, others cut down the dole to a minimum (2s. 6d. per week), and offer them the alternative of the House, where the expense to the ratepayers of maintenance would be from three to four times that amount. Some Guardians do relieve in cases of out of work or sickness steadily, until the temporary cause of distress is removed, others relieve for three or four weeks only and then stop, as a Relieving Officer once put it, "to see if we can shake them off."

(6) Perhaps the severest condemnation of the system is the hatred and terror with which it is for the most part viewed by the people for whose benefit it exists. It is true that this feeling has been much modified in recent years and in certain localities where more humane methods of workhouse administration have been adopted. That the objection may now fairly be urged is owing, first, to the proper pride of independence and the dislike of accepting public help, with its penalty of disfranchisement and loss of self-respect and liberty, and, secondly, to a memory of a past state of things now largely abandoned.

But the machine-like officialism, as generally worked, of the Poor Law system, its lack of personal touch on the part of the Guardians with the poor they are supposed to guard, with noteworthy exceptions, especially on the part of lady Guardians, whose work in this direction merits high commendation, the dull routine of idle life in the workhouse (so misnamed), are responsible still for a great amount of this mistrust and active dislike. To anyone accustomed to move amongst the poor, not only of our large towns, but also of our villages, the saying—"I would rather die than go to the workhouse," is one of the most familiar phrases heard, and is at the same time a terrible condemnation of the supposed refuge for human beings who have fallen in the fierce struggle, or who seek a corner in which to end their day in peace

Confining ourselves to the first object, opinion seems to be concentrating, primarily, on the necessity of classifying carefully the various cases of destitution and distress which at present legally are all dealt with by the same law, and practically in the same way.

It is manifestly unjust and injurious to place in one category—

(1) Able-bodied men and women temporarily out of employment.

(2) Partially disabled and incompetent men and women, the first to be discharged, the last to be employed, who can only find a precarious and casual employment.

(3) The idle, the criminal, those who will not work if they can help it, those who prey upon the weakness and good feelings of their fellows.

(4) The chronically sick, and the aged beyond work.

The casual ward, out-door relief, the workhouse, are to-day the legal remedies for the ills of all these classes alike.

In saying this we do not lose sight of the establishment of Distress Committees under the Unemployed Act of last year, but their limited powers and stinted finances have rendered it impossible for them to do more than raise expectations which they have been compelled to leave unfulfilled. They have not dealt with even the first of the three classes, still less with the second, and the third and fourth are outside their purview altogether.

With regard to the first class, the existing charitable agencies are probably competent in some localities to deal with cases of this kind, especially when employment throughout the country is fairly brisk; but in a large congested population, the distress caused by the constant ebb and flow of industry, presses hard upon the worker, upon whom society depends for its very existence, and who should be, therefore, its first care. It should not be left to pecuniary help, however free from demoralising and patronising influences, to supply an insurance fund of this nature for those whom misfortune has deprived temporarily of the power of earning their livelihood.

With the second and third of these classes, private charity, however well-intentioned, is often worse than useless, it is positively harmful; it drives numbers of the second into the third, and by means of such charity they live, and are thus deprived of the wholesome stimulus of necessity for the improvement of character, which might be made a means of permanently recovering them for the honest and effective work of the world.

These considerations point to a solution of the problem for the present on possibly the following lines:—

(1) The extension of the powers, financial and otherwise, of the Distress Committees of the local authorities, and the provision of work at fair and adequate wages for those who are temporarily or chronically unable to find employment for themselves, both men and women; by the Bureau system, bringing them into touch with private employers; by the extension of municipal industries for the public benefit; and also by the cultivation of land and the production of food supplies for themselves and the community in and near which they live.

(2) The provision, in connection with Labour Bureaux, of communication with Bureaux in various parts of the country and even abroad, and facilities in genuine cases for advances of food and expenses to workmen seeking work in other districts, and the use of a shelter or ward for a night's rest on such journeys.

(3) The establishment, probably under the control of the police, of penal colonies, for those who will not avail themselves, either of work which they can find themselves, or that of the public authority. Careful and kindly discipline, which will gradually train the inmates of the colonies into a desire for their own emancipation, a wish to work for themselves and the community.

(4) As regards the sick and aged, the provisions of Old Age Pensions and the Hospital System, whether privately or municipally supported, are the palpable means of dealing with such cases. Our existing workhouses might be made use of for these purposes, or, in a few cases, for the purpose of the penal colonies.

The evils, the inequalities, the waste, the hardships of the existing system, or want of system, are too glaring and too widespread to be left alone. The awakened conscience of the nation calls loudly for a way out of one of the dark parts of Darkest England.

Your Committee venture to hope that the consideration of this matter will engage the attention of all the members of the Assembly.

Infant Mortality.

The subject of Infant Mortality is one for anxious consideration, and is becoming of vital importance to the future welfare of the nation. It is a matter of common knowledge that mortality among our infant population is excessively high, especially in crowded town districts, but it is not so generally recognised that while, as a result of improved sanitary and social conditions, the general death-rate has declined from 23 to 17 per 1,000 of the population during the last 50 years, there has been no corresponding fall in the infant death-rate in this country, but rather an increase during the last 20 years.

This continued high mortality amongst infants, in face of the marked improvements in the surroundings and education of the people, is food for serious reflection by all interested in sanitation, but when considered in conjunction with the steadily declining birth-rate it assumes a more serious aspect. It has generally been considered that a high birth-rate is productive of a high death-rate owing to the increased number of young children, whose mortality rate is high. If that be so, it is anomalous that in this country, now that the birth-rate has declined by nearly twenty-five per cent., the infant death-rate shows no signs of diminution.

The conditions tending to increase infant mortality may be divided into those affecting the child before or at birth, and those after birth.

Of those affecting the child before birth, early marriages, physical weakness of one or both parents, the employment of married women, and intemperance, all contribute their share to the large number of deaths from premature birth and debility, and the remedies are apparent, but not easy to carry out.

Among recognised causes adversely affecting infants after birth may be mentioned overcrowding, illegitimacy, insanitary conditions, employment of mothers, improper feeding, neglect, and the inexperience of mothers.

The effect of the employment of women on the infant mortality is undoubtedly prejudicial, and in the districts where the proportion of women engaged in industrial occupations is large, the infant death-rate is high. It has been shown that the infant mortality in the Potteries varies directly with the proportion of married women employed, and in the cotton districts of Lancashire a similar relationship exists.

Improper feeding and management, if not the most potent, are serious factors in the mortality of infants, and the fact that diarrhoeal diseases are specially fatal among hand-fed children has on many occasions been demonstrated. Medical men, health visitors, and others with opportunities of judging, believe that artificial feeding of infants has considerably increased, and is still increasing. Under the best conditions, the substitution of an artificial diet for the natural food of an infant could not be expected to be advantageous, but when we know that the substitutes for mother's milk are chosen without any regard for, or knowledge of, the infant's requirements in the way of food, and that indigestible and non-nutritious materials form the staple diet of a considerable proportion of our infant population, no other result than illness and death may be looked for among the unfortunate recipients. It is possible that at the present time there are more mothers than was the case fifty years ago who are unable properly to suckle their infants, owing to the greater stress of life and the more artificial conditions under which we live, but it is also certain that a much larger proportion are physically capable of providing their infants with natural food, but through indifference or love of pleasure resort to hand feeding.

Apart from feeding, the neglect of infants—owing to ignorance or indifference—largely influences mortality. The importance of cleanliness, not only of the dwelling, but of the infant's clothing, bedding, and feeding bottles by quite a large proportion of the people is entirely overlooked. The clothing is unsuitable, the infants are allowed to crawl on a dirty floor, and when they become querulous or ill, the usual remedy is a foul india-rubber teat, or a dose of soothing syrup.

A large proportion of the mortality from bronchitis and pneumonia among infants is undoubtedly preventable. Much of it, no doubt, results from dampness, draughtiness, and other defects of dwellings, but much of it is also caused by mothers carrying their infants in all weathers from warm and stuffy rooms into the cold air in the course of their shopping and visits to neighbours. When one considers how often in the feeding and management of infants every law of domestic hygiene is persistently broken, the wonder is that even so many infants survive their first year.

It is obvious, then, that instruction in the laws of health and domestic hygiene should be compulsory subjects in all elementary schools. Every Education Authority should give facilities for their elementary school teachers to obtain suitable instruction in elementary sanitation, and in domestic and school hygiene, so that they may become qualified to impart the necessary information in those subjects to children attending the elementary schools.

To get in touch, however, with the mothers of to-day, and to bring to their notice in a practical manner the proper methods of feeding and managing their children, there is no better means than the appointment of health visitors, whose duty would be the visiting of homes in which infants are born, and the giving of advice to the mothers as to their management.

There is no doubt that, by the judicious and systematic teaching of hygiene in elementary schools, by the employment of women health visitors, by the judicious weeding out of ignorant and ill-educated midwives, by better housing and less overcrowding, a very large reduction could be affected.

Hooliganism: Its Character, Causes, and Remedies.

Hooliganism is characterised by complete disregard for all social, moral, and religious obligations. It begins in sheer mischief, which, if allowed to go unchecked, quickly develops into perfect ruffianism. It is stamped in its full development by utter recklessness, cruelty, and foolish bravado.

A most important cause of Hooliganism, one of the recent diseases in our social state, or rather an old disease with a new name, is the lack of sensible and just parental control. Boys brought up among the worst-conditioned section of the community become independent immediately they have earned their first half-crown, and sometimes before they have earned a shilling. The street corner is the centre of their attraction, and their out-door club. Now, although we are ready enough to blame the parents, we must not shirk the responsibility that rests upon our own shoulders, and therefore we say that another cause is found in the defective system of training in the public elementary schools in the lower quarters of our great cities. We attempt too much mere book-knowledge with lads of this class, and do not look after their physical development with sufficient care. We want to feed them, and then teach them how to rejoice in cleanliness, and exult in innocent exercise. We have always been guilty of a lack of differentiation. While many boys take to reading, and revel in it all their lives, there are others who simply detest the sight of books, and throw them on one side immediately they leave school. The boys become street-hawkers, and are quickly conversant with all the evils of betting and gambling. Hooligans at first are lads on the loose, not by any means confined to one class of society, who soon take great pride in their independent impudence. Generally speaking, they have no sense of chivalry, and, worst feature of all, the poor girls of the same class soon lose all sense of modesty. From this arises a very inferno of misery, an indication of which comes to us through the tragedies of police and coroner's courts. We have nothing definite for these lads to take up as their life-work, and the perfection of machinery, coupled with the decay of the apprenticeship system, is throwing more and more of them on the streets. The majority of them can only be "hewers of wood and drawers of water." They have not been taught to do anything, they do not even possess the saving grace of a hobby, and so they depend upon market, railway station, street touting, and, later on, casual work at the docks and other places, to give them their crust and shake-down. Failing these, they indulge in petty larceny, shoplifting, small burglary, and the robbing of drunken men who fall asleep on their homeward road. By way of amusement they attack the weak, the old and defenceless, and torment the lame and eccentric; even dumb animals do not escape their cruelty.

What are the remedies? The police officer should labour to purify and not punish; and the magistrate should preside not merely to support the dignity of the law, but to promote the salvation of society. Prison must no longer spell the brutality of isolation for these poor lads. It must be the house of discipline, service, happy self-development, and good comradeship. If the Hooligans were to meet "muscular Christians" in gymnasium, workshop, and recreation field; if they were taught to do many things by manly enthusiasts, and then set to some definite task in which they could delight, the problem, so far as the present generation is concerned, would be solved in nine cases out of ten, and all these so-called "wastrels of society" would be grateful for the days they spent with the governors, chaplains, and warders of our correction houses. Redemption, and not vindictiveness, must ever be the motive which prompts our action.

Boys must be encouraged to do that which they are capable of doing. They must be taught the use of tools, and the utility and blessing of having a hobby in life. The better housing problem we hope will be solved by them, with fewer of the present-day public-houses, and a better supply of well-equipped recreation-rooms; with plenty of open spaces in all our great cities, not merely for ornamental purposes, good as these may be, but for football, rounders, and tennis. We must have something to take the place of the old village green in all quarters of our cities. And, above all, we must address ourselves to the problem of finding definite work for these lads. "Back to the land" is the cry, only we do not see how to get there. Failing that, then Canada. When young and fresh, and straight from school, full of the sense of social obligation and moral sincerity, ready and eager to see the world, and turn to immediate use the splendid training given by noble teachers—not waiting until they are cursed with city ways and the lack of employment—then Canada is the Canaan for these boys. The religious exercises at the beginning and close of school will then have some meaning in them, and teachers and taught will understand that to do the will of God is the glory and crown of man's life on this earth.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE.

IV.

I. Your corner of the world, like every other, teems with living truths revealing things above, but they are things above, and you can never see them by looking always down.

II. There are those who habitually practise unhappiness, a grumbling and irritable aggressiveness, and not infrequently achieve considerable success! With equal opportunity, and far more promising results, happiness might be practised.

III. Virtue is a state of heart, of character, of life, into which we grow; it is acquired by practice, so is happiness. It is possible for every human being, bit by bit through practising happiness, so to grow into the place that God intends for him, that all doors will open towards the light.

IV. It is a great gain to feel the magnetic attraction of a far off event towards which we understand God means us to approach. Then we shall not be easily satisfied with lower things, the divine response having been awakened in our own hearts we shall continually hear the voice that crieth "Come up hither!"

V. It is an essential quality of life to triumph. The remorseful, woe begone, fretful state of existence, is degenerate and unnatural. In root and branch, at the tips and at the heart, life is a triumph! An ascension, a divine glory, a power rolling heavenward!

VI. We may not be able to possess ourselves of the many external comforts of luxurious living, but we can all share the deepest secret of the greatest who have walked with God. We can all turn our eyes from the darkness to the light, from drudgery to triumph!

VII. The overwhelming power of God's Fatherly love, and the supreme joy of man's answering response, make a stirring of the soul more wonderful than any angels' efforts in the pool of Bethesda. Man needs no other prompting to be good than this. Faith by authority, worship through fear, religion by fright, salvation by proxy, cannot give to any soul the sanctity of inward peace.

VIII. Fear nothing from the host of evil influences by which you may be surrounded. Try always how deeply you can influence the world, without waiting to consider how much the world's trials and temptations may influence you.

IX. Use every faculty and every power you have in constant service. You cannot exhaust the supply.

X. Begin every morning with rejoicing.

The most beautiful wreath we can lay on the grave of our dead, is the fruit-wreath of good deeds done to others.—Jean Paul Richter.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bermondsey (Presentation to Rev. Eustace Thompson).—The Rev. E. Thompson preached his farewell sermon to the congregation at Bermondsey, prior to his departure for Belfast. At the close of the evening service, the congregation being requested to remain seated, Mr. Callow referred to Mr. Thompson's coming departure, and said that they had felt bound to make some recognition of Mr. Thompson's great work among them during the last four years. He then called upon Mr. John Harrison to present Mr. Thompson with a gold watch and an address, which had been prepared by his daughter. Mr. Harrison referred to the past of Bermondsey, and how it had at last been taken up by the Provincial Assembly, after other organisations had abandoned it. Mr. Thompson had been a faithful minister and a sincere man, and had accomplished a remarkably good work where others had failed, and others would have shirked. In conclusion, he wished him, in the name of himself and the congregation, good health and God-speed, and assured him that he left with the sincere affection and good wishes of every member of the congregation. Mr. Thompson was also presented with a rosewood writing-desk by members of the Guild. After replying in suitable terms, the congregation dispersed.

Liscard.—The death of Mr. Thomas Rowlands, which occurred on Aug. 22 at the ripe age of 85, has removed one who was a staunch supporter and valued friend of this church. He had been its chairman for nearly four years in succession, and occupied that position at the time of his death, assured of the profound veneration and esteem of the whole congregation. Mr. Rowlands was in early life a Baptist, and first became associated with Unitarianism at Hope-street Church, Liverpool, then under the ministry of the late Dr. Martineau. Later he was for about 20 years a member of the old chapel in Renshaw-street, Liverpool, and for a time was one of its council.

Norwich.—On Sunday, Aug. 26, the minister of the Octagon Chapel, the Rev. Alfred Hall, after the sermon, bade farewell, on behalf of the congregation, to the Rev. Jesse Hipperson, who is leaving to take charge of the church at Bermondsey. He said they were sorry to see Mr. Hipperson depart, but they realised he would serve the cause well, and they wished him God-speed in his new sphere of labour.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, 26th inst., the 15th anniversary of this church was commemorated by special services morning and evening, conducted by the pastor, who preached in the morning from John iv. 37: "One sowing and another reaping"; and in the evening from Psalm v. 7: "The True Worship of God." Appropriate hymns were sung, and quarterly collections were taken as usual.

Shipley.—The Van Committee of the Missionary Conference is to be congratulated on the success of its five days' work in this town. Permission was obtained from the local authorities to hold the meetings in the market-place, and here each evening, from Monday till Thursday, services were conducted and addresses delivered to large and interested audiences by Rev. J. Morley Mills, on "The Unitarian Bible"; "The Atonement"; "The Christs of Christendom"; "The Fatherhood of God." The gatherings increased in numbers up to between 400 and 500, and the earnestness of those who attended is evinced by their disregard of broken weather, and by the length of time for which they remained in conference and discussion after the services. Some groups were still on the ground so late as 10.30 at night. We hear of some "stubborn men" of the Plymouth Brother persuasion travelling from Bingley to break up a meeting, in which effort they met with failure; but the tone of the crowd was throughout friendly. On the last evening of the (Shipley) visit the place of meeting was perforce altered, Friday being market-day in Shipley; but, in spite of the position in a back street, there was a goodly muster to hear Rev. William Rosling's address on "Heaven and Hell," and Mr. Mills on "The Transient and the Enduring in Religion." The presence of a choir from Bradford, and the solo singing of Mr. Fred Priestly, Master Harold Eaton, and others, were greatly appreciated, and formed a valuable element in this effort to spread the influence of liberal Christianity in Shipley.

MANY supporters of the Garden City movement believe that any general realisation of their hopes of reform must come through municipal action. They will hear with satisfaction that the Birmingham City Council is prepared to move in the direction they desire. At a recent meeting of the Council Mr. J. H. Nettlefold proposed a resolution embodying the recommendations of the Housing Committee which provided that the Council should secure land on the outskirts of the city and lay it out on a systematic plan in accordance with Garden City principles. By the adoption of this proposal for the creation of garden suburbs around the city they would, he said, prevent the creation of new slums, and with the reform of existing slums well in hand it was hoped that a new era would be inaugurated. The resolution was carried by thirty votes to sixteen. Mr. Nettlefold referred to the strenuous opposition with which the committee had had to deal in their efforts to secure better housing, but it is gratifying to note that he was able to say that their work is now approved by the majority of the citizens. Before presenting their recommendations the Housing Committee had investigated the system adopted in the principal cities of Germany.

CORRIGENDA.—In the article on Standards of Church Judgment in last week's INQUIRER, paragraph 1, l. 2, for "go" read "be"; paragraph 3, l. 13, for "the paper" read "this paper"; p. 564, column 2, l. 12, after "and" and before "an apostle Paul" read "the growth of."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT this time last year we were recording the happy conclusion of the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Geneva, and three years ago the similar meetings at Amsterdam. How is Dr. Herbert Smith's "Boston Conference Fund, 1907," faring for next year's meetings in America?

THE promoters of the Unitarian Van Mission are full of enthusiasm and determination for the future. In this month's Rochdale Monthly Messenger (which completes the twentieth year of the publication of that "Journal of the Unitarian Church, Rochdale") the Rev. T. P. Spedding writes:—

"Seeing that the Van movement originated in Rochdale, our friends will be glad to know that the Mission has been a wonderful success. Over 100 meetings have now been held, and on several occasions above 1,000 persons have been present. The movement also has created keen interest throughout the denomination, both at home and abroad, and it is likely to develop rapidly. The Van has proved that men are ready for our message if we will but take it to them; and it has taught a lesson by which some of the congregations have already profited, that church services must be supplemented by open-air meetings. The work of the Mission has been under the control of the Missionary Conference, and upwards of 50 ministers have taken part in the meetings, and the services of all the missionaries have been gratuitous. During the last week the committee have taken further steps to develop the Mission. Mr. Bertram Talbot, who has travelled with the Van throughout the tour, has been appointed permanent missionary and business agent, and a second Van for next season has been presented by Sir John Brunner, Bart., M.P., and Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart. The tour will be brought to a close on October 12 and 13, by aggregate meetings in one of the squares of Manchester; and after a brief respite a vigorous winter campaign will be entered upon for Manchester itself."

THE Very Rev. Charles William Stubbs, D.D., Dean of Ely, has been appointed Bishop of Truro in succession to the late Dr. Gott. Before his appointment by Mr. Gladstone as Dean of Ely in 1894, Dr. Stubbs, who is a native of Liverpool, had been for six years Rector of Wavertree. He came from a country living, and in his "Village Politics" and "Christ and Democracy" had already manifested his Liberalism and strong social sympathies. For the last three years of his residence in Liverpool he was associated with the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong and the Rev. C. F. Aked in editing the monthly Liverpool Pulpit, in which sermons by members of all denominations were published. Both he and the present Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Diggle, then at Mossley Hill, were among the first members of the Liverpool Conference of Ministers of Religion on Social Questions. Referring to the appointment of Dr. Stubbs, the Ely Diocesan Remembrancer says:—"Ely will be poorer by the departure of an ardent and enthusiastic worker in all humane and Christian service. Pacificus pacificator was the term given affectionately to the Dean years ago by one of his greatest friends; and we hope the Diocese of Truro will soon find the truth of its description." A Liverpool contemporary speaks of the new Bishop's "vein of mystic romanticism," as bound to appeal to the Celtic flock over which he is shortly to preside, and adds that his liberality is that of his masters, Maurice and Kingsley.

DR. GEORGE MATHESON, who died suddenly at North Berwick on Tuesday week, was a remarkable man. Born at Glasgow, 1842, he lost his eyesight at the age of twenty, in the year of his graduation at Edinburgh University. He nevertheless completed his studies for the ministry, and was ordained in 1868. His first charge was at Innellan on the Clyde, and he became one of the most notable preachers in Scotland. In 1886 he settled in Edinburgh as minister of the large city congregation of St. Bernard's.

DR. MATHESON was a well-known author, and one of the last devotional articles he wrote appears in this week's Christian World. But he is likely to be longest remembered for this one hymn, which he wrote on a June evening of 1882, and which is included in the New Hymnal and other collections:—

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in Thee;
I give Thee back the life I owe,
That in Thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

O Light that followest all my way,
I yield my flickering torch to Thee;
My heart restores its borrowed ray,
That in Thy sunshine's blaze its day
May brighter, fairer be.

O Joy that seekest me through pain,
I cannot close my heart to Thee;
I trace the rainbow through the rain,
And feel the promise is not vain
That morn shall tearless be:

O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from Thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be.

It was a hymn which came to Dr. Matheson, as he himself related, almost in a moment, at a time of severe trial. "It seemed to me at the time as if someone were dictating the thought to me, and also giving the expression. I was sitting alone in my study in a state of great mental depression, caused by a real calamity. It was wrung out spontaneously from my heart." And he added:—"It was to me a unique experience. I have no natural gift of rhythm. All the other verses I have ever written are manufactured articles; this came like a day-spring from on high."

THE energy of President Roosevelt is exhaustless. He has striven without any great measure of success to check the corruption of American life, and to reform the great business Trusts. He turns now to a fresh reform campaign, and one in which he wins easily the first encounter. He hurls himself against words. So far as his immediate authority extends in communications, i.e., from the White House, all future correspondence is to be conducted according to a rule of phonetic spelling. The result will be disconcerting, although not unfamiliar to those who have studied the Pitman literature in this country. The spelling reform movement is not new. It has long been advocated in America by Professor Brander Matthews and the benevolent Mr. Carnegie, while at home it has the support of such authorities as Dr. Murray and Professor Skeat. Spelling should be phonetic: in the past it has been and has only ceased to be because we have become lazy in our speech. We ought either to spell as we pronounce or to pronounce as we spell. But whether the reason of the case will prevail against our instinctive conservatism is a different thing. The impetuosity of the President may affect the large field of American and English literature. But, again, its effects may be much more trivial; it may influence neither. In that case there will be an official American spelling, a literary American spelling, and a literary, as well as an illiterate, English spelling. Or it may be followed by American writers and ignored by our home scribes. That is the event most to be feared. So long as we retain a thorough adhesion to our present modes of spelling it would be thoroughly unpleasant to read American books in phonetic print, and an unhappy barrier would be set up against the interchange of the literatures of the two peoples.

THE President himself, in a letter to the Public Printer of the United States, has explained that the criticism on his spelling-reform scheme "is evidently made in entire ignorance of what the step is," and that "there is not the least intention to do anything revolutionary or initiate any far-reaching policy." "If the slight changes in the spelling of the 300 words proposed wholly or partially meet popular approval, then the changes will become permanent without any reference to what public officials or individual private citizens may feel; if they do not ultimately meet with popular approval they will be dropt, and that is all there is about it."

KINSHIP:

ONE are all the ends of life,
One its lethargies and strife;
One its glimmer and its shade,
Flowers that bloom, and leaves that fade:
One are all the powers of being,
Gifts of knowing and foreseeing;
Rootlets probing underground,
Man consumed with thoughts profound;
One immortal glory thrills
Farthest stars and distant hills;
From the cowslip to the sun
Impulses of beauty run.
Songs of thrush, and sparrow's twitter,
Touch the hearts despair made bitter;
And the secrets of the wind
Whisper in the human mind.
Ah, the mystery man knows
Of his kinship with the rose—
How that, in her fragrant heart,
Spirit-like, he has his part.
Life is one—our patient mother
Draws her children to each other;
Till, at last, in equal rest,
We are gathered to her breast.

XLV.

THE windows of the Settlement overlook the entrance of an improved dwelling. At the mouth of this human hive there is always a stray bee or two; twice a day there is a streaming forth, and twice a day a hurrying back, of busy workers. The full glory of the seasons never reaches us, but broken hints of change tell us something of their course. When, for instance, bird-cages are hung out, and flower-pots are set upon the sills, we know that summer has come. Marketing is done at leisure, upon the threshold, and with supposed profit by those who are content to wait, for all things come round, and prices fall as the day declines. Therefore it is that fitful buying goes on throughout the day, and the bawling of the importunate seller is never long at rest. Street cries are one of the few afflictions of the rich; Improved Dwellers hear them as woodmen hear the notes of persistent birds.

The children claim the pavement for their own. Boys follow their marbles into the gutter; infant mothers hug their dolls upon the step. It is motherhood that makes Improved Dwellings a necessity, but this they do not know, and, later, will not heed. Girls, with real babies to nurse, look wistfully at the dolls. More boisterous spirits find relief on railings and lamp-posts. The free destruction of clothes is one of the few luxuries of the poor.

A blind man feels his way into the sun, to be within reach of passing events; his face quite unresponsive, his ears attentive to every sound. To-day there is to be a funeral. Already there are heads at the windows, and idlers by the gate. They are drawn by the mystery of that law which is above law; knows no agreements; and brings tenancies to an end without a word. It is part of the irony of poverty that its only pomp is that which attends it to the grave. The humblest life in our world may leave it with a touch of pride. We know to a hair's breadth what the occasion demands, or, to put it more plainly, what our neighbours expect. At the moment when the hired pageant draws up, a mourner comes out with an empty jug, but this is not with us an impropriety, nor even an incongruity, is indeed the one natural act in a scene given up to conventional art.

Amongst the spectators are two young sisters. Before the procession is out of sight they fall to disputing; the dispute becomes a tussle; and the younger is thrown to the ground. Gathering mud in her hand she flings it at the other. This is a sadder sight than the funeral, but most of us laugh.

When the crowd has broken up, a young wife comes out with a child, and stands where a corner of the nearest turning may be seen. Suddenly the child is put down, achieves a few steps, and is caught up in a man's stronger arms. A no way remarkable child, and a quite unnoticeable father, but happy smiles transfigure them all, as they enter that which to them is home.

Behind the group a Sister passes in—her face the kind, cold face that every Sister wears. Facies non omnibus una, Nec diversa tamen. Her dress is a rebuke to us, or at least a reminder of another ideal than that of family life; but, I doubt not, she lays her cool hand on many a burning spot which would shrink from every-day touch.

Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers. Life is not worse here than it is elsewhere, but it is more sordid, because it is less wise. Improvement is wisdom in the making—beginning with small things. Why do we not begin with small things? Why this litter in the road, these posters on the wall? Why this slovenly piece-meal buying, with its trail of harassing care over every hour of the day? Why disorder and dishevelment, as the rule, and pretentious grandeur, as the exception? Why these wrong estimates, and false standards, and mistaken codes? With a Settlement hard at hand, why do all things continue as they were? Is it not that even the width of a narrow street may be a social gulf? Separation by class is separation in habit. When Settlers and Dwellers share a common roof, and a common name, they may then, perhaps, hope to share a common life:

MR. GEORGE HAW's little book on The Englishman's Castle (published at 3d. by C. W. Daniel) can be cordially recommended to those who have not time to read larger works. It is based on the belief that there is an intimate connection between the house men live in and the kind of home they are likely to make. A beautiful home can be created in a slum tenement or an insanitary country cottage. (No one knows better than Mr. Haw how numerous the insanitary cottages are.) But it is an extremely difficult task, and, although it is often accomplished, it is only at the cost of a profuse expenditure of effort that were better used in a fitter dwelling-place. Moreover, to make a home in these bad surroundings is always to risk life and to lose health. The community has no right thus to play recklessly with the welfare of its citizens in the interests of property.

TURNING from the central thought to the details, we notice chapters on "Slumdom more deadly than War," "The Cost of Slumdom, and What can be done?" The last contains a brief but useful summary of housing legislation from Lord Shaftesbury's first Act of 1851 downwards. "All the work of dealing with slums ought to be carried out purely as public health work, just as the analysis of food and drink is. When the inspectors discover bad food or bad drink it is promptly condemned, but no one thinks of making so foolish a suggestion as that the ratepayers must first purchase before destroying it. . . . The slum-owner should be penalised, not pensioned off as it were." The chapter on Lessons from Other Countries will also be instructive to those who are beginners in this subject.

SOCIAL REFORMERS:

II.—CHARLES FOURIER.

IN my former paper I spoke of Charles Fourier (1772-1837) as the "speculative philosopher." It is extremely probable that those who have but casually dipped into his works have concluded that his speculations were mostly wild. They class them, doubtless, with the seemingly endless vagaries, the fruit of ill-instructed and undisciplined minds, that have for generations teemed in the bookshops. His most partial admirers must confess that there is ground for this judgment. His voluminous writings are, it is true, destitute of literary "form"; it does not follow that they are "void." His vocabulary is often uncouth, but it says something; and at one period at least, he appeared to some notable people the prophet who should lead mankind from the land of bondage to the Canaan of their dreams. We may permit ourselves to say that, so long as people cherish the desire to substitute for the existing amorphous social masses a grouping of human beings more worthy their intelligence and more promising of high results, the ingenious author of the scheme of "Harmony" will draw many a mind after him, even if they hesitate to go all the way that he indicates.

When Fourier was a child of five, he was punished, he tells us, for telling the truth about the goods in his father's drapery shop. When he was a young man engaged in a merchant's office at Marseilles (after a varied career as a commercial traveller in France, Germany, and Holland) he had to superintend the destruction of a quantity of rice in order to keep the price up. To him, as he says, there came an apple incident, just as to Newton. From the falling of an apple, the story goes, young Isaac Newton was led towards the idea of universal (physical) gravitation. From seeing eight apples for a sou in the country and ten sous for an apple in Paris, Charles Fourier was led into inquiries which ultimately resulted in propounding a theory of gravitation between human souls.

The story of his life is very simple. Born, as we have seen, in comparatively lowly circumstances, he lost his little patrimony in 1793 during the revolutionary troubles. He narrowly escaped the guillotine, struggled on in clerkship and petty brokering, began writing and publishing, survived to be a somewhat quaintly dressed, unsmiling old man, severely critical of other would-be reformers, "false prophets," we might call them, with a glance at the times of Israel, and died after long and patient expectation of the coming capitalist who was necessary to the fruition of his social plans, but who never came.

In order to understand his plans we must consider his conception of human nature, its past experiences, and its innate possibilities. Reference has been made to Newton. It was Fourier's contention that the discovery which linked the stars together and rationalised the universe was but a preliminary to his own far greater discovery of the attraction which actually subsists between human beings. We see at present, indeed, the marks of aversion and repulsion in human society; it is these things that sadden the lover of mankind and instil doubts of the Divine wisdom, under whose ordinance this mass of sinning, struggling, and suffering humanity continues from day to day. But the Divine wisdom will be fully justified, he maintained, when the hindrances raised by man himself have been removed and the benign purposes of Providence have free scope. Fourier stoutly maintained that he was not a revolutionist; and if he meant that he did not sympathise with those who violently lay hands on their nation's institutions his contention is comprehensible. But nothing could be more revolutionary in tendency than his criticisms on present social conditions. The term "civilisation," which is to most people one of honourable import, was to him equivalent to the sum of endless evils restrictive of "free human nature." This is a sufficiently startling suggestion, and seems to bear radical changes, not to say catastrophe, in its right hand.

I may here point out that nothing was farther from Fourier's general temper than a desire for anarchy. From his earliest years he showed a disposition that delighted in order and arrangement. A well-kept garden, a skilful musical composition, pleased him well. Military shows and the marching of troops attracted him to the last; and if his writings suggest chaos, the fact is due, I should judge, to the absence of literary discipline in his youth. Nothing could be more systematic than his system. He has thought out details into remotest corners, and has assigned places to all kinds of people, old and young, for the respective hours of the day. Obviously, therefore, when he exclaims against the pernicious effects of "restriction" on human nature he does not contemplate a state of society where there shall be no law, but one where, being unspoiled by compulsion and delivered from the overmastering attraction of vicious gains, each shall be, and shall be fit to be, a law unto himself.

The cardinal point with Fourier, then, was how to emancipate society from the meshes of habit, commercial, industrial, political, and domestic, that so injuriously hamper free human life, and go far to render it, for many, barely supportable. Meditating on this problem, he came to the conclusion that one of the most formidable obstacles to social reform arises in the vast aggregations of population which, if they were appalling a hundred years ago, must surely be more so to-day. Here Fourier—call him mad if you will—was greatly sane. It is not unlikely, I admit, that the close association of huge civic centres has a stimulating effect on life in some important directions, though the offset of debasing tendencies is also only too clear to see. To strike the true balance between gain and loss would need a wider and deeper knowledge than many of us would care to claim. But one thing is most certain: this perpetually increasing urban population steadily loses in personal significance as it increases. In a small community we know one another; in a town we hear of one another; in a great city we are ignorant of one another. Instead of persons we face statistics, and the question of the average citizen is not, How is my neighbour to be helped at need, but, How are we to keep down the rates.

So, then, arose in the French dreamer's mind the vision of a humanity redistributed not into isolated hermitages, missing the advantages meant by a Benevolent Creator to accrue from mutual affection and mutual services, but into groups of such numerical size as should allow all to know each other and to be genuinely interested in each other's qualities and doings. Our present social unit, the family, did not commend itself favourably to his mind. That he was a solitary bachelor may have had something to do with it; but also he saw, as everyone must see, that not only the individual, but the family as we know it, suffers in many and serious ways under the present system of things. Something larger and stronger, something more adequate to the problems of sustenance and culture, and possessing richer variety, appeared to be necessary. Thus he proposed the Phalanx, or family community, to be resident on its own estate, addressing itself through its members to its own internal discipline and development, and related to similar groups throughout the land, and ultimately throughout all lands.

I must not attempt, nor would the task be specially profitable just here, to indicate the extremely detailed suggestions made by Fourier for the conduct of his phalansteries. They are often very ingenious, sometimes very happy, sometimes they provoke a smile, as when he gravely suggests the employment of infants of thirty-five months down to twenty-five in shelling green peas, and indicates that the love of children for dirt may be turned to good account by turning les petites hordes on to cleansing stables, working in the slaughterhouses, repairing the roads, gardening along the roadsides, and exterminating vicious reptiles and croaking frogs! Nor is it possible to set forth in this place his elaborate scheme of psychological analysis or his tabulated series of social stages. If it were worth while a critic might easily discover points of weakness, but probably few competent critics would so much as consider it worth while. One thing may be confidently stated, and that is that whatever is bizarre, crude, extravagant, or dreamy, there remains a wealth of pungent wisdom embedded in his writings. And one other thing it is imperative to add for safeguarding the reader from an error which is only too prevalent. Fourier did not recommend a community of goods. His appreciation of the value of variety included in its scope a sense of the additions made to human experience by the differences of possessions held by one and another in the community. Thus, in his abhorrence of the generally accepted doctrine that "there must be many poor people in order that there may be some rich ones," he never fell into the mistake of supposing that human society could really thrive by holding all things in common. His principle is thus enunciated: "The poor must be in the enjoyment of graduated ease, in order that the rich may be happy." Let this acknowledgment of the right to hold property be counted to him, even by his severest critics, for righteousness.

I have endeavoured in these brief remarks to beget in some and to revive in others interest in a writer sometimes heard of, but little read, and I may usefully point out that those who wish to extend their acquaintance with him may easily do so on procuring Gide's "Introduction," which accompanies some "Selections" from Fourier's works, in Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein's half-crown Social Science Series. For a full study of his writings (which can only be recommended to specialists with plenty of time) one must go either to the original, written in rather perplexing French, or to the translations prepared by Mr. Albert Brisbane for American readers some sixty years ago.

* Reference to that period takes us to events that must always lend special interest to Fourierism. It was a time when, as Mr. John Morley says, "A great wave of humanity, of benevolence, of desire for improvement, a great wave of social sentiment, in short, poured itself among all who had the faculty of large and disinterested thinking." In the number of those possessing this faculty was George Ripley, who is described by Carlyle, more suo, as "a Socinian minister, who left the pulpit in order to reform the world by cultivating onions." We may say that Dr. Channing, who did not take to onion culture, was another of the social enthusiasts. For a time, says Dr. Martineau, "he had his dream of communism"; and within little more than a year of his death, in 1842, Channing wrote to Adin Ballou, one of the pioneers of social reconstruction: "I have for a very long time dreamed of an association in which the members, instead of preying on one another and seeking to put one another down, after the fashion of this world, should live together as brothers, seeking one another's elevation and spiritual growth." There appears reason to believe that when George Ripley (long afterwards the celebrated man of letters) left the pulpit and founded "Brook Farm," he was stimulated to the venture by Channing's known sympathy. The story of "Brook Farm" ought to be read again by this generation. They will find it (see "Life of Ripley," American Men of Letters, by N. L. Frothingham) a story of heroism if also of failure. Men now famous—Hawthorne, Dana, Lowell, Whittier, and others—lent countenance to the experiment, and some of note shared it practically. Numerically much smaller than Fourier's "model Phalanx" should be (he suggested 1,600 to 1,800; the Brook Farmers were never more than 150) the group was from the first heavily handicapped. After two or three years of valiant struggle, the movement, hitherto separate, was merged in a confessedly Fourierite organisation. Over thirty such communities were founded between the years 1842 and 1853, and Mr. Brisbane, who has been named above, did, with many other helpers, what could be done to foster the cause.

That the endeavour failed, that "Brook Farm," shortly after a disastrous fire in 1846, came to an end, and that the last Fourierite "Phalanx" was dissolved in 1855 is matter of history. But it would be the rashest of conclusions to infer, therefore, that all attempts to "harmonise" the discordant elements of civilisation are foredoomed to similar failure. If Fourier's name shall only stand for a warning, it is something; but does it not stand for something more?

W. G. TARRANT.

THACKERAY'S MANCHESTER SPEECH.

WITH reference to the first note in THE INQUIRER of August 25 we have received the following letter:—

SIR,—With regard to the breakdown of Thackeray in a speech, I beg to say that I was present on the occasion, and remember it well. It was in the Free Library, Campfield, Manchester. There was a large gathering of noted literary men, amongst them Dickens, Bulwer Lytton, Monckton Milnes, and Thackeray. After some brilliant speeches Thackeray rose, but after a few words sat abruptly down without apology or remark of any kind. I remember he was in the midst of a sentence, something to the effect that literature was food for the people: "I and my friend, Mr. Dickens, provide the tarts for the people—" and then the collapse. The occasion was the opening of the Free Library; the year I am uncertain about, but I well remember the circumstance of the spoiled speech. ESTHER BECKER.

28, High-lane, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Manchester.

Another friend has kindly sent us the account of this notable occasion given in the official "History of the Free Library Movement in Manchester." The inaugural meeting was held on September 2, 1852, when Sir John Potter was in the chair, and Thackeray's speech was in seconding a resolution which Dickens moved. Several different accounts of the speech are given, one being evidently a carefully edited report of a short but complete speech, with no trace of any breakdown. But there is also a quotation from J. T. Fields' "Yesterdays with Authors," in which the American publisher, whom Thackeray had persuaded to accompany him to Manchester, gives the following account of the incident:—

All the way from London, says Mr. Fields, Thackeray was talking to him of what he meant to do in this speech:

"This passage was to have great influence with the rich merchants, this with the clergy, and so on. He said that although Dickens and Bulwer and Sir James Stephen, all eloquent speakers, were to precede him, he intended to beat each of them on this special occasion. He insisted that I should be seated directly in front of him, so that I should have the full force of his magic eloquence. . . . The three speeches which came before Thackeray was called upon were admirably suited to the occasion, and most eloquently spoken. Sir John Potter, who presided, then rose, and, after some complimentary allusions to the author of 'Vanity Fair,' introduced him to the crowd, who welcomed him with ringing plaudits. As he rose he gave me a half-wink from under his spectacles, as if to say, 'Now for it; the others have done very well, but I will show 'em a grace beyond the reach of their art.' He began in a clear and charming manner, and was absolutely perfect for three minutes. In the middle of a most earnest and elaborate sentence he suddenly stopped, gave a look of comic despair at the ceiling, crammed both hands into his trousers pockets, and deliberately sat down. Everybody seemed to understand that it was one of Thackeray's unfinished speeches, and there were no signs of surprise or discontent among his audience. He continued to sit on the platform in a perfectly composed manner; and when the meeting was over he said to me, without a sign of discomfiture, 'My boy, you have my profoundest sympathy; this day you have accidentally missed hearing one of the finest speeches ever composed for delivery by a great British orator.' And I never heard him mention the subject again."

1852 was the year in which Thackeray went for the first time as a lecturer to America, immediately after the publication of "Esmond." He sailed from Liverpool on October 30, among his fellow-passengers being J. R. Lowell, fresh from Italy, and "a burly form in a wide-awake hat, Arthur Hugh Clough, the poet and Oxford don." Before he started he had been lecturing both in Manchester and Liverpool, and on the first Sunday of October heard James Martineau preach in Hope-street Church, and (as he wrote at the time to Dr. John Brown of Edinburgh) "was struck by his lofty devotional spirit."

CORRESPONDENCE.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE AND OTHERS.

SIR,—I see you have not thought it necessary to defend yourself against Mr. Fripp's condemnation for your publication of Mr. Charlesworth's letter. And I think Mr. Charlesworth will hardly trouble himself about his accusations of impertinence, uncharitableness, and incivility in venturing to comment on an academic appointment and criticise the pulpit oratory of a well-known preacher. To all this violent tirade of Mr. Fripp's there is, indeed, nothing to be said but "hoity toity." But his letter raises a very much larger and more important question. Mr. Fripp is an old student of Manchester College and a life trustee, and is (or should be) well versed in its history, traditions, principles, and aims; and yet, apparently, he cannot discover how any person who is not a past or present student, an official, a member of the committee, or at least a subscriber, can have any connection with the College or interest in it entitling him to hold or express an opinion upon its proceedings.

Has Mr. Fripp read the opening words of Mr. Charlesworth's letter? "All that is essentially related to the future welfare of our churches is a matter of concern to those of us who believe that they have a definite place in the development of the religious life of the country."

I will venture to go a step further, and I have no doubt Mr. Charlesworth will go with me—and perhaps Mr. Fripp too, if he will only stop a minute to think first—and say: "Any religious institution in the world and any appointment of preacher or teacher in such institution is a matter of lawful interest to any person who chooses to take such interest, and for proper comment or criticism, approval or disapproval, in the columns of a religious newspaper."

When a college has for more than a century been very closely connected with a special group of churches, and the minister of one of those churches expresses an opinion as to its proceedings in the columns of a paper which, from its foundation, has been especially interested in the college and the particular group of churches, the charge of impertinence is ludicrous. Apart, entirely, from the question of the advisability of the special appointment under discussion, it is difficult to imagine a letter more pertinent than Mr. Charlesworth's or—well, let us say, "less pertinent," than Mr. Fripp's.

In conclusion, let me beg you to give, from time to time, all the information you can about the work of any colleges you think your readers likely to be interested in—especially Carmarthen College, Manchester College, and the Home Missionary College; and to keep your columns open to criticism and discussion of their ways and means.

FRANCIS H. JONES.

DR. HUNTER AS PREACHER.

SIR,—Might I ask Mr. Charlesworth what he thinks is "the definite place our churches have to day in the development of the religious life of the country"? If Congregationalism becomes non-subscribing, as is more and more apparent every day, is there not a sense in which "as a denomination," we are ready at once to cease to exist—that is, if our Free Churches, the homes of a living, spiritual faith, simply lose their isolated life and enter into a larger fellowship, in which the sectarian divisions of the past shall be for ever left behind? As to Dr. Hunter being an unsuitable man for the position of special lecturer and preacher at Manchester College, I differ entirely from Mr. Charlesworth. In my opinion, liberal Christianity has no finer preacher in these islands at the present time than the preacher of Trinity Church, Glasgow. Does Mr. Charlesworth think that Dr. Hunter's published sermon entitled "Human Limitations—their Meaning and Value," is "essentially commonplace and familiar"? Does he set no value on the opinion of The Christian World in its special mention of Dr. Hunter's sermons as most noteworthy in the Christian World Pulpit? and of another of our leading religious papers, speaking of the author of those matchless "devotional services for public worship" some time ago as "one of the most powerful preachers in London"? If Mr. Charlesworth "considers the hundred-miles-an-hour declamatory reading of Dr. Hunter's rhetorical essay or rhapsody" as unsuited "to appeal to the mind, move the conscience, or stir the hearts of men," we have experienced quite the reverse, and are strongly convinced that our empty churches would be no longer empty if we had preachers who could preach as he does. If some of us had entered St. Mary's, Oxford, when that powerful teacher, John Henry Newman, who influenced England religiously as none other in the nineteenth century, was preaching, would we not also have thought that "a stranger was not likely to be much struck," as we listened to those rapidly read sermons, the preacher never lifting his eyes, and no show of elaborated argument. Having gone to hear "a great intellectual effort," would we not have come away disappointed? Was not Dr. Stopford Brooke right when he told us many years ago that "the fault of most of the sermons of the Liberal school is a want of emotion. They are often too purely efforts of the intellect. They want fervour—appeals to the heart. They want the very element which made the sermons of the early evangelicals tell so forcibly upon their hearers," they want the very element that made those marvellous sermons of John Henry Newman thrill and penetrate the soul on another side of Christian feeling. And do we not want the element that draws men to such preachers as Dr. Hunter, Dr. Horton, Silvester Horne, and the youthful preacher in the City Temple? We may have gifts, denied perhaps to them, but we are closing our eyes to the real facts behind our declining position as a denomination if we cannot see that our imperative need to-day—our future depends on it—is for preachers like Dr. Hunter.

OBITUARY.

ARTHUR CURRER BRIGGS.

NOT Leeds only, but the whole coal district of the West Riding was stirred to pity and to awe by the news of the sudden death of Mr. Arthur Currer Briggs, which occurred on the morning of August 31, at the age of fifty-one. The previous day he had spent with his family, driving on a new motor-car from his house on Windermere Lake to a favourite spot near Coniston, where they lunched. About five he started on the car for Leeds, where he arrived between nine and ten. Although somewhat exhausted he ate his dinner, and after a while went to bed, leaving directions that he was to be called at seven. About that time an old and valued servant went into his room, and while drinking a hot effervescing saline draught, which he had lately been in the habit of taking, he gave some directions about preparations for a holiday tour in Scotland, on which they were to start the following Monday. She then went to draw up the blinds, but, hearing a noise behind her, turned and was surprised to find that he had risen from his bed and fallen to the floor, where he lay dead. It was well known to his medical advisers that he suffered from heart weakness, but he could never be induced to give up his manifold duties. An eminent surgeon and intimate friend said, on hearing of his sudden death, that it was what he had been expecting any time for the past two years.

Mr. Briggs was but twenty-six years of age when he succeeded, on his father's death, to the chairmanship of the company founded by his grandfather for the working of the Whitwood Collieries. It was a position to try to the utmost the capacities of an older man, but having once undertaken it he gave himself to the business with so much zeal, and conducted it so prudently that shareholders and miners were alike content with the results of his management, and he speedily won such a reputation for ability and discretion among the coal owners of Yorkshire that, young as he was, they made him chairman of their Association.

On the still more important Conciliation Board for the regulation of work and wages throughout a great part of the kingdom, he was distinguished by the pacific influence which he exercised, and it is greatly to his credit that he enjoyed the special confidence of such eminent Trade Union leaders as Mr. Ben Pickard and Mr. Parrott. Indeed, inheriting the traditions of his family, he was deeply concerned for the interests of the miners, and especially of those who worked for his own company. The education of their children, the provision of means of recreation, sanitary homes, compensation in cases of injury beyond the obligation imposed by law, all received his earnest and sympathetic attention.

So until 1903 he was strenuously and successfully occupied in the cares of business, and those who knew how great a responsibility rested upon him could well excuse him if he kept apart from public life. In that year he was invited in an emergency to accept the post of Lord Mayor of Leeds. He consented, and entered at once upon his duties absolutely without experience of municipal affairs. His success was extraordinary and proved him to be a born manager of men: "The effectual way," to quote the Yorkshire Post, "in which he managed the Council, even in its most turbulent moods, was a marvel to all who beheld it. He combined the fortiter in re with the suaviter in modo in a remarkable manner."

He was firm indeed, but not against the numerous appeals made to him for assistance in all kinds of movements which sought the presence and support of the Chief Magistrate of the City. He was ably seconded by a wife, who quickly distinguished herself in Leeds by her unsuspected ability as a speaker, her ready sympathies, and admirable powers of organisation.

His labours did not cease with his year of office. On his retirement from the Mayoralty he was elected to a vacant post on the Aldermanic Bench, and to the last day of his life—for he was to have taken the chair of the Watch Committee meeting the very morning on which he died—he continued to take an active interest in the work of the Council. It was on his suggestion that the Waterworks Committee adopted a scheme for the afforestation of the Washburn Valley as a means of providing work for the unemployed, and there was no business of importance brought forward in which he did not interest himself.

Mr. Briggs was one of our most distinguished citizens, and one of the busiest men of this busy centre of industry, but he found the time to do some service for the congregation of which he was a faithful member. For several years past he has been Chairman of the Mill Hill Chapel Choir Committee, and has been at all times ready to give his assistance when it was sought for at school or chapel meetings.

The funeral took place on Tuesday, and was one of the largest Leeds has seen. The magistrates of the city and the members of the Corporation, with the Lord Mayor, were present in their official capacity, with representatives of the University, the coal owners of Yorkshire, the Ancient Order of Foresters, and, notably, the Committee of the Children's Camp Fund, of which Mrs. Briggs has been the chief support. The Leeds constabulary were present in force, and a large number of the Whitwood miners. The ceremony concluded with the singing by the Mill Hill Choir of Whittier's hymn, "He whom the Master loved," which had been a favourite with him, and gave the truest expression of his unspoken aspirations and faith and hope.

It would be impossible to do justice in a small space to the really beautiful and remarkable character of the man, or to give instances of the singular charm which attracted to him men of all sorts and conditions. An Anglican prelate writes;—"I met him only once. But the impression is ineffaceable. I thought him the beau-ideal of an English man of affairs. There was a quite unusual blend of ability, insight, generous sympathies and rare refinement. And one reverent remark revealed a whole world of hidden faith in the unseen, such as one might have expected in so cultured and radiant a soul." A judgment which surely does equal credit to him who passed it and him whom it regarded. C. H:

REV. J. F. KENNARD.

THE Rev. John Farmer Kennard, who passed away at the Royal Victoria Hospital, Belfast, on Sunday, August 26, in his eightieth year, was in early life connected with the Wesleyan body. He was in business at Sevenoaks, in Kent, and became a lay preacher, ardently throwing in his lot with the "Wesleyan Reform Movement" of 1849, in connection with which a congregation of seceders was formed at Sevenoaks. Then it was that in the course of a controversy aroused by some Unitarian lectures given in the town, he was led to earnest inquiry and became a convinced Unitarian, and largely through the influence of the late Rev. Edward Hammond, of Bessells Green, he accepted also the principle of adult baptism. He was baptized in the little open-air baptistry in connection with the Bessells Green chapel, and became a lay preacher among the General Baptists. In 1867 he became minister at Billingshurst, and from 1875 to 1888 was at Warrenpoint, co. Down, whither, after brief charges at Dover and Deal and at Bury St. Edmunds, he retired in 1899.

"Mr. Kennard," writes the Rev. W. E. Mellone, of Warrenpoint, "to a large extent was a self-taught and self-made man. His powers of mind and body were remarkable. He felt the disadvantage of not having received any training for the ministry, but largely made up for this by reading, and the diligent cultivation of his mind. As a preacher he was very earnest and impressive, and as a Christian man he was consistent and exemplary to the last."

The interment was at Warrenpoint, where the funeral service in the church of which he was the minister for thirteen years was conducted by the Revs. W. E. Mellone and R. J. Orr, that at the graveside by the Revs. G. V. Crook and Edgar Lockett. The attendance was representative of all denominations, and was a sincere tribute of respect to the memory of departed worth and a life of Christian usefulness.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XV.—SALVATION.

IN the strict Biblical sense salvation is the deliverance of man from sin and its punishment, a deliverance effected by the death of Christ. At the same time the soteriology of the Bible is much more moderate in statement than are some of the interpretations it has been made to bear. The death of Christ, for instance, is never spoken of in Scripture as vicarious punishment. Nor is there Scriptural warrant for the after-theories of Compensation, Substitution, and Imputation, with which the names of Anselm, Calvin, and Luther are connected. But there still remains in the New Testament a doctrine of Satisfaction which the conscience of to-day finds difficulty in accepting. There was less difficulty then. The theory of Reconciliation was in harmony with existing theories of human nature, and of divine action—suppositions that man had fallen from early innocence; that there was "enmity" between God and man; that the world was under the power of the devil; that deep down in the nature of things there was absolute necessity that the wrath of offended Deity should be appeased, before sin could be forgiven and man restored. Sin must be by some visible act and deed removed and carried away, as when the priest at the altar laid his hands on the head of the victim in the moment of its vicarious death. Divine justice and human need alike cried out for a "Lamb of God." Without blood there could be no "remission" of sins; moral guilt must in some material way be "covered," "blotted out," "expiated." The doctrine of the Atonement had its origin in the sacrifice of the altar, and for that reason the terms by which it is described by Jewish-Christian writers are mostly sacrificial. There is the group of terms which falls under the idea of Propitiation, that which falls under the idea of Purification, and that which falls under the idea of Redemption.

The Scriptural doctrine of Salvation may be presented thus:—

(1) "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all, for that all sinned."

(2) "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

(3) "God hath made him to be sin for us who knew no sin."

(4) "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness."

To those who cannot receive the doctrine here set forth there is nothing left but to set the witness of the living Christ against constructions on the death of Christ. They can only lay to heart the plain fact that a Gospel was preached by him, in which such argument holds no place.

In parable after parable, and saying after saying, he insisted on the immediateness of access to the Father: "Thy sins are forgiven thee" certified an accomplished fact; "Be ye perfect," was said to men who were regarded as already saved.

The proof of man's redemption is redemption. "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." There is hardly an enfranchisement of life which does not spring from him, which does not justify itself by appeal to the principles which he laid down. Salvation is the working out of well-being. To live by those laws of life which were his is, by the grace of God, to be saved, whether we speak of the unit or of the mass, of the individual soul or of society at large.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE VOYAGE OF THE MAYFLOWER.

THIS is the story of the men, women, and children who sailed in search of a land where they might live in peace and worship God in the way they thought best.

First I must speak of the Pilgrim Fathers, and where they lived, and what befel them before they started on their ever-memorable voyage.

Their homes were at the first in certain villages in Nottinghamshire, of which one called Scrooby formed the centre, where they met for their weekly worship. Others came from Gainsborough, in Lincolnshire, not far distant. Here they lived in quiet, industrious, and wholesome ways, happy in their country crafts and in their families, and harming no man. But thus they were not suffered to abide; for it came to pass five years after the destruction of the Great Armada, that a law was passed to compel all people throughout the realm to attend the parish churches and worship there in the manner of the Queen (that is Elizabeth) and the Bishops. And any who refused to do so were to be punished by the loss of their goods, by imprisonment, and by exile from their native land. Indeed, some were thereby brought in the end to a violent death. Great were the sufferings of the Catholics, many of whom endured the loss of all things rather than pretend, against their consciences, to be Protestants.

But also among the Protestants there were not a few, amongst whom were numbered our good folk of Scrooby and thereabouts, who also disliked the Bishops' religion, and were wont to worship God in a simpler manner. These were so oppressed that they decided to leave England altogether and go to live in Holland, where there was more freedom. But when they embarked at Boston they were plundered by the crew of all they possessed, and set on shore to starve. And when again they made an attempt, the captain sailed with the men, leaving the women and children on land; and they only reached their kinsmen after much trouble and delay, but at length were all united in Amsterdam;

After dwelling a short time there the Pilgrims went on to Leyden, one of the most beautiful cities in Holland, and indeed in all Europe. Its noble buildings, its broad, clean streets and many canals, all planted on either side with linden trees which tempered the summer heat with their shade, offered an inviting place of habitation. So here, enjoying friendship with the Dutch, and gaining their livelihood by the work of their hands, they remained eleven years with their good pastor, John Robinson. "Such," says one of them, "was the mutual love that this worthy man had to his flock and his flock to him that it was hard to judge whether he delighted more in having such a people or they in having such a pastor."

Yet even fair Leyden did not seem to be the fitting place to remain in finally. It was a foreign land; the children would forget their English speech and ways; there was no English school there; it was hard to get a living; war was threatening between Holland and Spain; and, moreover, King James, who was now on the throne, was no friend to them, but sought, by help of the Dutch, to seize their leading man, or elder, William Brewster. But in this he did not succeed, for Brewster remained in hiding many months. Considering all these things, they determined to migrate once more, and this time to a country which they could call their own. King James was persuaded to let them go to America without hindrance, where they promised to live in peace with him; and when he asked how they meant to get a living, they said by fishing. He replied, "'Tis an honest trade! It was the Apostles' own calling," and so gave his consent. In the end some decided to stay in Leyden with John Robinson and the rest to go to America. So, having bought a small ship named the Speedwell, they prepared to embark on her at Delfshaven, a port some twenty-four miles off. But first, says Edward Winslow, one of the Pilgrims, "they that stayed at Leyden feasted us that were to go at our pastor's house, it being large, where we refreshed ourselves, after our tears, with singing of Psalms, making joyful melody in our hearts as well as with the voice, there being many of the congregation very expert in music; and indeed it was the sweetest melody that ever mine ears heard." And so, like the Argonauts of old when they started in search of the Golden Fleece, did these brave voyagers cheer one another with mirth and song. And truly it was needful, for the parting of loving friends is a sad business. Moreover, good Pastor Robinson went on board the ship and gave the travellers his blessing, and commended them to the God of sea and land, even as the Prior of La Rabida had blessed Columbus and his men. So, the wind being fair, the sails were hoisted, and with firing of guns and many farewells and many tears the Speedwell passed on her way out on to the North Sea. The day was the first of August, 1620—a great day in the story of freedom, for on that day more than 200 years later the slaves in the West Indies were all set free.

With good weather the Speedwell soon reached Southampton, where she was met by the Mayflower, a larger vessel, which had come with more passengers from London:

So now the two ships, looking as fair as the flowers whose names they bore, sailed down the breezy Channel together. But they had not gone far when the Speedwell sprung a leak, and they had to put into Dartmouth to have her repaired. This done, they continued the voyage, but with no better fortune, for a few days after, having now gone a hundred leagues beyond the Land's End, the Speedwell was found to be leaking again. So the two captains consulted together, and resolved to take both ships back to Plymouth, where it was held safer to leave the Speedwell and some few of the passengers who were delicate or discouraged by these delays. At last, with now 102 passengers, the Mayflower left Plymouth alone. "After they had enjoyed fair winds and weather for a season they were encountered many times with cross winds; and met with many fierce storms, with which the ship was shrewdly shaken, and her upper works made very leaky. And one of the main beams in the midships was bowed and cracked; which put them in some fear that the ship could not be able to perform the voyage." But the carpenter and the master finding out a way to mend the injury, they suffered no mishap, and after sixty-seven days' voyage across the Atlantic they hove in sight of Cape Cod on the American coast; and though they had intended to land further south, the wind failing and the coast being dangerous by reason of shoals, and the ship being arrived in a good harbour, they resolved here to stay. Wherefore "they fell upon their knees and blessed the God of heaven: who had brought them over the vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all the perils and miseries thereof; again to set their feet on the firm and stable earth, their proper element." And this they were right glad to do, for what with storms and sickness, with lying wet in their crowded cabins, and with not the best of food to eat, most of them had grown very weak and weary of the sea.

Yet small mercies had the land to offer. "They had now no friends to welcome them, nor inns to entertain or refresh their weather-beaten bodies; no houses, or much less towns, to repair to, to seek for succour," and as for any provision from the natives, they might prove readier to fill their hungry sides full of arrows than with anything more wholesome. Besides, it was now November, and winter had set in with fierce tempests and snow. The land was covered with forest, wherein the wolves howled hungrily by night. It was a gloomy outlook, especially for the tender women and the children and the babes, two of whom were born on board the Mayflower, one on the high seas, who was therefore christened Oceanus Hopkins, and one in Cape Cod harbour, whose mother, Dame White, called him "Peregrine," which means a pilgrim or traveller, and he was the first Englishman born in America. Poor Ocean lived not many months, but Peregrine lived to be a very old man. Amongst his kinsfolk and friends were others who bore strange names, which the Puritans thought much of, such as his brother, Resolved White, and Wrestling Brewster, and Love Brewster, boys, and Desire Minter and Remember Alerton, who were girls, and Fear and

A party of the men armed with sword and gun and corslet, under the command of sturdy Captain Miles Standish, were sent on land to explore. They found the country covered with forests, very rough and dense in places, so that, say they, "We marched through boughs and bushes and under hills and valleys, which tore our very armour in pieces." Growing sorely thirsty with their long march, and at length, finding a spring of fresh water, "we were heartily glad, and sat us down and drank our first New England water with as much delight as ever we drank in all our lives." Of the Indians they at first saw nothing but their graves and deserted wigwams, and stores of maize buried in the ground, which they dug up to their profit. The natives, they afterwards learnt, had been swept away by a plague. For several weeks they were searching for a suitable place to land and build their settlement. The weather grew so cold, that the water froze on their clothes and made them like coats of iron. It was the middle of December before they found a proper landing-place in Plymouth Bay, as they named it, after their last port in old England. It was a hopeful spot, for there was abundance of food to hand, such as wild fowl and fish, cod, turbot and herrings, besides mussels and crabs and lobsters infinite in number. There were running brooks of sweet fresh water, and the soil of the land was fertile, being excellent black mould. And there grew forests of oaks and pines, of walnut and beech and ash and hazel and holly. Vines and cherry trees and plum trees, also, and strawberries and leeks and onions and watercress—all there growing wild, but not yielding aught now, for it was midwinter. There also they found hemp and flax, out of which they made rope and linen cloth; and gravel and sand for mortar, and stone for building, and clay which they could use for soap. So they set to work, and hewed down trees and built a common house and store, and so commenced their life on land, building more houses as quickly as they could, and laying out their gardens, and planting the seeds they had brought with them as soon as March set in and the welcome spring smiled upon them. Then the women took their little ones with them, and they all worked together in the fields. Meanwhile they made friends with the Indians who dwelt around, and traded with them and encouraged them to live at peace among themselves. Yet it was a terrible spring, for scurvy broke out among the colonists, and week by week their numbers grew thinner, until all the women but four were dead, and barely half of the 102 Pilgrims who had left the shores of England were alive by the following summer.

Such was the voyage of the Mayflower, and the settlement at New Plymouth and the founding of the greatest commonwealth in the world. None but those who hold God and conscience above all things could have made that voyage and done the great things ensuing.

LINGERING HOLIDAY THOUGHTS.

AUGUST, the holiday month, drew to a close with a burst of fervid heat, and the first days of September—in the South, at any rate—were among the hottest of the year, and of many years past. It made one not very willing to come back to town, and to get one's neck once more into the collar of habitual work. But the benediction of summer rest is not lightly dissipated, and if at first one moves unwillingly and awkwardly in harness, there is a new vigour and a new gladness, which will quickly make it pleasant again to get through with the work, and with as thorough satisfaction as ever in the doing of it.

August is the holiday month—at any rate, for those who have children at school; but one has the happy sense of a much wider field of opportunity, extending over many months and to all parts of the world, for those who are so fortunate as to be able to enter upon it; and it is always to us a great satisfaction, when those who have that good fortune are good enough to let us share with our readers something of the pleasure they have found in their wanderings. Thus it was with a rare pleasure that we published those letters from the friend who gave us such delightful "Impressions of British Columbia," while Mr. LUMMIS, writing from Davos, has recently reminded us of the summer glories of Switzerland, and this week Mr. TYSSUL DAVIS tells of that "great and wide sea," in the contemplation of which he has found such intense pleasure on his voyage to the Cape.

But while we constantly delight in such narratives of distant wonder and beauty, and the passion of travel in other lands sends a thrill of pleasure through our pulses as we sit at home and trace out the path our friends have trod, and read of all that they have been able to enjoy, yet it is with a great thankfulness constantly renewed, as we realise again and again what we have here in England close at home, that we come back to the thought that our own country in the manifold and varied riches of its natural beauty, is as perfect as any in its own way, and in a hundred different delightful ways, on a scale amply sufficient for the needs of ordinary humble folk, for the perfect rest and refreshment of a good holiday.

Think of what we have among the Lake hills and the Yorkshire dales or in Derbyshire, or again in the country about Church Stretton or Malvern or in Surrey, Sussex, or Hampshire; think of Dartmoor and the many bits of noble forest still left to us, or again of the rich Midland counties or East Anglia; and then all round the coast, from the quiet beach to the splendid cliffs and rocky headlands, and the endless fascination of the sea; all this in England, and then Wales and Scotland and Ireland close at hand; and it is not possible to complete the telling of all the treasures of pure delight which are here always ready for the enjoyment and the re-invigoration of the life of our people.

The quiet places of this land are numberless, where one can find the purest pleasure and needed strength and refreshment. And what more does one want than the quiet, the fresh air and the clear sky overhead, with its depth of blue and the sunlight by day, and such calm moonlight as we had a week ago by night and all the glory of the stars; and then, perhaps, a hill-side and a wide view over the richly-wooded plain, the great trees bordering the meadows, patches of woodland, and the cornfields with their golden promise of harvest now rapidly being gathered in. To be in such country, to feel its silent throbbing life, and the strong and steadfast purpose working through it, and all the human interests clustered in its villages and homesteads—to be at one with all this in silent sympathy and at leisure to enjoy all the beauty in its myriad forms through long restful hours, to have no pressing engagements, no difficult decisions to take, and to see the children's perfect delight in the real country, to be with them and go their way in happy and unburdened eagerness,—that is one way, at any rate, and a very good way, to have a fully satisfying holiday.

Each to his own choice. There are a hundred ways in this England of ours, each beautiful and good. And out of what these have to give, one comes back enriched, let us hope, with clearer vision, with saner purpose, with fellowship renewed and made more perfect with the deeper Life at the heart of all that beauty and the marvellous order of the world; and with new hope and vigour, and power of endurance to be put into honest work;

OLD AGE PENSIONS IN DENMARK.*

Now that the question of granting old age pensions has become practical—or, as some think, unpractical—politics, it is well to look round and see what other countries are doing in this direction, and with what results. If it is true that "no man learns by another's experience," it need not also be true of nations. The Danish poor relief system as described by Miss Sellers, who has studied it carefully on the spot, is full of interest; and, especially, that part of it that deals with destitute old age.

Danish law, like our own, holds that every individual who cannot support himself, and has no one to whom he can legally look for support, has a right to be supported by the State. Here all likeness ends.

In England when hopeless misfortune overtakes the respectable poor, they have to betake themselves to the workhouse, where they too often have to live and eat and sleep side by side with imbeciles, and with those who have led drunken and vicious lives. The law makes no distinction between those who have been hardworking and respectable all their lives, and those who have been idle, drunken loafers. Herein lies the sting of going into "the House."

The Danish law, on the contrary, recognises that there is a wide gulf between the respectable poor and the thriftless and dissolute, the gulf of which the better class poor are always intensely conscious, and which is the meaning of the phrase one so often hears from them—"I keeps myself to myself and speaks to nobody."

The great aim of the Poor Law in Denmark is to keep the poor on the right side of this gulf. To this end every town and commune has a "Free Fund" for the temporary relief of the deserving poor, and timely help from this fund saves many from sinking into destitution, while it carries with it neither the stigma nor the disabilities of pauper relief.

Medical relief, or money given to shipwrecked sailors, or burnt-out families, or to any one "stricken by the hand of God" is not counted as pauper relief, even if it is granted out of the ordinary Poor Law Fund, and this principle applies to the support of the feeble and the aged.

There are three kinds of workhouses in every town and commune in Denmark, as well as an old age home.

There is the workhouse, the poor house, and the penal workhouse. Every pauper above 18 may be sent to a workhouse and generally is sent there, if able-bodied. Once there, he has to stay there until he has saved some money with which to start life again if he goes out. There is no coming in and going out at will, as in England. There are workshops connected with the workhouses in which a man may work at his own trade, and receive a small money allowance, sevenpence or eightpence a week, half of which he may spend and half is kept as a sum for him to start life with when he leaves. He must work 11½ hours in summer, and 10 in winter on the piecework system. In the poorhouses the organisation is the same, except that the inmates work on the land instead of in workshops, and the old and feeble paupers are lodged in these. Lunatics are never kept in workhouses, and imbeciles only temporarily, pending their removal to a proper home. The inmates of workhouses are classified in order of merit, the more worthy being kept apart from the less worthy, and allowed more privileges.

Idleness, drunkenness, or any breach of order is punished by transference to a penal workhouse, and this is greatly dreaded. Penal workhouses are intended primarily for loafers, and vagrants. In England these people tramp the country, going from workhouse to workhouse, and on again. The main roads between the workhouses are full of them, and they are the despair of philanthropists and of workhouse authorities.

In Denmark they are promptly stopped on their way and put into a penal workhouse. There they must work for their dinner before they eat it, and must remain for at least six months, after which, unless they have learnt industrious habits, they will only be transferred to a workhouse of the first kind. A penal workhouse, except in large towns, is the joint property of the whole district, generally of a whole county, and wherever one is opened, there vagrancy almost ceases to exist, so greatly do the tramps fear being shut up in them.

It Denmark is severe upon the idle and thriftless, she is tender to her deserving poor when the time comes that they cannot work, and have no one to support them. According to Danish law a man is bound to support his wife, children, and grandchildren (till they are 18); also to pay half of the maintenance of illegitimate children, his own or his wife's, but he is not bound to provide for his parents or grandparents, the community, if necessary, does that by means of "Old Age Relief," which is not pauper relief, and carries with it no stigma, or loss of rights of citizenship, or of individual liberty.

Every man or woman after sixty, if of good character, having resided for the last ten years in Denmark, and never having during that time received pauper relief, or been convicted of a crime, or of vagrancy, may apply for Old-age Relief. The application is made to a Group Inspector, who has his own bureau quite apart from the poor law bureaux, not even in the same street, and his own staff of officials. The relief may be given in money, kind, or by allowing the applicant to live in an old-age home. In fixing the amount of relief to be granted, the authorities must leave out of account any private income that may be possessed up to 100 kroner (£5 11s. 1d.) a year.

Pensioners who are fairly vigorous generally prefer money allowances to going into the homes, but those who are feeble and have no one to "do for them" are thankful to feel that they have the homes to fall back upon. Everything is done in these old-age homes to make the inmates happy. The food is light and wholesome, there is always a large garden, they get up and go to bed and walk abroad when they please, there is no restriction on their liberty beyond obeying a few simple rules, they do not lose their vote or their personal possessions, they have fourpence a week pocket money, and no pauper is ever allowed to cross their threshold. For, as the Director of the Copenhagen Poor Department once remarked: "It is sheer waste of time and money trying to make decent old folk comfortable, if you shut them up with folk that are not decent."

Should the inmate of a home wax quarrelsome, or spend pocket money on beer, or in any way misbehave, he soon finds things different. His pocket money is stopped, so are his walks abroad, and he may even be driven forth from his happy home and sent to live with the paupers.

Classification is the keynote of the Danish Poor Law, and no pains are spared to keep the deserving apart from the undeserving. The gulf that yawns between is never forgotten. At the same time care is taken that the less worthy may rise through good behaviour to take his place beside the more worthy.

The work of administering Poor Relief is done in Copenhagen entirely by highly trained paid officials, the town having found amateur administration too costly. In the rural communes there are committees corresponding to our Boards of Guardians, working always with the help of trained officials and under the supervision of the County Council, the chairman of which is always a State-appointed paid official.

Economy is as carefully studied as classification. The cost per head in a workhouse averages 11½d. a day, including everything except rent. The penal workhouses average less than 10d. a head, and the old-age homes work out at 1s. a head, daily.

Yet the cost of living in Denmark is not lower than in England. The old-age homes in towns are, of course, large buildings, but in the country they are just farm houses in large gardens, with a cottage close by for the man and wife who work for and superintend the home.

The effect of this old-age relief law, which came into being in 1902, has been to encourage thrift. The poor strive hard to keep from having pauper relief, so that they may be entitled to old-age relief at 60 years of age. And as the fifties are hard years to get through, when a man begins to find younger men preferred, and he is often out of work, they try to save a little to help them then; otherwise it is difficult for them to reach sixty without having taken pauper relief. The number of recipients of old-age relief increases yearly of course, but the increase of pauperism in proportion to the increase of population has been less, in consequence, and it is calculated that a saving of some £76,987 a year in the cost of pauper relief has been effected. Could we do this in England?

Miss Sellers thinks we could, and that it would be less expensive as well as more satisfactory than our present system of dealing with the aged poor.

The cost in Denmark of pauper relief and old-age relief together, is less by 2s. 2½d. per head of the population—less by 1s. 10½d. even if the Asylums Board expenses are omitted—than is the cost of pauper relief alone in England and Wales.

The important question of expense, which is the lion in the path of reform here, is thus dealt with by Miss Sellers. "Roughly speaking, Denmark has a population of 2,449,000, while Great Britain and Ireland have together a population of 41,456,000." If, therefore, an old-age relief law, framed on the same lines as that now in force in Denmark, were to come into force in Great Britain and Ireland, it would entail an expenditure of £5,193,000 a year. If the saving in poor relief, by the granting of old-age relief, should prove to be in the same ratio to expenditure in Great Britain and Ireland as it is in Denmark this saving would amount roughly to £2,240,000, with the result that the actual cost of old-age relief to the nation would be reduced to £2,953,000 a year. So far as England and Wales are concerned, indeed, it would be reduced to considerably less than nothing if, at the same time as the pension law came into force, there came into force also, for the special benefit of vagrants, and all other ne'er-do-weels, a reformed Poor Law, modelled on the Danish Poor Law."

VIOLET SOLLY.

TENNYSON'S "GRAIL."

II:

It is significant that at the very outset the poet assures us the "Grail" was no hallucination. "What is it?" asks old Ambrosius of Percivale.

"The phantom of a cup that comes and goes?"

"Nay, Monk! What phantom?" answered Percivale;

"The cup, the cup itself, from which our Lord Drank at the last sad supper with his own."

The super-normal faith is real; it is no illusion. Yet it is real only to the recipient. It is not to be gone after by such as do not feel within themselves its leading. The Idyll has many lessons, and among the foremost this: the essential individuality of spiritual experience. Considered in the context of the poet's work and thought this is what we should expect; it is also in harmony with his interpretation of Nature. For even in these high walks Nature, as in the worlds beneath, seeks ever infinite variety of expression: The spiritual life in its inception and procedure is entirely individual. Socially, it may impose laws and induce a high average of collective action, but in itself it is diverse as are the countenances of those whose souls it expands. Let every man see that he is true to himself. All turns on that. Normal and super-normal, both have legitimate place in the kingdom, only—there must be no infringement of patent! Nature and the soul within her say, here as elsewhere: Be thou Galahad or Percivale, be thyself!

Considered in this light the Idyll falls into two parts: The former comprises the inception—so to speak—of the Grail, as far as line 180 or so; the latter, the knights' resolve, and the adventures which follow.

Let it be noted that at first, until the crisis marked by Galahad's self-surrender, there is no question of going after the Grail. Up to then it is a means to an end, or, better, symbolises a spiritual plane on which an immensely vivid consciousness of the unseen world may enable men for the work that lies before them. The Maiden's motive in fasting and praying to bring it is that "all the world" may be "healed" (128). She sends for Galahad, and gives him the Saintly Commission in order that he may "break through all," &c. (149-165), i.e., participate in the work Arthur is carrying on. Fired by this commission, a consuming desire to attain the veritable Christ-spirit moves him to sit in the "Siege Perilous," the magic symbol of self-loss. The action receives instant spiritual response, and in the mystic occurrence of the thunder we have the first indication that the Grail is to be a touchstone of spiritual character. For that occurrence is variously manifest; to Galahad it is the perfect fusion of soul and sense in the realisation of transcendent love; to the rest it is "thunder and a cry"—hearing, not sight, always the more distant portal of the spirit; to the King, returning from chivalrous errand, it is less than that, nothing mystic, a common thunderstorm, and his only emotion is lest his knights be "smitten by the bolt." His vision lay in the duty he had done. The knights, because they have not seen the Grail as Galahad has, vow they will go forth for a year and a day until they do. At this the King's face darkens. He does not deny Galahad's vision nor disallow his vows, but, in common with his type of Faith, he has deep insight and the judicial faculty of discernment.

"Ah, Galahad, Galahad," said the King, "for such As thou art is the vision, not for these."

Had he been present, had the common sense of Faith been among them, those vows of theirs had not been made. Still, the obligation must be recognised. Infinitely sacred in the eyes of religious faith is a vow, however fond or vain. Contrast Gawain's pseudo-philosophic relinquishment of the same. There is here a deep insight into the fundament of religious faith, Duty, even when self-created and mistaken: "Go, since your vows are sacred, being made."

Then follows the second part of the Idyll, in which the vision is sought as an object in and for itself. The spiritual life, as an end in itself, can have but one implication, ugly as it is, love of self. Galahad apart, self enters more or less prominently into the subsequent fortunes of each of the knights. This lesson lies on the surface, but it is not less worth pondering. Be it noted that Galahad alone suffers no reaction. He never doubts, never looks back, never once loses sight of the Vision, but radiant, all-conquering, bursts upon the stricken and astonished Percivale when the latter turns to the chapel in the vale. Percivale suffers reaction at the outset. This is very significant. As soon as ever the heat of spiritual emotion has died, the sincerity of the man refuses to sustain a part, a faith not naturally his. In his doubt lies his greatness. The whole function of "doubt," in its beneficent phase, is here shown us. It is the prick of sincerity, only disastrous when not immediately and honestly met. The sincere course for Percivale was right-about-face for Camelot; only—that vow! There is the tragedy of it, of resolve made in the heat of emotion, uninformed by discernment, unfounded in truth. All lies there. All faith founded on that inner truth or truthfulness. But his vow "being made" he rides—into complications innumerable, finally into self-knowledge; for the good of a mistake is that it will take you back to where you should have started, the goal of error being always and everywhere Truth—through what infinite tracts of pain first, of "sand and thorns," some of us know.

Most significant also is the order of Percivale's adventures. I refer to lines 379-439, which are pure allegory. The descent of spiritual resolve even from an ideal mistakenly chosen is swift and steep, and all else, even nature and domestic affection to which Percivale turns aside, is, in comparison of the soul's choice, very dust and ashes. At last, so far gone is he, that he pants up the hill after Popular Acclaim, to find a city of dead men upon the heights. Good it is to know, however, that this last wild spiritual escapade leads down into the lowly vale of self-knowledge, self-surrender, where, because his insincerity has not been deliberate, he does realise, in the spiritual passing of Galahad, "the Vision," does learn that it is true, no "phantom," though not true for him.

And as to the passing of Galahad, that shining peak in the whole lofty range of the Idylls, do not poetry and allegory here fuse into that inspired unnameable quality in which all form is lost and atmosphere alone remains, to be breathed, lived in! in which "this means that" cannot be conjectured, any more than the motions of the Divine spirit within us. Thus, "the hill that none but man could climb," leading afterwards down again to the "black swamp;" the "evil smell" of it, the "thousand piers," and "the Great Sea" into which they ran, and their disappearance as Galahad "fled along them bridge by bridge"; these things, one feels, are not to be curiously inquired into: They are poetry in its essence. With Percivale we stand there, asking naught, but having sight through black gulfs of storm and flame of

"the spiritual city, and all her spires And gateways in a glory like one pearl."

In the adventure of Sir Bors we are given to see the proper function of this supernatural faith. Sir Bors falls at length among sun-worshippers (i.e., Naturalism). In quite other spirit they almost repeat the King's words: "What other fire is there," they say, than that by which "the blood beats and the blossom blows?" (cp. for present-day significance, Swinburne's Prelude in Songs before Sunrise.) Bors has no answer, at least no convincing answer, for as yet he has seen no "other fire." Hence he is "imprisoned" in the material, a "cell of great piled stones." How vile is that durance some of us know who have yearned to give assurance of the Divine realities we feel to others whose only avenue of conviction seems to be demonstration. So deep may this yearning be as to constitute almost a doubt in our own breast as to those realities. This is the prison-life to which poor Bors was reduced. And it is here that the "wonder" he has been seeking is granted, not, be it noted, in answer to his quest, but as a response to the imprisoned divine nature, as assurance of a mightier than nature—"nature" as understood by "Naturalism." Such, according to the Poet, would seem to be the true function of "wonders." Work-a-day faith does not need them, is better without them; but a faith paralysed by doubt, yet living, may in this way be delivered, and rendered again fit for its task.

The significance of Lancelot's adventure lies wholly on the surface, as does that of the empty, foolish Gawain. Be it noted, however, that when Gawain taunts Percivale and his sister with having "driven men mad," the King at once rallies to Percivale's side. There is an enduring affinity between religious faith and religious excitements and the mocking opposition of the carnal mind instantly calls this into recognition.

It is significant, too, that on Percivale's return to Camelot he should find the place much shattered by a "yestereve's gale." Had the place stood as he left it, the impression would be that of the permanence of the material contrasted with the transitoriness of spiritual vision. As it stands, the material is at least as incalculable as the spiritual; the very implements and achievements of a work-a-day faith are not stable. We are thrown back on the Spiritual, and none so much as they that work righteousness.

And this leads to a concluding observation, that the poem, while it countenances, nay, gladly accepts and shows the uses of visual manifestations of the Unseen, conceives them, even at their highest, as inferior to that which is purely inward and spiritual, to the faith of which the King is the type. For the vision is with the King perpetually:

"Until this earth he walks on seems not earth,

This light that strikes his eyeball is not light,

This air that smites his forehead is not air
But vision—yea, his very hand and foot—
In moments when he feels he cannot die,
And knows himself no vision to himself,
Nor the high God a vision, nor the One Who rose again."

EFFORTS are always successes. It is a greater thing to try without succeeding than to succeed without trying.—W. Walsham How.

AUTHORITY is the greatest and most irreconcilable enemy to truth and rational argument that the world ever furnished. It is authority alone that keeps up the grossest and most abominable errors in the countries around us; it was authority that would have prevented all reformation where it is, and which has put a barrier against it where it is not. For man to be tied and led by authority, as it were with a kind of captivity of judgment, and though there be reason to the contrary, not to listen to it, but to follow like beasts the first in the herd, they know not nor care whither—they were brutish.—Richard Hooker.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

BY THE REV. WILFRED HARRIS, M.A.

Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God; but unto them that are without all things are done in parables; that seeing they may see and not perceive; and hearing they may hear and not understand; lest haply they should turn again and it should be forgiven them.—MARK iv. 11.

AMONG the many hard sayings attributed to Jesus, few are so staggering as this in which he gives his reason for speaking to the people in parables. He speaks in parables in order that they which are without may see and not perceive; that they may hear, yet not understand. In amazement we ask, How is this? Is not Jesus the teacher who more than all others seeks to explain and to make clear the mysteries of the kingdom of God? Why, then, when speaking to those outside the kingdom, does he throw a subtle veil round wisdom and quietly muffle the voice of understanding? Most revivalists help the sinner with prudential motives; they point out clearly the foolishness of sinning that men may fully understand the advantages of repentance and perceive the certainty of immediate forgiveness. They dwell on the awful punishments and sufferings of the wicked, and on the sublime joys and pleasures of the redeemed. They do not speak in parables, but point out plainly all the evil consequences of an evil life and all the good consequences of a good one. They urge their hearers to abandon evil as folly, and to choose virtue as the best policy. They require men to run no risk for conscience sake, but with open eyes to examine for themselves the superior texture of the good life. Let the multitude compare the jewels of heaven with the pale and pasty pleasures of sin, and convince themselves that however much they have been delighted with wickedness, yet to "enjoy God" will give more pleasure still. The revivalist offers tickets for heaven at reduced rates, and invites men to crowd in. He offers forgiveness as a certainty, and makes repentance cheap that men should turn again and that it should be forgiven them.

Consequently we are, indeed, amazed when Jesus, who came to call men to repentance and to preach forgiveness actually refuses to exhibit for closer inspection the hidden mysteries of God. "Lest men should turn again" and in some such meagre and miserable way "it should be forgiven them."

This hard saying represents far more than a hard saying, it represents a hard dealing, a severe line of action.

Paul tells us in one passage to consider the goodness and the severity of God. The people who are the most severe with us are not those most indifferent to moral issues. They are those who love righteousness the most, and are more careful for our well-being than for our well-seeming. And God whom we reverence as the All Holy, is infinitely severe in his discipline and judgments:

In God's world, at all events, unselfishness is not to be attained without a struggle, nor love without loss, nor salvation without self-sacrifice; narrow is the way and straitened that leadeth unto life; goodness is not made easier than sin, and God Himself does not smooth away all the ridges on the road to righteousness; the slow ascent of man is not a speedy downward slope. The spirit of Holiness has raised the hills above the plains. God Himself has made the difficulties which man must learn to surmount. The true prophet of God, then, will be as severe a disciplinarian as God himself. He will not attempt to remove God's own landmarks; he will see them rather as God intended them to be; he will not smooth away, nor underrate these difficulties. He will not make goodness easy. He will not offer it at any cheaper rate than God offers it. Though by a touch of his finger, or of his insight, he could remove a mountain, yet if God have willed that mountain to be there, he will leave it.

And so it comes about that this hard saying of Jesus reminds us at once of the hard doings of God.

There are in the world a vast number of temptations to wrong doing: avarice, greed, selfishness, pride, malice, temptations of the body, temptations of the mind, temptations of the soul. All these things make goodness difficult. They are meant to do so. And if any man were to come into the world and were to say: "I have come to take away your temptations and to make goodness an easy thing," that man obviously would be no true prophet.

On the contrary, as God has made the way of life difficult, and has made it so purposely, we may be quite sure that any true prophet of God will leave these essential difficulties just where he found them. He will not remove the natural temptations, trials, and difficulties of the moral and spiritual life. He will not by word or deed make the service of God one whit easier than it was before. He will not cheapen virtue, or lower the standard of righteousness. His words on all such matters will be as "hard" as God's action, as severe as God's will. He will not remove the difficulties, whatever they be, the surmounting of which is necessary to salvation.

Now of all the difficulties which God has put in the way of our leading a righteous life, there is none greater than the difficulty arising out of our ignorance. We live in great perplexity, in an atmosphere of mystery, and the world about us is but a maze of questions to which we seek in vain for an absolutely certain and speedy answer. Continually may we ask ourselves, Why should I serve God when the very existence of God is a matter of doubt to me? Why should I do right when it is not yet clear to me that righteousness is and always must be the best policy?

This is, I think, the actual state and condition in which, under the providence of God, we have to live our moral and spiritual life; it is a state of intellectual uncertainty.

And, indeed, when we look more deeply into it, is not this intellectual uncertainty the very Magna Charta of our moral freedom? We are free to choose, because reasons that might compel us are lacking. In the absence of intellectual guidance we are thrown back upon ourselves for the decisive judgment, and through this our way upward into the higher atmosphere of free moral choice. It is the only condition upon which, in the actual presence of God, a moral and spiritual life of our own could be given us. Jesus then will not remove the veil of intellectual uncertainty which forms the basis of moral responsibility. Our conduct must be moral, not intellectual, in all moral matters. Only by closing the lower door can the higher one be opened. His parables, therefore, half reveal and also half conceal divine truths. He is careful never to prove the existence of God; he does not demonstrate to the intellect the certain punishment of wickedness and the sure reward of goodness; he offers no proof that prayer is answered, and that a good and God-fearing life is the best policy. It would have been fatal to his purpose to prove any of these things.

If the existence of God were demonstrated, all men would instantly "accept God" in the same sort of spirit in which they accept the sun, moon, and stars, land and water, rocks and the sand by the sea-shore. Yet does God wish to be accepted in the same way that a stone or a rainy day is accepted—as a mere fact, an obvious reality, as obvious to the wicked as to the good, and as much honoured by the one—out of fear—as by the other out of love?

Neither did Jesus wish to demonstrate, as so many teachers of righteousness try to do, that goodness is the best policy. True as it is, yet how could real righteousness continue were its truth once demonstrated? Would not all men at once begin to do right, not for love of righteousness, but because it was the best policy? Men would be satisfied to be wise and prudent, and that would be all. In like manner of prayer. Suppose that Jesus, with his incomparable power of explaining and demonstrating deep truths, had once for all convinced our minds by mere reasoning of the great truth which he himself saw so clearly, that prayer is heard and answered, what would have been the result?

Would not all men have begun to pray? Men would have gone praying as they go gold hunting, and in the same spirit, for what they could get. Men would lay down prayers as they do gas pipes, and use the Holy Spirit of God as they do the water-tap. Did they want to be virtuous, to be blessed, to be comforted, they would turn to God. All very well from the point of view of men getting what they want, but what from the point of view of one who reverences the holiness and sanctity of God? Is the Almighty to be nothing more than a reservoir of useful spiritual qualities, which any man, by merely turning a tap, can supply himself with just when he has a mind to?

Surely not. If prayer be a reality, it is best kept like a spring of pure water far removed from those who would foul it with profanity and self-seeking. Let it be kept pure. Let the road to it be marked with a mark that will attract the reverent, but repel all others. Surely it must ever be one object of the religious teacher to half conceal, as well as to half reveal, the greatest and most sacred truths. Whilst he desires the penitent and reverent seeker after God to find the way to God, yet also he desires the irreverent, the impetuous, and the impertinent spirit of selfish and self-seeking curiosity to miss the way, those who would seek God if haply they might stare at Him and say, "Oh, so that is the Almighty, is it?" Such seekers after God, and they are perhaps more numerous than we think, he desires to miss the way altogether.

If possible, he will send them down the wrong road, they shall see, yet not perceive; they shall hear, yet not understand; they shall come back in the same spirit in which they started, unconverted and unforgiven! This hard saying, then, reveals in Jesus not so much a lack of sympathy for sinful men as a sense of reverence for the holiness of God. We have always to remember, at a time when so many dispute about the very existence of God, that no such doubt at all existed in the mind of Jesus. And if we for a moment can share with Jesus this sense of reverence and can think out honestly our own relationship to God, it must surely be clear to us that there are states of mind common enough in us, states of self-centredness, of self-satisfaction and conceit, or states of a complaining, miserable, and mean spirit, which do not fit us either for praise or prayer. In such states of mind may it not be that the hard discipline of life, and continued blind battling with the facts of the world about us, will in the long run do us more good and effect far more for our conversion than any attempt of the revivalist preacher to arouse our interest in divine things? Therefore, I take it, Jesus left "them that are without" to the further discipline of life that they might learn from experience rather than by mere spoken words the existence of realities which at present they failed to see. And to such he spoke in parables, for he had no wish that any man should approach God in prayer, or profess to serve God, or even be aroused to seek after God, who should do so in a manner and in a spirit unworthy of so great a guest, and without due sense of the holiness and the reverence due to him Whose wisdom rules, Whose goodness provides, and Whose love sustains the whole world.

So far, then, as I can read Jesus' meaning in this exceedingly difficult passage, it is that he desires no hypocritical converts. He does not approve of making the outside clean and leaving the inside still impure. He will not stop the "cough" of sin. He will make no whitened sepulchres, nor take away the sinner's last virtue, sincerity. For sin is against God, not man; it is inward not outward. Moreover, the sinner is not in Jesus' eyes beyond the redeeming grace of God; rather, as he commits his sins in God's world, he is being continually taught by God's severe discipline, as he is also continually being spared by God's mercy. Moral and spiritual character is disciplined by living in a world where it has not absolute knowledge of God, and does not know enough to act wisely and prudently in the service of God. For the development of moral and spiritual life, is it not better that a man should be left in ignorance and uncertainty as to which course of action shall bring him happiness? And that he shall know only that one is right and the other is wrong?

He has then to be guided not by knowledge of consequences, but by moral choice alone. His action, if he does right, may, for all he can see, bring him disaster; and his action, if he does wrong, so far as he can see, bring him just what he wants to get. In a world so full of uncertainty, that the wicked may easily appear the wiser way, and righteousness may well appear imprudent, in a world from which God has disappeared, and in which His laws of righteousness are not being enforced in any very obvious way; in such a world wisdom and prudence can guide no man with the same surety that faith, hope, love, and sterling moral character can do. So long as mankind are thus kept in a state of intellectual uncertainty, they are thrown back upon moral and spiritual character as their surest guide. Here, then, their spiritual life begins, and each man wakes to the sense of his own personal responsibility for his own conduct. If he cannot choose by consequences, he can choose by motives. He can act on the noble or the ignoble motive.

He then would be, perhaps, but a poor teacher of righteousness, who should too clearly prove to men that right conduct would have happiness for its consequence. He may prove, after all, to be the better teacher who leaves men in doubt about this, who even calls them to do right, to be loving and to have faith, without displaying all the rewards of so doing. Can he leave them to suppose that if they follow him they will have to face persecution and poverty and sorrow and worldly loss, and yet say: "Nevertheless, though it seem painful and hard it is your duty; though faith mean martyrdom, yet it is fidelity; though love bring self-sacrifice, yet it is love." He sets the moral issue clearly before them, he offers them a spiritual choice, and actually, by hiding wisdom and prudence, reveals and brings into sight, without our understanding that he does so, the real mysteries of the kingdom of God. He so reveals yet so conceals his meaning, that he leaves us to choose, with a free and unbiassed mind, on the moral and spiritual issue alone.

The wicked will not follow him—that hint about persecution and loss will deter them. But the sincerely honest and upright will act on the sense of duty and right, no matter what they suffer for it. So in unfettered freedom, men may make their moral and spiritual choice. Then, under the discipline of God's world, the years roll on, the early morning mists slowly roll away, and one by one the consequences of our varied moral choosing appear clearly before us in the landscapes of later life. To our surprise, when we did the right thing, even though it seemed foolish, we discover that it was also the wisest thing, and the thing most helpful to our highest welfare. And when we did the wrong, but at the time the seemingly wise thing, we may look back in amazement to behold that what we did was the most foolish thing imaginable, the direct cause of infinite misery and remorse.

The consequences, when they are seen, may reveal to us at a later time the rule of righteousness, and show us when no harm can be done by it, that a good life is also a wise and prudent one. But in God's world things are so ordered that our freedom of choice between right and wrong, faith and doubt, love and hate, shall not be taken from us by seeing all these consequences at the time.

And if this be God's method of giving to each man freedom of moral and spiritual choice, it may help us to understand how one who came to draw men into the kingdom of God, sought to inspire them with a deeper sense of their personal spiritual responsibility for the motives they chose to act upon, rather than to direct them to any wise and prudent calculation of consequences.

Are we ever inclined to believe that Jesus did not really mean what he says in this hard saying? How then shall we ever explain his joy and thanksgiving, "I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes: yea, Father, for so it was well-pleasing in Thy sight?"

Surely Jesus is consistent. His words are stern, his line of action severe, his cause of thanksgiving famous through the world. If we differ from him on this matter, if we would make hypocrites, or take wisdom and prudence as our surest guides into God's kingdom of faith, love, and self-sacrifice, do we not differ from the Great Teacher in our whole heart and soul? Are we not removing the very keystone of the arch of heaven as Jesus beheld it? Shall the intellect go first? Shall we refuse to take even God for certain! Shall we watch Him first, and trust Him afterwards? Shall we discover Him first and love Him afterwards? Can love explore no further than the mind can in the reading of souls? Is it the wisest and most prudent thing to understand the Almighty thoroughly before we trouble to humble ourselves in His Presence? Are not wisdom and prudence too tall to enter in at the gate that Christ entered heaven by? Will they humble themselves to enter into any peace that passeth understanding? Will wisdom and prudence lead us to the cross of Christ? Will they teach us love? Inspire us with faith? And coolly guide us to any place where God is?

Shall all the mystery of the kingdom of God be given to them alone? Amen

LIKE THE WIDENESS OF THE SEA:

FABER must have been standing on the prow of a vessel in mid ocean, looking with eyes of love and longing over the broad stretch of waters, when there came to him his sweet song of the larger hope. For the sea, that inspires terror while expressing the wild power of Nature's elemental energies, can assume a magic, eloquent of the thought voiced in Faber's hymn. The heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind! The kindness of the sea! A little winged creature has followed our ship, fitting to and fro over the wake of the vessel, and dipping its white-rumped body as if to catch the kiss of the wave-crest, and at night it folds its black wings to commit itself in entire trust to the benign breast of the great ocean, which rocks it to sleep, and, homeless itself, makes a home for the stormy petrel.

And man, by building a craft after the manner of the body of a bird, has learnt to profit by the same kindness of the sea. From the burnt-out canoe of the savage to the thirty-thousand-ton liner of the modern, man has made him a shell to serve for house upon the waters, and thereunto committed the mutual tokens of the divided nations, and sought out distant brethren, and knit the world with cords of fellowship. It is the sea that unites peoples that on land will slay each other for a reef of shining pebbles; it is the sea that washes away the wrongs of continents and makes clean the memory of landward cares. Man erects barriers everywhere except on the blue expanse. But the salt breath is ever redolent of what is free and open. The buoyant waves furnish no anchorage for a fixed prejudice; the inelustable stream sweeps down the pale of privilege. Hence the sea that "hath no outland limit save the blue sky and the low light of the shifting stars" offers best material symbol of the large measures of the operation of God.

All the week, since I left Southampton on my way to the Cape, I have been alternately haunted by Faber's verses and a Welsh hymn that opens with the same sentiment: "Mae ei gariad fel y moroedd." Looking out upon the immensity of the ocean, I seemed to gain a fresh realisation of the wondrous love of God when I called to mind it was like the wideness of this wondrous veldt of heaving waters, this ever-changing plain, silver-frosted, sapphire-radiant, violet-tinted, hyacinth, amethystine sea.

For an occasional trip across the Bristol and English Channel or Irish Sea had not prepared me for the marvel of these Southern waters. For the first time, I have felt the passion of the sea-farer. The hunger of my eyes can never be filled enough. I wait for the dawn to watch the sun rise out of the eastern horizon, and know not which to be the greater splendour, that or the setting. By day I make show of reading, but my eyes ever go roaming over the waste, until the soul is straitened with longing for an infinite something of which this limitless flood is but type and shadow.

Round the walls of our vessel the song of the sea makes never a pause. Its swish and swirl are our herald of morning and harbinger of the dusk; the husky whispers of its surge are our tolling for prime and vespers; the wind may rise with moaning or fold its wings to sleep upon the hollows between the waves, but its sweeping music will not cease while we move down the waterway of six thousand miles at the end of which lies the harbour of our purpose. And its message to the ear is that of the broad glimpse to the eye—the wide mercies of Him who holds the world in the hollow of His hand. When the glories of the sunset that dyed the billows in blood and fire fade away, and the night comes swiftly down, throwing the shadow of its wings on the darkling waters, and new stars appear that "glitter magnificently unperturbed," the mysterious murmuring of the wind mingles with its canorous cadence, and the sea fills with voices that are like the arcane crooning of invisible hosts. Then the secrets of those submerged continents of which deep-sea soundings show the Azores and Canary Islands to be but their highest mountain-peaks, become voluminously vocal, and the ocean depository of the civilisations of sunken Atlantis testifies how the modes of men must ever pass away, but the word of God abideth for ever.

O winds that sigh like "wanderers from the world's extremity;" O floating multitude of restless rollers; O stars tangled in the web of night as hos'ages of the hidden light; bring to me through the mirk an accent of that word that faileth never, that I may not take false for true and illusion for reality. Small comfort were it for man if the breadth and depth that swallow up the distinctive landmarks of the past had no security of their own. The furrows that close as the ploughing keel passes between buoy up the vessel and send it forward on its way. No pathway has been worn for a boat across the trackless main, but by trusting to the law of the pole star, it finds a hidden way that will not err, as the long-winged sea-hawk or frigate bird that passes us swiftly by this moment steers his flight by some shore of longing he cannot see. So man may safely traverse with security the infinitudes of God.

Something of this spirit of trust has entered in to distinguish old sea-faring folk. One of our crew has had forty years' acquaintance with the sea. I regard these sea-dogs with great awe. Years of fellowship with the soul of the storm and the solitude of measureless waters, years of comradeship with the sacred sanctities of the dawning, and the wistful harmonies of the dusk, years of wondering interrogation of the "huge and thoughtful night," years of fulfilment of a passion for the wide open spaces of sky and sea—this experience has set them apart, a race contemptuous of land-abodes and land-cares and land-prejudices, and washed their souls free of many of their trammels in the expansiveness of the sweep and movement of the great main. The genial disposition and general detachment from thoughts engendered in back-gardens and under ceilings that characterise sailors, the wider outlook upon the world possessed by travellers, seem to descend as a natural heritage unto those who love and sail the seas. It may also partly explain the breadth of the colonial spirit. I have not been placed under necessity of waiting for my arrival at the Cape in order to learn something of the nature of the spirit of the colonist, for it has fallen out that the bulk of my fellow-passengers are Africans returning home after a holiday in the old country. It is stimulating to come into contact with minds that have developed a view of life, a social tone, a political temper which is largely different from that in "venerable priestly Asia," and "royal feudal Europe," as Whitman dubs them. The British Africaner laughs at the caste-system of the old country, at its pious conventions, its legislative stupidities. I must wait to have my impressions confirmed before I chronicle them, but the promise of my visit seems to be that to a land "tolerating all, accepting all," where "The doings of men correspond with the broadcast doings of the day and night; Here is what moves in magnificent masses careless of particulars. Here is equality, diversity the soul loves."

Many an evening has been rendered memorable by confidential talks with men who have acted and thought, telling experiences of tragic adventure, of escape from peril and the stern vicissitudes of battle; we have exchanged views on art and poetry and science; we have not been afraid of discussing questions of theology and of religion, and I have found their position to be of the broadest and freest. I have not heard a single good word for the mere missionary, or noticed much respect for the orthodox systems, but sympathy with the underlying verities of life has not been wanting. It is religion outside the churches that seems to be most widely represented on board. But the graces of God also blow freely outside the churches, and neither on land nor sea hath He denied His tokens, who hath never left Himself without a witness at any time or in any place.

J. TYSSUL DAVIS.

FROM HUNGARY.

In a "saison mort," what else could you expect to find but dead silence, and rest, and stagnation? To be more polite in my expression, let me call it "a summer vacation." Old Royal Hungary deserved it after an internal war of some four years' duration. It takes a considerable amount of blindness and neglect to prevent the eyes of those seated on high thrones from seeing that sometimes the most trusted counsellors are their deadly enemies. Thanks to Providence, those of us who were almost shaken in our trust in the wisdom of old age have at last regained all that seemed to be utterly lost. If you come now you will find a Hungarian rediiva on the great plains and in the shade of high mountains.

Golden corn and silvery grapes throw their blessings in an unusually great abundance into the hands of the reapers. And the sower and the reaper meet together in joyous musings, and landowners and workers are happy again as of old, but with a very important difference, for, instead of the once powerful lord and miserable peasants, they embrace each other as co-workers, as helpers of each other, and thus enjoy a hearty dance to the sound of the familiar gipsy music.

Though the political world seems motionless, there has not been for many years a more intense and far-reaching activity in the different branches of the nation's affairs. All this my English readers may well comprehend if they keep in mind that Count Apponyi, the world-peacemaker and great leader of his country, is enjoying King Francis Joseph's full trust, together with Louis Kossuth's son, the present-day Gladstone of Hungary, who received schooling in your famous colleges, and who has learned to know from personal experience the innermost thoughts and feelings of all the important nations of Europe. We are expecting great things from the present so-called "great ministry," though we are aware that it is only a transitory one. For who would not regain lost hope, seeing Dr. Wekore, with his great capacity in finance, the political heir of Deák, in the presidential chair, and Count Andrássy's worthy son at his right hand, as head of the Interior. In consequence of these things, your correspondent hopes to meet your readers in future more frequently in their homes; but let him also hope that enterprising English capitalists will find their way here and see that it is a vital interest for England to be in close touch with Hungary as the only capable separator of German and Slavic races in the heart of Europe.

Very soon after this letter will reach the readers of THE INQUIRER, with us, and partly with you also, school work will have begun again. This reminds me of a heartfelt duty towards my revered professor, Dr. Drummond, who has this year concluded his active collegiate work. It is just thirty years but one since I had the great privilege of entering Manchester College, in London. The greatness of an educational institute depends almost entirely on the teaching staff. How fortunate Manchester College was then you know far better than I. There was the great philosopher, Dr. Martineau, as principal, and Dr. Drummond, Mr. Upton, and Mr. Carpenter as his colleagues. Dr. Martineau was at the very height of his fame, surrounded by his former pupils and admirers, themselves all young in vigour, but already enjoying full respect and love, not only of Unitarians, but also of a large English-reading public. How deep was the influence upon all of us students, as we sat together with them at the great master's feet! And the younger professors, especially Dr. Drummond and Mr. Carpenter, followed Martineau's example in their friendship with the students, and gave us the chance to meet them in their family circles and spend with them a few free hours. Dr. Drummond and his colleagues must have felt during their long life that their aims were appreciated; and, as for myself, I confess that my gratitude towards the teacher and friend is deep and sincere, and I only wish that Dr. Drummond may long enjoy his rest from college work, in order that henceforth he may have even more time to give public utterance to his deep thoughts and scholarly studies. As for Dr. Carpenter, I simply wish that he may continue his work so amply begun. He is already the leader of liberal thinkers almost, I may say, all over the world. He knows better, perhaps, than anyone else, the tides of the thoughts of all great thinkers. As head of Manchester College he will, no doubt, influence his colleagues and pupils with his far-seeing liberal ideas, and make them all apostles of that real fraternity and brotherhood which only the true disciple of Jesus can appreciate.

I am glad to report that our young men here take now a great interest in pastoral work. The twenty places in our theological college at Kolozsvár are overcrowded, since in the last three years we have had twenty-three or twenty-five students. In consequence of this, we are able to send a student to the Unitarian Home Missionary College, at Manchester, through the very kind help of Principal Gordon. Thanks to the generosity of English Unitarians, we shall next year have three students in England—a young lady, Miss Pünkösty, at Channing House School, London; Mr. C. Raffay, at Manchester College, Oxford; and Mr. Alex. Kiss, at the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester. I only wish that we could receive, in their stead, at least one young theological student at Kolozsvár. I am sure Mr. Raffay would introduce anyone to the Hungarian language, so as to be able to make a study here of our present life and our glorious history. I think it would repay the trouble of anyone interested in the history of Unitarianism.

You will be interested to hear that we have lately received a good number of converts from the Roman Catholic Church, and also that several new churches have been built over the field. I have seen the re-opened Thorda school, and can assure you that this ancient fortress of Unitarianism will gain a good deal through this school. I have also seen the Keresztur high school working with a splendid set of young professors, all of them University men. In their midst you feel the real strength of Hungarian Unitarianism, because they are surrounded by populous Unitarian congregations on all sides.

Our annual meetings will be held in Kolozsvár on the last Saturday and the following days of October.

Let me mention that the splendid volume of the Geneva Conference will be published this year in the Hungarian language.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE.

V.

I.—It is not to be expected that all your days will be screened from danger. When sin comes near, remember your divine inheritance, allow your soul to so delight in the God-spirit inhabiting the temple of your being, that heart and mind may be purged from every evil thought, that you may be so filled with active joy, no sin can find a cranny for its roots.

II.—Salvation is growth; to be saved you need simply to keep growing.

III.—Every day there is new strength, every day more light, every day greater things become possible for you; as you grow you become more and more filled with the deathless power that is eternal!

IV.—Obedience is a poor incentive, love is the best. To obey is to be servile, to carry duty like a convict's chain, to turn worship into bribery, prayer into a cry for mercy. But to love is joy, confidence, and exultation! It is recognising the divine voice and hastening to the Father's arms.

V.—What a difference between "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not kill," and "Why of your own selves know ye not what is right?" Inspired with love, how poor the attempt to force the divine spirit and drive it with goads. Why evade the method of Jesus by still seeking to compel rather than to win?

VI.—Religion cannot be put into your life nor into any life by compulsion. You cannot make your child do right! Yet that which no force can compass a breath of the spirit of love may create.

VII.—"Will you or won't you?" is the most serious question we are ever asked to answer. We inherit from innumerable ancestors, we are surrounded by impenetrable conditions, we are fed by countless streams, heredity and environment play their settled parts, but do not decide the issue? You are always at the crossing of many ways; any one is yours, but only if you choose to take it!

VII.—The paths to nobleness, the opportunities of service, the calls to daily heroism, are opening ceaselessly before each living soul. Seek, and you shall find. Ask, and you shall receive.

IX.—Do not say the world is rude, your fellow-men unkind, fate cruel. If you cherish the loving spirit of an "Amiel" or a "Thomas à Kempis" the visions that inspired them will inspire you.

X.—Life is greater than all its difficulties. Goodness is overwhelmingly stronger than evil. Your living spirit is much more than a match for its temptations. "You need not sin."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

Suffolk Village Mission.—Mr. Richard Newell writes from The Manse, Framlingham, asking for contributions of cast-off clothing in aid of his mission:—"We hold our annual rummage sale at Bedfield on September 19, which will be the only means for the poorest amongst us to obtain winter clothing for their families. We put a merely nominal price on the articles sent in, so that the spirit of independence is encouraged, and at the same time it is a real charity to the people. It is also much better to provide beforehand for winter, now when there is a little extra money left from the harvest, after paying the year's rent, &c., better than to appeal for help when cold wet winter sets in. May I ask your readers to remember us promptly by looking up superfluous garments and sending in parcels in time for the sale. Consign G.E. Railway, carriage paid."

Aberdeen.—The new building for the Unitarian Church is now nearly ready for opening. The Hall has been in use for several Sundays, and has proved highly satisfactory. Its acoustic properties are perfect, and it is light and comfortable. The church is a surprise to every one. Its fine proportions are warmly admired, and great expectations are cherished regarding it. The various rooms and conveniences in connection with it have been well planned in view of the building being used as a centre for religious and social work. A considerable sum is yet needed to meet the entire cost, and the congregation is making determined exertions to raise it. The dedicatory services will be conducted by Principal Carpenter, M.A., D.Litt., on Sunday, September 23. A "House Warming" will take place in the Hall on Saturday, September 22, at seven.

Chorley.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, August 26, to large and interested congregations, by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith. Solos were rendered by Mrs. W. Porter and Mr. F. J. George. The collection realised a good amount.

London: Stratford.—On Monday, August 27, in connection with the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope, a flower-show, plant growing competition, and general exhibition of curiosities, &c., was held. A fair number of plants were sent in, and six prizes were awarded. The exhibits were many and varied in character, consisting chiefly of hobbies and objects of interest belonging to the children. There was a fair attendance.

Van Mission.—The 100th meeting of the Mission was held on Wednesday of last week at Heckmondwike, where the van was admirably placed on the Green. Successful meetings were held throughout the week. In the previous week at Bramley, a suburb of Leeds, the Mission was loyally supported by the Rev. A. Amey and members of his Pudsey congregation, and with good results, though the numbers there were not so large as at Heckmondwike.

Wolverhampton.—The Rev. J. A. Shaw was last week taken seriously ill with acute pneumonia, but is now practically out of danger, and is making satisfactory progress towards recovery.

MANY of our readers will be interested in the following account of the Letchworth "Open-air School" which is being built by Miss Lawrence at Garden City. The building is being constructed in such a way as to make open-air life possible all the year round. Miss Lawrence's plan is to instruct teachers, and she proposes to begin with a series of congresses and summer schools, with holiday parties for elementary school teachers at Easter and Whitsuntide. Questions of hygiene will be thoroughly studied, and the practical possibilities of open-air life demonstrated. It is hoped that the building will be completed in a year. Considerable progress has already been made. The wide-roofed verandah, which faces south, will serve the double purpose of a living and lecture-room by day and a dormitory by night. The furniture is to be of plain oak, with no upholstery. There will be no carpets or curtains, and no sharp corners to catch the dust. The walls and floors will be washed down with a hose. The surrounding grounds are being laid out in arbours and covered alleys, and a turfed amphitheatre is being excavated to serve as a students' meeting-place.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN next week's INQUIRER we shall publish a sermon by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong on the Beauty in Nature, a sermon after a holiday, preached more than once in Hope-street Church, Liverpool.

WE publish this week the sermon by the Rev. John Cuckson, preached in the First Church of Plymouth, Mass., on the Sunday before the celebration on Aug. 1 of the 300th anniversary of the founding of the church at Scrooby. In that celebration, an account of which will be found in the Christian Register of Aug. 9, the Governor of the Commonwealth, his Excellency Curtis Guild, the Hon. John D. Long, ex-Secretary of the Navy, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Dr. S. A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, and others took part. Cordial greetings were received from the Rev. T. T. Munger, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. Washington Gladden, and others. In the conduct of the afternoon Communion service the Rev. John Cuckson was associated with a number of other ministers.

"THE Rev. Frank K. Freeston, of London, England, will preach at King's Chapel on Sunday, Sept. 2, at 10.30 a.m." So we read among the announcements in the Christian Register of Aug. 30. For the rest of September and October, as our readers are aware, Mr. Freeston is to occupy the pulpit of the First Church at Cambridge, Mass., while Dr. Crothers preaches at Essex Church, Kensington.

ON Saturday and Sunday last the centenary of the Padiham Unitarian Church was celebrated, the new memorial schools being opened on Saturday by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, a former minister of Nazareth Chapel, and the Sunday services being conducted by the Rev. Joseph Anderton, of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, who is a native of Padiham, and the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. We have received a full report, but too late for use this week.

IN connection with the Padiham Centenary, the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, the present minister, has published a history of the congregation, with eighteen portraits and other illustrations, and some pleasant reminiscences by former ministers. It will be a very welcome memorial of the hundred years of a remarkable history.

IN a recent number of Liverpool Opinion several replies were published in answer to a question addressed by the Editor to ministers of religion in that city: "Is there any indication of Atheism gaining ground in Liverpool?"

Canon Woodward's reply was brief, but to the point:—"I am not aware that there is any distinct indication of Atheism gaining ground in Liverpool. Agnosticism is perhaps more prevalent than formerly, but the chief enemies of the Christian religion are ceremonial formalism; superficial scepticism; the selfish pursuit of pleasure and indifference to great moral questions."

The Rev. J. Collins Odgers wrote that, after only two years' residence in Liverpool, he could not make any general statement in answer to such a question, but added:—"I may say that, as regards the young people with whom I am connected, I have no ground for supposing that religious conviction is becoming weak before the attacks of Atheism or Agnosticism. . . . I daresay many young people in this city experience religious difficulties in the face of scientific discovery and the advance of modern knowledge, but I should be the last person to say that all doubt is wicked and must lead to atheism, darkness, and despair. In very many instances doubt has led to the adoption of a faith which is sincere and free—a faith which does not shun the light. It is bondage to the letter which has so often been allowed to kill the religion of the spirit."

THE Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Hope-street Church, in the course of a long reply, wrote:—"When one man calls another man an Atheist, it usually means, not that that man denies God, or denies the Divine Idea in the Universe; but simply that that man's thought of God and conception of the Divine Idea are different from his own. His conception cannot coincide with the God of the Garden of Eden, with the God of Calvin, with the God-to-be-propitiated of sacerdotalism or 'revivalism,' with the God of the sacramentarian. Immense numbers of men turn away from these conceptions and are therefore called Atheists. But they are not therefore Atheists. This is not merely irreverent denial. It is a greater reverence, which can no longer rest satisfied here. It is a desire to readjust their thoughts to the sublimer conceptions and the intellectual necessities of to-day. Most of them are looking for God or that for which the name 'God' stands: looking diligently for conviction of the moral order of the Universe, whether they find it or not. What they do deny, for themselves, is a particular notion of God, which does not satisfy their heart and their mind."

It is announced that the late William Colfox, of Bridport, has left £1,000 to the Unitarian Chapel of that town, with which he was all his life connected, and £50 to the Sunday-school. Among his benefactions are also £500 each to Manchester College, Oxford, the London Domestic Mission, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

MANY friends in this country will hear with regret of the death at Calcutta of Mr. A. M. Bose. The Westminster Gazette of Wednesday had the following note:—"The first native of India to obtain a place among the Wranglers in the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos was Mr. Ananda Mohun Bose, news of whose death in Calcutta is contained in the papers to hand by this week's mail. Among the public men of Bengal there was perhaps none held in such universal esteem as this eminent citizen, whose talents were recognised forty years ago by Sir Henry Maine during his tenure of office in India. He was a former president of the Indian National Congress, an indefatigable member of the old Calcutta University Senate, and a leader in the Brahmo Somaj, the Church of Reformed Hinduism, which during the period of its prosperity represented almost all the reforming influences in the religious and social world of Bengal. Mr. A. M. Bose was called to the Bar in the early seventies, and practised for more than twenty years in the Calcutta High Court."

A FORTY YEARS' MINISTRY.

ON Sunday last the Rev. Ambrose N. Blatchford, B.A., completed forty years of ministry at Lewin's Mead, Bristol, first as junior colleague to the late Rev. William James, and from 1876, after his senior's death, as sole minister.

The services of the day were devoted to this commemoration, and in his morning sermon Mr. Blatchford dwelt on the memories attaching to this long association with Lewin's Mead.

At the evening service the discourse was addressed to his fellow-citizens. Taking as his text Psalm xxxi. 21—"Blessed be the Lord; for He hath showed me His marvellous loving-kindness in a strong city"—Mr. Blatchford said:—

When, as in the present instance, remembrance is fraught with happiness, it is not only a duty, but a pleasure, to pay one's tribute of thankful recollection to those whose courtesy and treasured friendship have ministered to the joy of life, and of earnest work, in their midst. Sincerely, therefore, do I thank God for marvellous loving-kindness shown to me in a strong city. For is not this same Bristol that we love, and wherein so many of her adopted, and grateful, children have found a home, "a strong city"? I do not mean "strong" in that grim material sense dear to the hearts of warriors. Approach her confines from the landward side, no frowning battlements give warning or challenge to the stranger. No deadly guns seal up the grand old Avon gorge. And yet, in a far nobler sense, Bristol is "strong" indeed. Such estimate as I may presume to form of her spirit and of her ways I gather in the light of forty years' acquaintance with those who have earnestly and unselfishly striven to uplift their fellow-citizens, to direct the city's energies, and to spiritualise the private life of her inhabitants. Seriously and thankfully do I hold that this city of ours is strong in all that makes for a people's progress—and so let us reasonably call to mind some of the justly enviable characteristics of this our dwelling-place.

Turn first of all to that page, more or less dark, in the experiences of every community. What light do the criminal statistics of our city throw upon the manner of life of the dwellers therein? Is it not a fact, reassuring as it is incontrovertible, that a careful examination of those sad statistics will reveal a noteworthy and a blessed scarcity of violent and more flagrant crime? Look to the calendar of your police courts after any general holiday, and you will have cause to rejoice at the sure testimony thereby afforded that, in Bristol, the multitude that goes out to keep holiday is a self-respecting one, that in the main knows right well how to take care of itself.

And yet again, though not as one who has the right which close knowledge of such matters can alone confer, before I pass to other thoughts, I leave with you this question as to the infrequency of the failures and crashes which within our own personal recollection have confused the steady commercial life of the city. There must have been a serious carefulness upon the marts of business which no wild sweep of rash speculation has availed to shake. I hold, too, that this same spirit of heedfulness has actuated and balanced our municipal life; yea, and it has lent depth and strength to the way in which the citizens have addressed themselves to the national and international questions which all communities have to face firmly, and with perfect veracity of conviction. You and I can summon up old times of national controversy that swept over our city; but, like an April storm, it passed away and left the air the clearer for the very honesty, as well as earnestness, of the respective leaders in the struggle.

These are healthy memories on which it does us good to dwell, and the causes of such an attitude of people towards one another are not fair to seek. Such causes are two in number, and the first that I would mention is to be found, as I sincerely believe, in the whole tone and character of our newspaper press. Occupying a position to which duty and conscience constrains me, and holding views differing from the vast majority of faithful religionists round about me, I have had exceptional opportunities of estimating the absolute fairness and generosity of every section of our Bristol press. Delightful it is to pay one's tribute of grateful recollection to many a departed worthy who made Bristol newspapers respected far and wide. Before my mind's eye passes the happy memory of Joseph Leech,

"Whose wit in the combat, as gentle as bright,

Ne'er carried a heart-pang away on its blade."

I remember Peter Stewart MacIver, who gave Bristol her first daily paper. Out of the past there floats the recollection of George Somerton, of Henry Mills, and of the worthy George Powell. It matters not how warmly attached to this, that, or the other set of public causes our newspapers may respectively be, I have proved their chivalry, I have seen them faithfully doing their duty to the living, and dealing so gently and so generously by those who have "passed to where, beyond these voices, there is peace." No wonder, then, that in presence of such an influence the public life and work of our old city need fear comparison with none. It is a strong, clear factor for all that is good in the ever-developing life of our city, with which, thank God, no man may ever hope to tamper.

And that other great and constantly active cause that goes to make Bristol "a strong city" is increasingly borne home to me—it is the strength and the depth of the religious sentiment in the midst of her. It is there, and it is useless to ignore it, it is perilous to alienate it. But it is my happy task to bear faithful and willing testimony to the services ungrudgingly rendered to their fellow-citizens by the clergy of the church, and by the ministers, whose names are honoured in every Nonconformist household of faith. To live in contact with these men has been nothing less than an education in Christian culture and in Christian liberality. See how the Church of England bears the remembrance of such servants as the broad-minded Dean Elliot, Canon Girdlestone, Archdeacon Norris, Canon Ainger, and the wise and ever-gentle Bishop Ellicott. Again, Bristol can call to mind the faithful Monseigneur Clarke, the scholarly and courtly Dr.

Clifford, and his kind-hearted and most assiduous successor in his Clifton Bishopric, Dr. Brownlow. Such are they to whom the Church of Rome turns as her trusted representatives in Bristol. The record of the past forty years is bright indeed with the names of honoured and beloved leaders of Bristol Nonconformity. In faithful remembrance we seem to see the dignified and gracious presence of David Thomas; and side by side with him I set the happy and the lovable recollection of our own William James, who rose from a couch of sickness to preach his last sermon, and that sermon a warm tribute to the worth and to the work of David Thomas, when Highbury mourned its honoured preacher's death. Samuel Hebditch, too, and Isaac Roper worked and taught within the space of years that falls within this night's grateful retrospect. Reverently I call to mind the widely cherished name of George Müller, that true-hearted father to the fatherless, from whose hands the task he loved so well passed to the generous care of James Wright; while he, too, has laid life's burden down and gone home to rest in God. Out from my happy past memory calls again the winsome and the welcome presence of our dear and generous-hearted friend Urijah Thomas; and "he, being dead, yet speaketh" in every heart that loved him; for never was a nature more full of the sweet spirit of brotherliness than was his.

I want you to realise the spirit that these honoured ones breathed abroad. Such men command our affectionate respect; they drive away from our hearts the spirit of exclusiveness and the unhealthy mist of prejudice. Most thankfully do I bear this hearty testimony; for I acknowledge gratefully the touch which such characters have laid upon the heart of Bristol; nor do I wonder how the religious spirit of this goodly city has strongly flowed into philanthropic and educational channels. I remember gladly how my early ministry was made happy by the trust of such a spirit as that of Mary Carpenter. I recollect, too, the untiring efforts for the suffering children whose hospital on St. Michael's Hill is the truest monument that could perpetuate Mark Whitwill's name. I call to mind the faithful services of such justly honoured citizens as George Thomas and Robert Charleton; nor would you wish to forget two names at which the heart of Lewin's Mead leaps up—names that remind us how Christopher Thomas and how Herbert Thomas loved and served the city whose praise is on my lips to-night.

Take, then, at last, as at the first, my heartfelt thanks for the kindness with which my fellow-citizens have met me on my way, and have brightened my round of sacred duty; and with my gratitude receive also my deep and my affectionate prayer that God's abiding blessing may light, in overflowing mercy, on the Bristol that we love.

A GREAT faith is never wasted, even though you cannot discern its achievement; an unconscious, a self-forgetful display of human nobleness has in it at least this, that it helps men to be nobler. There is contagion in heroic goodness.—Charles Beard.

SOCIAL REFORMERS.

III.—JOSEPH MAZZINI.

FEARED, hated, idolised, Mazzini was truly a prophetic man. Though he did not die a martyr's death, he lived (as Carlyle judged) a martyr's life. His religion was simply theistic, his politics republican, his social scheme, so far as he elaborated it, tended to collectivism; in all three directions he said much that was excellent, but his personality claims more notice than his views—what he was compels more admiration than anything he said. If my space allowed, I should prefer the task of picturing his character in detail to that of exhibiting his theories; but, hoping that even these brief notes may send some of my younger readers, at least, to his works in order to form a closer acquaintance with this brave and noble soul, I shall content myself here with giving the barest outline of his career as a necessary introduction to the consideration of his contribution to the modern programme of social reform.

Joseph Mazzini was born at Genoa in the year of Trafalgar, and his childhood was spent amid the alarms and terrors of the later Napoleonic wars. At the settlement of European polity that followed the battle of Waterloo, the Italy we know was but a "geographical expression." The peninsula and adjacent islands afforded territory to a number of royalties and other sovereign powers. There was thus a kingdom of Sardinia in the north, a kingdom of Naples with Sicily in the south, a Lombardo-Venetian kingdom held by Austria; Rome and its vicinity was held by the Pope, and there were also several duchies more or less independent. Among the people whose fate it was to be mere pieces on the board where diplomatists played the game there was a spirit of fierce discontent. The ferment of the French Revolution was at work, and in particular hopes grew high of casting off the yoke of Austria. In 1821 an unsuccessful revolt was made by the Piedmontese; subsequently Genoa was crowded with refugees, and young Mazzini's mind was seized with the patriotic passion to give his life to the cause of Italian unity. A fervent lover of Dante, a proud but mournful admirer of the arts that in bygone ages had made glorious the cities of Italy, he burned with the desire that the national life might revive and its ancient glories be rivalled by the new creations of genius. But in its shattered state the nation, he felt, could never fulfil high destinies. Like many another ardent spirit of the time he took on himself the vows of a secret society, the Carbonari, accepted a mission of propaganda in Tuscany, was arrested and imprisoned. In the fortress he meditated new plans, and on his release he founded a "Young Italy" society, and with a few companions rapidly diffused the ideas of the scheme. They issued (1831) a journal bearing the name of the movement, and Mazzini's fervently religious spirit at once differentiated the new venture from the old literature of revolution. It was none the less, perhaps all the more revolutionary; the authorities were alarmed, not without cause. The journal was suppressed, violent measures were adopted towards suspects; Mazzini himself was condemned to death.

But his judges had not yet got hold of him. In fact he made good his way into Geneva, there to found another journal, L'Europe Centrale, and still another, La Jeune Suisse, and to ferment agitations, unsuccessful in everything except the education of unwilling subjects and the provocation of unwise rulers. At last, even Switzerland, the brave nation that once defied our Charles II. and gave safe and honourable asylum to the "regicide" Ludlow, yielded to the pressure of the French King, Louis Philippe, and condemned the young conspirator to "perpetual exile."

In January, 1837, Mazzini came to London, where he was destined to spend many years. His poverty was extreme at first; he barely struggled through. By his pen he just managed to live, and the fruit of his toil remains in essays, critical and constructive. Saddened by the materialistic tone of those who in the main travelled the same political roads with him, he raised his voice, as one crying in the desert and "proclaiming the name of the Lord." Meanwhile European affairs ripened to the year of revolution, 1848, and Mazzini hastened to the scene of Italian insurrection, became one of the triumvirs placed at the head of the Roman Republic of 1849, and emerged from the fatal struggle in which the young government was involved with the French troops, a worn out old man. "Mazzini," wrote Margaret Fuller "had suffered millions more than I could. . . but he had never flinched, never quailed, had protested to the last against surrender, sweet and calm, but more full of fiery purpose than ever; in him I revered the hero, and owned myself not of that mould." This was the man of whom Carlyle had written five years before, "I have had the honour to know M. Mazzini for a series of years, and, whatever I may think of his practical insight and skill in worldly affairs" (Mazzini had pretty severely criticised Carlyle's views a year earlier), "I can with great freedom testify to all men that he, if ever I have seen one such, is a man of genius and virtue, a man of sterling veracity, humanity, and nobleness of mind, one of those rare men, numerable, unfortunately, but as units in this world, who are worthy to be called martyr souls; who in silence, piously in their daily life, understand and practise what is meant by that."

Once more an exile, he never lost hope, never ceased to beseech on behalf of the higher ideals of democracy. The political struggle continued. At last he saw, but with scant satisfaction, a "united Italy." Being an Italy shorn still of some of its rightful territory, and governed by a monarch, it was not yet the Italy of his dreams. In 1870 Rome was seized by the Italian troops on the withdrawal of the French, and in the following year he ventured to his native country, incognito, and in March, 1872, died at Pisa.

What, we must now ask, were Mazzini's thoughts respecting the organisation of society? He lived, as we have seen, in the atmosphere of revolt, but his was not a blind crusade. Carlyle might doubt his "skill in worldly affairs," but he knew at least what he was aiming at, and it was as definitely opposed to laissez faire as Carlyle's doctrine was. The older writer had protested with unequalled force against the notion, then set forth (as he believed) by those who wanted freedom of commerce, that freedom was enough for industry. In his "Past and Present" he presented an ever-memorable contrast between the vigorous organisation of labour carried out under a mediæval abbot, and the disastrously chaotic condition of the manufacturing population in his day. But while Mazzini gratefully welcomed all this, he regarded Carlyle's work as "a step toward the future, not a step in the future." In 1843 he ventured to hope that the more advanced step would be taken by Carlyle; but he died without seeing the hope fulfilled, and the question is how much farther his own writings take us.

Well, for one thing, he believed in democracy, while Carlyle did not, and, since it appears very certain that democracy is in some form or other to characterise the civilisation of the immediate future, it had better be advocated by one who has genuine faith in it. Mazzini had confidence that sooner or later the great mass of humanity would have the sense to govern itself, to understand its own needs, and to take advantage of its opportunities. Of course, if mankind is "a herd confused," and must for ever be dull and stupid, or frivolous and sensual, the case is hopeless; but such was not Mazzini's conviction. Perhaps he was too optimistic in his view of human nature, but if so, it was a noble fault, and one likelier to correct itself as time goes on than that of the cynic or the pessimist. Mazzini's writings teem with appeals to the nobler feelings of the common people. He, if any, is the apostle of human brotherhood, not within one nation alone, but throughout Europe and the world.

But his faith in man was strong only in so far as man has faith in God. His complaint against the Fourierites, and Saint Simonians, and similar would-be regenerators of society, is that their systems are steeped in materialism. Such systems may, he concedes, contain many good and useful ideas, but not only are they spoiled by tyrannical proposals that would destroy the characteristics of our human nature—they are unspiritual, and therefore false to the best thing in man. "With the theory of happiness, as the primary aim of existence," he says, "we shall only produce egotists who will carry the old passions and desires into the new order of things, and introduce corruption into it a few months after." He sturdily maintained that Bentham's advice to regulate conduct by a calculation of pleasures and pains was profoundly mistaken. "The barren, godless formula of interest" would never, he was sure, inspire the motor force of a real reform in society. The "rights" of man must be striven for; the "duties" of men no less. In short, Mazzini, in order to be a social reformer, was a religious reformer. He looked upon "collective humanity" as the destined embodiment of a divine idea; and he called his brethren to the consciousness that beneath their struggles for this or that immediate step in advance lay the will of God, a will that men must seek to understand and whole-heartedly fulfil.

From all that has been said it will probably be inferred, by those whose acquaintance with Mazzini's works is scanty, that he has more to say on the emotional aspect of the social question than in regard to specific proposals of remedy. The inference is just; nevertheless we should notice his adhesion to economic principles of a very distinct type. His good sense recoiled from the supposition that all the world of industry and production, the evolution of which has been so long-continued and so gradual, can be suddenly reconstructed. He advocated ameliorative developments—the wider diffusion of capital, re-division of profits, industrial union, extended facilities of self-culture. He waged no war against property. If we should seek to abolish it, we should suppress “a source of wealth, of emulation, and of activity, and would resemble the savage who cut down the tree in order to gather its fruit.” His ideal is “the union of labour and capital in the same hands,” the abolition of needless and profitless intermediaries, and an equable remuneration to each according to his work. He says: “Association of labour and the division of the fruits of labour, or rather of the profits of the sale of its productions, between the producers, in proportion to the amount and value of the work done by each—this is the social future.”

There is something almost commonplace in these suggestions. We hear them echoed on every side, though not as yet by every voice. Especially familiar is his contention that in our system of taxation the first necessities of life should be exempt, though he goes beyond the hand-to-mouth policy of many in adding that we shall thus “render that economy which gradually produces property possible to working men.” Most familiar is his contention that the political privileges of property should be suppressed and that all should have “a share in the work of legislation.” The note that is peculiar to his “prophecy,” and conspicuously absent from much social propaganda to-day as in his own time, is that which never ceases to warn us that all efforts at reform are vain unless prompted and guided by loftiest conceptions of human nature and its relation to the Eternal. We hear much to-day of what Dr. Drummond once called “the kingdom of comfort,” little of “the kingdom of heaven.” It is Mazzini's characteristic that from first to last he was true to the higher call. Dean Stubbs* speaks of him as “a Prophet whose most immediately practical ideas were still always founded on Eternal principles,” and emphasises his repeated declarations of faith. For further illustrations of Mazzini's views, I would refer those who do not already know the book, to “God and the People: the religious creed of a Democrat, being selections from the writings of Joseph Mazzini,” by Charles William Stubbs (Fisher Unwin, 1891).

HEBREW PROPHECY.*

In a pamphlet of fifty-six pages, the treatment of such a subject as Hebrew prophecy must necessarily be in a sense superficial. M. Réville frankly admits that what he offers is only a sketch, and so it is; but it is a very good sketch. It appears, from the prefatory note, to have been delivered as a lecture last year, and it aims at popularising a knowledge of the Hebrew prophets and their work. In the French phrase, which has a curious look for English readers, it is “une œuvre de vulgarisation.” Those who heard the lecture could have no reason to complain that the lecturer had given them too little in the hour during which they listened to him: The ground which he covered is, of course, familiar to students, but the outlines of the subject are clearly drawn. Perhaps the best part is that in which the origin of prophecy is shown to have been a sort of frenzy or possession, a state of exaltation, partly natural, partly acquired. Persons in such a condition were thought to be under the influence of some god or spirit. This phenomenon is not peculiar to Hebrew religion, but appears amongst many other peoples. Only among the Hebrews, however, did prophecy develop from such rather repulsive beginnings to the spiritual height of an Isaiah and a Jeremiah; just as it was only among the Greeks (this is M. Réville's suggestive comparison) that the “orgiastic fury of the dionysiac festivals” was purified until it could produce the great tragedies of Æschylus and Sophocles. The fact, in both cases, is certain; but in the case of the Hebrew prophets, M. Réville's lecture would be more valuable if he had brought out more clearly how the change came about. Not that he passes it over altogether; but the point is of such great importance that a little of the later detail might well have been sacrificed to allow of fuller treatment of the earlier part. Once prophecy was started on its upward path of development the description of its various types and phases is easy; and, in this lecture, is excellently done. Every one knows how prophecy died out, or rather became completely transformed. Its spirit reappeared, according to M. Réville, in the Apocalyptic works, though accompanied by a weakening of the moral ideal and a materialisation of the prophetic hopes. On the other hand, so we are told, the ancient faith shrivelled into the legalism and ritualism of the scribes and the priests. This is, of course, the usual assertion. But the fact remains, all the same, that the continuity of Judaism, as a living religion, was maintained by the scribes and not by the apocalyptists: The Rabbis were certainly not prophets; but they had that in them which was not alien to the old prophetic spirit, and which served to show for centuries that the ancient faith was not dried up, though its exponents adopted the form of legalism. The passage from prophecy to Christianity is clearly marked, no doubt, for Jesus is evidently the last and greatest of the prophets, whatever else he may have been. But the whole inheritance of prophecy did by no means pass to the rival, and in some sense alien, church. And the Judaism of to-day knows that it did not.

* “Le Prophétisme Hébreu, Esquisse de son histoire et de ses destinées.” Par Jean Réville. Paris: Ernest Leroux, 28 rue Bonaparte. 1906.

This question, however, would lead us far beyond the limits of M. Réville's pamphlet. Those to whom French offers no difficulty will find much pleasure in reading his lucid exposition, and find that they know more than they did at the outset about the prophets and their work.

PLATO ON THE TEACHING OF RELIGION.

It is very seldom that there appears in the pages of our chief philosophical journal, Mind, any discussion of burning questions which deeply interest the general public, but into the present number the subject of religious instruction in schools has found an entrance in the shape of a very thoughtful article by Mr. Foster Watson on “The Freedom of the Teacher to Teach Religion.” Mr. Watson's paper is an exposition of Plato's views on this subject, and also an attempt to show that Plato's ideas in a modified form suggest a satisfactory solution of the problem which is now exercising so many minds. The writer urges that the educational condition in Athens in Plato's time was somewhat analogous to that which now prevails in this country. A large proportion of the population were polytheistic in creed, and accepted as authentic many of the mythological stories in Homer and Hesiod, while the more cultured section of society, and especially the philosophers, were either wholly sceptical or inclined to some form of monotheism. This being the case, one would rather have expected that Plato would have favoured a purely secular system of public instruction; but, curiously enough, the fact is precisely the other way. “The modern Christian,” says Mr. Watson, “disapproves of the ordinary conception of religion which Plato combated, but many nowadays would suggest, judging from their attitude in questions of the day, that, in the circumstances, Plato ought to have advocated education with religion left out. But Plato thought education included a satisfaction of the highest needs of the child's nature as well as of the lower needs. He—no man more—would urge that knowledge should grow from more to more, but also desired that more of reverence should prevail, especially in the school teaching. His remedy was not secularisation of the schools, but the enunciation of educational canons for the religion that should be taught to children. He demanded (1) that God should never be spoken of in any sense inconsistent with the essence of goodness, and (2) that God must never be represented as whimsical, fickle, or given to falsehood in any shape. Teaching opposed to these canons, however, supported by the authority of poets or priests, is, in his view, degrading and uneducational. When a poet uses language inconsistent with these canons, Plato stipulates that we should not allow our teachers to adopt his writings for the instruction of the young, if we would have them grow up ‘to be as God-like and God-fearing as it is possible for man to be.’”

Plato makes short work of the difficulties of securing such teaching. He would have censors appointed to supervise all that is to be taught to the young. He does not specify whom he would employ as censors, but from what he does say it is evident that they would not be the representatives of the poets, priest, or even of the people; "they would in all probability, to use modern terms, have been those experienced in educational discipline, in the study of the reactions and effects upon the growing mind of the sort of subject-matter in instruction of all kinds, including in their reflective outlook religious as well as all other provinces of knowledge, thought, and practice which are suitable for the child-mind at its various stages."

It is not contended by Mr. Watson that Plato's educational canons are the only or the highest canons for religious teaching to-day. Their value consists chiefly in their recognition of religious teaching as an integral part of the educational process.

Were Plato with us to-day, it is probable, we think, that he would see, in the "Cow-Temple" arrangement for religious instruction the nearest approach at present practicable to the realisation of what he meant by the teaching of religion in public schools. He would, however, be very far from satisfied with the qualifications for religious instruction which are now required from our teachers. Plato distinguished between the artisan and the artist; and he strenuously insisted that he who practises the art of education must be an educationist. It is here, contends Mr. Watson, that we shall do well to heed the great Athenian; "we must not exclude religion from the field of the school disciplines because our teachers sometimes are not educationists; rather, seeing the unspeakable significance of the art of education, instead of excluding religion, we must see to it that those to whom we commit the work of education in that subject are educationists." The duly qualified educationist will care for the intellectual and moral development of his pupils more than for the inculcation of his own particular conclusions on science or history or on religion. This is what Plato means by being an educationist teacher. Such a teacher, who has caught the spirit of Plato's view of religious education, will constantly keep, in his moral and religious teaching, to the highways of humanism. He will dwell on the important points in morals and religion which have an illuminative bearing upon conduct and life. He will bring the human side well out in all the material of instruction used—Scripture or other books. "He will," says Mr. Watson, "inculcate, above all, reverence for personality; for this is the basis of both the human and the divine idea, and at the root of it is will. . . . It is, moreover, of importance to awaken reverence for 'good'-will, even when we differ from its form of manifestation. . . . For example, in the last generation Darwin was spoken of as an atheist and an infidel. Now the schoolmaster cannot settle controversial, religious, and scientific questions, but he can show his reverence for all sincere efforts of will in the search for settlement. . . . Even in the case of Dr. Colenso, had any occasion arisen for referring to it, the schoolmaster might reasonably have claimed the right to stand unmoved before his boys in the 'shameful panic' (as Dr. Hunter recently described the attitude of the religious world towards that Christian critic of the Bible); not that he should have necessarily accepted his views, but on account of Colenso's call for justice to the native tribes, and the great Bishop's 'passion for truth,' and readiness to take pains in the search for it. Those were positive merits of personality, and deserved a recognition which they did not always receive."

The conception of the province of the teacher which is here indicated is, we believe, the goal towards which our educationists ought to strive; for as Plato clearly saw, it is the moral and religious principles immanent in human nature which we must awaken and appeal to, if our education is to draw forth and develop all the higher potencies of human character. However impracticable it may be—at present—to leave the religious teaching of the children wholly in the hands of the schoolmasters from whom they receive the rest of their education, there can be little doubt that the calling in of special teachers for the subject of religion can hardly fail to encourage in the minds of the young the mischievous notion that religion is for certain days and certain hours, and is not a principle which ought to pervade all conduct and all study.

As Dr. Martineau truly says, in a powerful passage quoted by Mr. Watson:—"We are not made upon the pattern, to be children of nature at ten or eleven and children of grace at four; nor is religion a separate business, a branch of study, a programme lesson that can be emptied out into an hour; but a life of every time, a spirit of all work, a secret wonder in the thought, a manly duty in the will, a noble sweetness in the temper which spreads from the eye of an earnest teacher, though seldom coming from his lips; but which would cease to burn in his silent looks were there not sacred things represented by him of which at any moment he might speak."

"With these words before us," concludes Mr. Watson, "let us pause before we say we want the secularisation of the schools without any qualification."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In this month's Contemporary Mgr. Barnes concludes his interesting study of the Lord's Prayer, and an article by the Countess Martinengo Cesaresco on "A Religion of Ruth," tells of Jainism, as different and yet a close parallel to Buddhism. Canon Hensley Henson, in a second article on the Ecclesiastical Discipline Report, shows how little calculated its recommendations are to promote freedom and the national character of the Church of England. The evidence of the Bishops of Hereford and Birmingham is somewhat fully quoted, clearly bringing out the dramatic contrast of the two positions within the church: And this is Canon Henson's conclusion:—

"What the Bishop of Hereford regards with alarm, and holds to be destructive of the National Church, the Bishop of Birmingham proposes as the true Anglican practice, and looks forward to as the solution of existing problems. The commissioners would probably dissociate themselves from Bishop Gore's reading of Anglican history, and some of them certainly do not agree with his conception either of the Anglican system or of the needs of the present time, but they have thrown their weight into his scale rather than into that of the Bishop of Hereford, and have endorsed his exalted Episcopalianism. Yet we believe that Bishop Percival is the sounder judge of tendencies and probabilities, and we are constrained to think that the substitution of Divine-right bishops administering their dioceses by inherent episcopal authority for the régime of law can never be reconciled with the traditional independence of the English clergy, or with the religious demands of an essentially Protestant nation. The recommendations of the Commissioners would not secure immediate relief from ecclesiastical disorder, and they would fatally compromise the character of the National Church."

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., earnestly pleads that the time has come when something ought to be done in the matter of Old Age Pensions. "Germany, Austria, France, Belgium, Denmark, our own New Zealand and Australian Colonies have all in recent years done something practical by legislation and administration to provide for their aged poor," and we ought not to lag behind. There is also an extremely interesting article by Sir Philip Magnus on "Early Jewish School Training." It is a fine ideal of education that is there set forth. What it did for the Jews as a people the following passage describes:—"It may be truly said that the Jewish school grew up on the ruins of the Temple. It became the means of preserving the national existence. . . . The school was the sole means left to a proud people of maintaining their existence, of holding on to their inheritance: What compulsory military service became later on to other nations, compulsory school attendance was to the Jews. In the war which they waged against ignorance and indifference the school was their fortress. In the field of learning, which they cultivated with the same patience and patriotism as they had displayed in the defence of their citadel, the school was their national emblem."

The Rev. Forbes Phillips, in his article on "Is 'Job' a Problem Play?" answers the question with a strong affirmative, and is glad to have the countenance of a Bishop for his view, which he holds to overcome many critical difficulties, though his Bishop is so far away as Theodore of Mopsuestia. Bishop Welldon contributes the fine address on "The Training of an English Gentleman in the Public Schools," which he gave in Tokio last April, at the instance of the Minister of Education of Japan.

In the Independent Review Mr. J. L. Hammond has a fine tribute to Charles James Fox, in connection with the centenary of his death. "Fox," says Mr. Hammond, "was, of all the conspicuous statesmen of Europe, the one consistent champion of nationalism."² "He dreaded injustice more than confusion, and he believed that repression could never answer the questions which misery or discontent flung to the rulers of society. Pitt never meant, even in his early days, to change the basis of power. Fox, like Chatham, believed that the nation wanted the vigour of popular government." There is also a clear and convincing statement of "The Case for Women's Suffrage," by Lady Trevelyan, and a first article on "Sir Edward Grey's Foreign Policy," by Mr. H. N. Brailsford, dealing with Russia and Macedonia. Other questions, relating to the Congo Free State and the Turkish Empire and Pan-Islamism, are reserved for another article.

The article in this number, however, to which many of our readers will turn with the greatest interest is that on "Progress and the Final Goal," by Mr. J. H. Wicksteed. They will find in it the effort of an earnest mind to think itself clear on the great questions of life and destiny; but an effort, as it seems to us, not yet successful. Mr. Wicksteed contrasts "the idea of progress begotten by the modern study of evolution" (which he regards as "the natural efforts of the universe to better itself") with the Theism on which our forms of worship are based; and finds that the inspiration of the younger faith is drawn from the thought that, "creatures as we are of a lower, and ever abysmally lower past, we may become in our turn the absolute founders and creators of an indefinitely higher future." But such a conception, and "the new tale of wonder," in which "for the origin of every best thing we are told to look to something lower," appears to us pure assumption (and one might add, absurd presumption), unless we can say with full conviction that God was there from the beginning. Mr. Wicksteed, however, appears to be satisfied that he reads the process of evolution correctly and that there is a sufficient substitute for God, and even for "the peace of God," for man whose "love and heroism have no merely derivative excellence, but are themselves supreme, whose "knowledge, wisdom, and creative power are without rival in the universe."²

A longer quotation may perhaps make his meaning clear:—

"It is here that we may find again the peace which passeth understanding. In the surpassing life of Nature beyond our power to move, and beyond our responsibility; and in the secure past history of man, from which we may select for our own all things noble and good, both in act and deed, since we can no longer change what is bad; in these and in the perennial features of the race-life, motherhood, childhood, and the common man's joys and tears and laughter, we have an unassailable heaven of good, inexhaustible and transcendent, yet related to our own individual lives by those most intimately human and personal ties which make these things our own.

"But this is not all. Probably no man's idealism ends abruptly at the achievement of a purely personal heaven for himself, however secure. In all of us there is, in greater or less degree, the impulse to see our own individual lives translated and given back into the race-life that gives us birth. Just as we bring—according to our capacity—the whole world under contribution, to make us what we are individually, so we have the need born within us to try to express our lives in the world-life, and to be in some measure contributors to the garnered stores of the past which will continue to nourish the race when we are silent. It is not enough for each of us to be one more select epitome of all the best we can gather from the past and present; we seek to be ourselves factors in the life of the present and even of the future." All that, we are inclined to say, is true and beautiful in its own place, if only it is seen that at every point it implies God. Sound reason, we hold, can be satisfied in no other way. "In place of the perfect and never-changing Good," says Mr. Wicksteed, "we have the ever-accumulating race-life itself." The contrast appears to us entirely perverse. The ever-accumulating race-life could have no existence without the perfect Good, as the abiding source and ground of its being:

HARVEST SONG.

LORD of the harvest, well may we
Sing with the heart who sing to Thee;
Oh for a purer heart to raise
Worthier songs of love and praise!

Morning and evening, Lord, are Thine,
Singing to man of life divine,
Telling the world that love is here
Summer and winter, year by year.

Lord of the mountains girt with might,
Lord of the ocean shining bright,
Lord of the earth, Thy garden fair
Smiles with Thy goodness everywhere.

Softened with show'rs its fruit it yields,
Green springs the wheat in furrow'd fields;
Glowing with sunshine gleams the land,
Golden at last, on every hand.

Valleys and pastures laugh around,
Singing for joy, with harvest crown'd;
Lord of the harvest, well may we
Sing with the heart who sing to Thee.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—At the meetings of the Triennial Conference at Oxford, a resolution was unanimously adopted that the congregations on the Roll be urgently requested to make an annual contribution towards meeting the ordinary expenses of the Conference.

Early in June a circular, signed by the officers, was sent to the Secretary of each congregation, asking them to give effect to this resolution. It will be a great convenience to the committee if those congregations that have not yet done so, will kindly return the fly-leaf, duly filled in, as early as possible to the Secretary, Rev. Jas. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE VOYAGE OF THE "BEAGLE."

THIS is the story of the man who sailed round the world in search of knowledge and found it.

In a pleasant country house in the village of Down, in Kent, there lived, not many years ago, a fine old gentleman with a kindly face and a big white beard, who might be seen any day in his long cloak and broad-brimmed hat, walking briskly round his meadow for exercise. You might have taken him for an old sea-captain; a traveller, Charles Darwin certainly had been, and he wrote the story of his long voyage in the Beagle when he was a young man, in a book which everyone is the wiser for reading, for there is scarce a book in existence which tells one so much about the world we live in.

Darwin was born in 1809 in the ancient and historic town of Shrewsbury, where his father was a doctor. There he went to school, and there, in the Unitarian Chapel, as one may see by the tablet on the wall, he learned to worship God by manly character and useful labour, and the pursuit of knowledge, which is the love of truth. And few men, if any, have given and have helped others to find, so much knowledge about all kinds of things and creatures as he. The work of his life began when he sailed from Devonport on December 27, 1831, in the Beagle, a brig, belonging to the Navy, under the command of Captain Fitzroy. The object of the expedition, which was sent out by the Government, was to survey the coast of South America for the benefit of navigation and to collect other scientific information in different parts of the world. Darwin went as naturalist. After being twice beaten back by heavy gales, the vessel made a good start, and in ten days reached the island of Tenerife in time to see the Peak at sunrise. Far out in the Atlantic, hundreds of miles from land, dust fell on the ship containing minute stones and the remains of microscopic creatures. Thus it was evident that the very small seeds of some plants, and especially of fungus and moss, may readily be carried by the wind to distant lands. And yet the small rocky island of St. Paul appeared to be an exception to the places supplied with seeds in this way, or unable to offer them a spot to live on, for Darwin could not find there a single plant, not even a lichen, and lichens grow on the bare rock. Yet, strange to say, there were a few living animals. He caught a fly and a tick, a small brown moth, a beetle, a woodlouse, and a number of spiders which lived on all the other creatures. And then there were vast multitudes of birds.

On reaching the coast of Brazil, the noise of the insects in the woods was so loud that it could be heard on board ship at some distance from the shore. Here a small fish was caught, named the Diodon, which has some curious characteristics. A soft and innocent looking creature, with a loose, flabby skin, it was quite capable of self-defence, for it could not only distend itself like a football to astonish its enemy, but could erect spikes over its back, squirt water from its mouth, and make a weird noise with its jaws. But above all, it could bite—so much so, that when swallowed by a shark, it ate its way out to liberty through the fleshy walls of its prison.

The colour of the sea in various parts attracted the attention of the crew of the Beagle. In one region the water, when placed in a glass, was of a pale reddish tint. When examined under the microscope it was seen to swarm with countless millions of animalculæ, a thousand of which, set side by side, would together cover but one inch; yet for miles the sea was covered by them. They were darting about in all directions. The length of life of any one of them appeared to be about two minutes, at the end of which time its movements ceased and it exploded!

Darwin was entranced by the beauty and the solemnity and the teeming life in the Brazilian forests. This was a land of mighty trees festooned with the vanilla and other vines, and adorned with exquisite orchids. Here by day great painted butterflies fluttered past, and humming birds quivered over the flowers; while at night the air was bright with the wandering stars of the fireflies. Here were white ants' nests, twelve feet high, and little frogs that sat on the rushes and chirped like birds.

From Brazil the vessel pursued her course to the south along the coast of the Argentine Republic and Patagonia. Darwin discovered that the great plains or pampas of South America must at one time have been the home of a race of gigantic animals that have long ceased to exist. He dug up, or obtained from the natives, many of the bones of the giants, and one huge skull he rescued from some boys who had set it up as an Old Aunt Sally to shy at.

Darwin found in the people of the lands he visited no less interest than in the plants and animals, but to such an industrious man as he was, South America seemed a land of indolence. He one day asked two men why they did not work. One gravely answered that the days were too long; the other that he was too poor. They would not work on feast days, of which there were a great many, and also held that nothing could succeed unless it was begun while the moon was on the increase. The fact was, food was so plentiful that they did not have to labour for it as we do, which is a very good thing for us.

The Beagle was repeatedly favoured with strangely unexpected visitors. Thus, when far out at sea, numbers of small red spiders alighted on the rigging. Every one of these had its own little gossamer airship in which it safely traversed the ocean. These liliputian travellers were thirsty on their arrival, and appreciated the water provided for them on board the ship. On another occasion myriads of butterflies crossed their track, so that, as the sailors said, "it snowed butterflies," and the long living cloud of them extended farther than they could see even with the telescope.

"While sailing a little south of the Plata on one very dark night, the sea presented a wonderful and most beautiful spectacle. There was a fresh breeze, and every part of the surface, which, during the day is seen as foam, now glowed with a pale light. The vessel drove before her bows two billows of liquid phosphorus, and in her wake she was followed by a milky train. As far as the eye reached, the crest of every wave was bright, and the sky above the horizon, from the reflected glare of these livid flames, was not so utterly obscure as over the vault of the heavens."

The island at the farthest extremity of the continent is known as Tierra del Fuego, or the Land of Fire—not because of its heat, for it is bleak and cold, but because the natives are accustomed to signal to one another by means of fires lit on the tops of the hills. These people Darwin found to be a poor debased race. They lived chiefly on fungus and shell-fish, and sometimes devoured their own old people; and as for house or clothing, what they had scarce deserved the name. A few years before, Captain Fitzroy had taken a party of them with him to England to educate at his own expense. These were now on board the Beagle, and were to be restored to their tribes that they might teach their fellow-countrymen what they had themselves learnt. Quaint names had been bestowed on them, York Minster, Fuegia Basket, and Jemmy Button, so styled because Captain Fitzroy had given the boy's mother a pearl button for letting him go with him to England.

For twenty-four days the Beagle was trying to round Cape Horn, but so strong were the adverse winds and current, that she failed to do so. She at last reached the Pacific by sailing through the narrow strait called after her, the Beagle Channel.

And now, leaving the regions of whales and icebergs and glaciers, the course was northward, up the coast of Chile and Peru, until a group of small islands named the Galapagos Islands was reached, which, little as they are known, probably came to mean more to Darwin than all the rest of the voyage, rich in discovery though it was from end to end. For it was largely owing to what he saw there that he came to write the most famous of all his books, the "Origin of Species," which, when it was published twenty-five years later set everybody reading and talking and thinking, and at first made many people afraid and many angry, yet to-day there are few people who read and think and use their eyes who do not bless the name of Darwin as one of the greatest and best of teachers; for in his great book, and in other books he wrote afterwards, he explained more clearly than any man had been able to do before, or has done since, how God created the plants that cover the surface of the earth, and all the tribes of living creatures. He has helped us to understand how very old our earth is, and how much more wonderful and beautiful than anyone had imagined, and how God still dwells on the earth as much as He ever did in days gone by, and how He has formed the most perfect flowers and butterflies and birds and man himself, by gradually improving, little by little, on their crude and simple ancestors.

The voyage of the Beagle was far too long for us to follow it from point to point. As she crossed the Pacific, Darwin was able to study the coral which is so abundant there, and to find out the way in which the Coral Islands are built up by countless little masons on the volcanic mountains in the sea;

And so by way of New Zealand, the glorious fernland, and Australia with its gum trees, and Mauritius with its fields of sugar-cane, and St. Helena, where Napoleon had died in exile, and Ascension, and then Brazil once more that "great, wild, untidy luxuriant hot-house, made by nature for herself." Then back again across the Atlantic, and so at last for home. "At Falmouth," says Darwin, "I left the Beagle, having lived on board the good little vessel nearly five years."

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XVI.—THE LIFE TO COME.

PROBABLY no one is ever really argued into belief in immortality. Not that argument is lacking. Conclusions are drawn in abundance from:—

- (1) The religious history of almost every race.
- (2) The claims of justice.
- (3) The fact that our powers and capacities are in excess of our present requirements.

The argument is unconvincing. But, if it cannot be proved, neither can it be disproved. The immortality of the soul cannot be denied until more is known of the soul itself, and positive denial of that which lies beyond the reach of scientific inquiry is as unconvincing as positive affirmation.

What then is our confidence? Is it not simply an extension of the confidence which we already have? We can believe that God is, and that we are His creatures, without believing that we shall hereafter be, but we cannot believe in His Fatherly care without also believing that that care will be maintained. If God is Love, He will not undo and bring to nought that which He has begotten and cherished, inspired with affection, raised from hope to hope, from strength to strength, and brought into nearer communion with Himself. The security that flows from Fatherhood is the ground of that confidence which expressed itself once, and for all time, in the simple words: "Neither can they die any more; they are the children of God."

Continuance of life, then, is not a physical necessity, but seems to follow as a spiritual consequence, a continuance of that providential care which can as easily preserve as first create. The soul cannot unclasp its trust in God because it has come to the verge of the unknown. We lean on the consciousness of spiritual relationship to the divine Father. If we cannot trust our reason, or even our yearnings, we trust Him. We start from the inward assurance: "I came out from the Father, and am come into the world," and pass to the further confidence which says: "Again I leave the world, and go unto the Father." The last venture of all may well be made in the words with which Christ commended His spirit into His Father's hands, attaching, in that last utterance undying life to undying love.

A WELCOME PREACHER.

DURING September and October, the Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., is preaching at Essex Church, Kensington, and friends within reach of London have the opportunity, which Birmingham had earlier in the year, of coming under the influence of a teacher whose word and personality belong to the vigour and freshness of the new world, the coming life and faith, full of brightness, courage, strength and hope. Many of our readers remember Dr. CROTHERS at the International meetings in London five years ago, and this year welcomed him again very cordially as the Essex Hall lecturer; and we hope that many also have now made his acquaintance as a delightful essayist in the two volumes, "The Gentle Reader" and "The Pardoner's Wallet," to which we called attention earlier in the year.

If anyone asks, "What manner of preacher is this?" before going to hear for himself, an answer may be found (though not the fullest answer of the living presence) in that volume of sermons, "The Understanding Heart," which Dr. CROTHERS published three years ago. (American Unitarian Association, to be had at Essex Hall, 4s. net.) The introduction, which we will quote, tells something of the preacher's aim:—

"WORDSWORTH describes the man with 'understanding heart.' His thoughts 'from a clear fountain flowing, he looks around and seeks for good; and finds the good he seeks.' He is no mere sentimentalist; nor is he a cold rationalist. He believes in the instincts of his own heart; yet he is anxious to preserve

"His sanity of reason not impaired.' He has reverence for inherited faiths, yet would subject them to that scepticism through which alone the true may be distinguished from the false.

"There are those whose ideal of truth-seeking is that of a heartless understanding. They take for granted that they are living in an unfriendly universe, in which the affections of the soul meet with nothing but disappointment. They seek to prepare themselves for clear seeing by discrediting all that belongs to their emotions.

"There are others who do not believe in any such line of cleavage between the faculties of their own nature. They believe in themselves as profoundly as they believe in the Universe. They believe in great spiritual ideals of love and duty and worship. In these they trust primarily on the testimony of their own hearts; but they find their faith stimulated and sustained by their experience. To them religion is not—

'A history only of departed things,
Or a mere fiction of what never was.
For the discerning intellect of man,
When wedded to this goodly universe
In love and holy passion, shall find these

A simple produce of the common day.'

"Those who have come to this point of view find in the formal creeds only suggestions, and not satisfactory answers to their questions. What is called 'systematic theology' is altogether too ambitious for them. They are anxious to know not how one doctrine may be brought into logical consistency with another doctrine, but rather how it may fit into this goodly universe, and how it may interpret the happenings of the common day.

"To minds of this temper the present organisation of religion in our churches seems open to criticism. The criticism is friendly and hopeful, but radical in its character. The great impression is that of vast resources that have not been touched, mighty powers that are allowed to run to waste. We talk of man as a spiritual being; but how little of his spiritual energy is recognised, while still less of it is utilised! Religious teachers seem to be afraid of religion when it manifests itself in unconventional forms. We have not yet succeeded in organising all the forces of what we call the higher life.

"The problems of the understanding heart are educational. The religious nature tries to understand itself and its real place in the universe. Now the universe is not a fixed quantity. It is continually changing. No one form of thought can express its reality. The man thinking must be free to follow the new developments as well as to chronicle the old.

"The real problems are those which grow out of necessity of continual readjustment. How may our ideals be adjusted to the actual conditions which we meet? How may our religious inheritance be harmonised with our fresh experiences? How may the institutions which have purely spiritual ends be adjusted to those which serve our material welfare? How may we at the same time live according to the rules of sound reason, and according to the inspirations of religious faith?

"Such questions come to us all. In the following chapters I have taken for granted that there is need of readjustment, intellectually and spiritually, if religion is to hold its own. This readjustment, however, can be no merely formal one. It must come through the multitudes of men and women who are doing their work and entering into all joyous activities with an understanding heart. It is through them that the religion of the world is being reorganised."

Here has Dr. CROTHERS furnished us with an admirable leading article, for which we are very grateful, and our readers with a strong inducement to look into his book.

THE CHURCH OF THE LIVING GOD.*

BY THE REV. JOHN CUCKSON.

"The church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth."—1 Tim. iii. 15.

A CHRISTIAN church is a congregation of believers in the authority and teaching of Jesus Christ. It does not exist as a mere religious corporation, or a society of promiscuous benevolence, or for general work of any and every kind, but has a more definite and specific function. What is called a Congregational church differs somewhat from an ecclesiastical body like the Roman Catholic Church, or a State Church, like that established in England in the reign of Henry VIII. It is a private society, existing for special objects. It has public work to do, and has a certain public character; but it is essentially in its constitution a voluntary society. No man is obliged to belong to it, though nobody ought to be excluded from it if he is willing to profess himself a disciple of Jesus Christ. That being so, it exists for a certain definite purpose. It has its own principles, its own objects, its own laws; and it may reasonably object to have its doctrines prescribed or its principles defined and its work laid out by priests or councils or the State. A Congregational church, established as this First Church in Plymouth was, upon democratic principles, regards any interference with its teaching or its polity as unwarrantable and prejudicial to truth and liberty. It exists simply for spiritual ends, and for the application of the example and character of Jesus to the duties and responsibilities of daily conduct. It is composed of all classes of people; and there are no phases of active life, whether of commerce, business, politics, or society, in which its principles are not applicable. If a man is a merchant he is expected to do business on sound, moral principles. If his lot is cast in any industry, he is under obligation as a Christian to do his work, whatever it may be, honestly and efficiently, in the presence of God and in obedience to his own conscience. He may not always succeed, for the best men and women are not perfect; but that is the ideal which the Church holds before him, and that ideal is not to be lowered to suit his delinquencies. It may be, and no doubt often is, difficult to live the true Christian life in front of so many temptations; yet the teaching of Jesus is inflexible, and every man is more or less recreant to it who allows himself, either for profit or pleasure, to depart flagrantly from its standards, and, when he does so, there is nothing for him to do but to frankly confess that Christianity is right and he is wrong.

Now it is not difficult to perceive what a noble function the true church discharges in modern civilisation. It has a message to deliver to all sorts and conditions of men, and to deliver that message without fear or favour, boldly and impartially, not taking sides with this faction or with that, but dealing with moral principles which are authoritative for all classes, for capitalists and labourers, for rich and poor, for the conspicuous and the obscure. The church of the living God can never abdicate this function. The moment it does so, it ceases to be a church. The essential condition of its existence is this, that it is a servant of Jesus Christ, and exists to promote his kingdom of truth and righteousness; and its members meet together to strengthen one another in the faith and love of Christ, and constitute a propaganda to publish the glad tidings everywhere. It is not passive or neutral or evasive, but sticks to its proper work in society.

In doing so, the Church is open to criticism from opposite sides. There are those who condemn it for its inactivity, they would have it in their special service; and there are others who would rather not see it do anything at all. The work- ingmen have no use for it, because it does not take sides with them against their employers, and the politician resents its judgments because they are too independent, and not sufficiently partisan. But has Christianity nothing to do with the labour question or with politics? Are these two great departments of public life independent of religion? Has the teaching of Christianity on these subjects been sufficiently, clearly, and fully expounded? While I contend that churches as churches, cannot with any advantage throw themselves into economic and political disputes, I insist just as strongly that every Christian man has to do with them, and that it is his duty as a Christian to bring to their solution ideas and conceptions of the relations of man to man which have been gained from the Gospel. He should have those broad and brotherly sympathies which would lift us out of many a difficulty, and lead to generous and comprehensive views, in which the rights of all should be recognised. It is the business of the church, it is the business of the pulpit, to instruct men, not as to the economic law of supply and demand, or as to party politics, but as to other and far more important matters—the principle of Christian brotherhood, the application of the law of righteousness, as laid down in the New Testament, that it is the duty of each man to think of others as well as of himself, nay, in the imperative obligation resting upon every man to love the Lord, not for himself, but to serve other men. There was an idea which prevailed half a century ago, and which lingers yet in some communities, that man had to care only for his own soul, and if he cared for his own soul he did everything. That was a piece of selfishness which has been abjured. It is not the idea of the present. It told most injuriously and disastrously. Thank God! a nobler view is gaining ground. The churches are beginning to feel that they cannot be silent and indifferent on great questions: I mean to say that the individuals among them are feeling the need of a public-spirited discipleship. Men who call themselves disciples of Jesus, in these days, must prove their discipleship by caring for others, just as their Master in his intense love and sympathy cared for the people wherever he came in contact with them. The object of every church of the living God is to create and maintain in the community an ever-increasing number of men and women who are earnestly solicitous about the moral and social condition of the town or city in which they live. The physical health, the moral character, the social status of their neighbourhood, is something that concerns them and their children, and the question whether the churches, the schools, the charities, the streets, the drains, the brooks, the slums, and all the things that enter into the making or unmaking of a high civilisation, which make or mar the physical and spiritual condition of thousands, are what they ought to be. Civic duty is part of every man's religion, and is not left to obsolete reformers and old political hacks. He cannot live in a community without putting his character into it. He cannot share the advantages of municipal life without giving back some equivalent of service and sacrifice in return. That is one of the first conditions of a healthy and prosperous social existence.

But life on the common levels requires to be fed from above, just as the fertility of the plains depends upon mountain currents and sunshine and rain. We are all so constituted that we quickly degenerate and our better nature becomes arid and unfruitful without the inspiration of great thoughts and habitual commerce with uplifting and ennobling enthusiasms. Eliminate from common daily life the quickening influences which come from poetry, art, social intercourse, and religious fellowship, and how uninteresting, commonplace and rudely selfish it becomes! Men and women need to be told not once, but often, that they do not live by bread alone. The ideals, hopes, ambitions which make existence fresh and beautiful, and keep it so, have to be held before us so persistently that we cannot forget them, even if we would. When faith is lost in low desire, when emotion is hardened by selfish cares, when the fine sense of what is due from us to God and man is hidden beneath a thousand sordid cares and swollen conceits, when our duties in the home and the world lose the moral imperative that makes them effective, and our sorrows are unsanctified, we drop the style of men, and fall into a dull, cheerless earthliness.

Now the greatest office of the Christian Church is to counteract these tendencies. It is, or ought to be, spiritually stimulating, luminous, strengthening, enabling men and women to fulfil their appointed tasks, to bear their allotted burdens, and to do all with the assurance that One above helps them and cares for them, and that not one of their lives can ever be purposeless or profitless. Hymn and prayer and sermon, when they are what they ought to be, provide spiritual refreshment and swell the tides of the better life within the soul.

The experience of mankind for centuries has taught us the truth of what the Psalmist said: "I lift mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord who made heaven and earth."

It must be obvious from what I have thus far said that the Church of the living God must be free to receive whatever light comes from God to each succeeding generation. It must be an open medium of truth and grace. The door of revelation that lets in truth and gives a chance for error to depart cannot be closed without shutting out what ought to be taken in or retaining what ought to be permitted to escape. The God with whom we have to do is as near to us as He was to our fathers; and He has not only multiplied the avenues of truth, but enormously increased the quantity and quality of truth. A more wonderful sky bends over our heads than that into which men once looked. The world we know is vaster and diviner to us than it was to our comparatively ignorant progenitors. The resources for good at our disposal are greater than ever, and the power both to be good and to do good has been vastly augmented. Into our possession has come all the truth of past ages and more; and, if God's children saw Him in the dawn of history, how much more overpowering is the sense of His presence in this age of wonderful revelation. But, whether the Church is effective or inoperative, whether it touches life with power or is unable to mould it to any purpose whatever, depends upon the closeness of its communion with God and with man.

The church whose three hundred years of fruitful history we are about to celebrate had few beliefs, but they were all vital; few forms, but they were sufficient. It was intensely real. The men who belonged to it held their convictions with a firm grip and worked them out to real issues. To them God was a Living Being with whom they had to do every day of their lives. He entered into their joys and sufferings, and into the events and circumstances of their daily experience. They believed that He was pleased when they did well and grieved when they sinned. There was nothing formal and automatic in their piety. They could not play fast and loose with their duties to Him, making more of their pleasures than of their obligations, but revered Him with a prompt obedience. In fact, that was characteristic of the whole Pilgrim and Puritan movement in England and elsewhere. It was an escape from artificiality and unreality, and from the dull routine of a religion that believed without thinking, had many doctrines, but scarcely any convictions. Have you ever thought how easy it is to drop into that condition to believe with Calvin or Luther or Wesley or Channing, but not much with your own mind and heart? The same was true of their discipleship to Jesus. The man of Nazareth was a working model to be loved and obeyed, and not an impracticable idol to be venerated with mere lip service as men-pleasers. It never occurred to them to question whether the principles of the New Testament could be wrought into private business or national character, nor did they atone for their delinquencies under the plea that the gospel was too high for human nature's daily food and too exquisite for translation into common life. Had they been told that the precepts of Jesus were unworkable, they would have replied, "Then in God's name make them workable just as quickly as you know how, because no other principles are permanently practicable and fruitful in this world or the next." When they were forced to decide whether they should believe a hundred doctrines which they did not understand, and which consequently did not move them to heroic action and eager service, or a few solemn truths from which they could not escape, they ignored the former and clung with all their hearts to the latter, and so left mankind a wonderful example of moral power and conquest. They were in such dead earnest about their own convictions that they had no time to waste on other people's opinions or the mere carpentry of creeds. No idle controversy of their day—and the age in which they lived was full of such controversies—could persuade them to believe that God or man demanded at their hands anything more than faithfulness and sincerity and courage and loyalty to the great convictions which possessed and swayed them as nothing else did. That was the secret of their power; and that alone accounts for the fact that they were able to give to this nation, for all time, its freedom in religion and its type of civil government.

To us, as their heirs, there comes the searching question, Have we inherited their spirit as well as their property and history? Does this beautiful memorial church, a noble tribute to their memory, mean as much to us as the old fort on Burial Hill meant to our fathers? Has the new faith, with its larger light and liberty, and vaster opportunities as much hold upon our consciences and hearts as the old faith had upon John Robinson and Carver and Brewster and Bradford, the noble band of adventurers who, by the providence of God, were cast upon this wilderness to dig and plant and sow seeds which were destined to make it honourable and beautiful for all time? Do we hold our religious conviction with the same fidelity and tenacity? Do we discharge our religious duties with the same commendable peremptoriness? Are we really as earnest either about what we believe or about what we do? It is of no use to say the times have changed, that the pulpit is not the force it once was, that men and women are more indolent and luxurious and indifferent to their spiritual life, that existence is more heated and nervous, that excuses for not doing the right thing are more varied and wonderfully made.

All these are simply confessions of our degeneracy—signs that the faith which the world loves to honour, because it was so brave and simple and honest, has died down within us, and something else has come to take its place, which is neither Pilgrim nor Puritan, nor anything else that we can regard with entire satisfaction.

But perhaps my sight of things as they are may be dim. It is not unlikely that my judgment may be clouded, and that men and women of to-day are better than they seem, are more loyal to the Church than to its services, are not more interested in floating ideals of church membership than in the whole-souled and genuine thing; but, while our churches have men and women who make much of their fellowship, and are as loyal to the institutions with which they are identified as the people of other days, modest, kindly people who are not always exploiting themselves, it cannot be denied that there are many upon whom religious obligations sit lightly, and who rarely, if ever, take part in public worship. We want to see a change among these. We long to have them more closely and actively identified with organised Christianity, as they themselves desire it. Surely, it is not expecting too much of them to ask that their devotions shall be as real as their pleasures, and their prayers as normal and as obligatory as their amusements. To all liberal-minded men and women this old First Church, with its splendid achievements and noble history, is not simply an institution to be nominally and listlessly venerated, magnified on special occasions, and systematically neglected. It is still a church of the living God, with ties which bind it to a sacred past, but with strong arteries pulsing with warm blood, which relate it to the present and the future. It has lasted through the vicissitudes of centuries, has weathered many a storm without being waterlogged, and in its day has seen causes rise and fall through lack of vitality, while it has held on its victorious way through one crisis after another, with its natural strength unabated. Carried lovingly in the hearts of faithful souls, who have grown grey in its service, and destined to be carried hereafter by younger hearts, which, despite all other allurements, will neither forget it nor forsake it, that which is by far the greatest thing in Pilgrim history will retain both its prestige and its power. We did not create it, and nothing that we can do or leave undone will stop its course. It is in our power to give it vitality, but it is not in our power to decree its death. If we drop the ark of the covenant, other hands stronger than ours will lift it again, and bear it on its triumphant way.

"Through silent aisles of sombre years
Our fathers' hero band appears,
In warfare with oppression tried
By patient suffering purified.

Banished beyond their Zion's gate,
Forlorn, but not disconsolate,
In lowly shrines disdained by fame,
They kindled freedom's altar flame.

And sire and son to conscience true
Battled the stormy ages through,

Till banners raised with tears and sighs
Float freely 'neath serenest skies.

And, though from Truth's exalted hill
They saw the landscape changing still,
With joy they hailed the view sublime
Grow fairer with the march of time.

O saints austere! whose pilgrim feet
In paths of danger scorned retreat,
From fields of Freedom where ye stood,
We bring our wreaths of gratitude."

THE WAY OF PEACE.

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE.

VI:

I. THIS world is one with all worlds. This hour one with all hours. This life one with all life, in all worlds and all hours. What is goodness here is goodness everywhere, in earth or in heaven!

II. God sees, hears, knows, is present and judges now as wholly and completely as ever anywhere.

III. This is the kingdom of God. The work to be done here to-day is His work: The future will be just as glorious as the present, but never imagine that God waits for far off dates to grant His blessing; the grace of His ineffable love is like air and light, free and for all.

IV. What you think failure may be victory for God!

V. Friction is as necessary to life as to mechanics; sparks fly forth from souls to illuminate the world.

VI. As every leaf is stored with sunshine, so every soul is stored with God; eternal light is within you, let it shine!

VII. Sorrows and pains are essential; their use is to be woven in, as strengthening strands in the many textured web of life.

VIII. Heavenly harmonies can be heard as well here, in this world as in any, every footfall upon the earth is a chord in the music of the spheres:

IX. The surest way to bring into your own heart more power from on high, is to give forth streams of your own power, of tenderness and sympathy and love. How can the divine tide flow in if there is no stream flowing out?

X. God might have made us like the lilies of the field, or the stars of the night, or the breath of a summer day, but He has not. It is not a good world for drones. Eden was a delusion. This is not a good world for luxury, sloth, or indifference, it is good for work, growth, and life. It is a good world for its purpose, for making men and women into active children of the ever living, ever working God.

THE world by common consent is full of what at least looks like the operations of mind. The way in which its phenomena fall into order at the bidding of our analysing and organising thought, seems to show that it stands in some definite relation to an intelligence not wholly unlike our own. It was the apparent exceptions to this for which Theism failed to account, but it is the rule itself which becomes the difficulty of Atheism. A universe in which lives and moves no higher mind than that of man is a far deeper enigma than any which religion fails to solve.—Charles Beard.

TENNYSON'S "GRAIL."

SIR,—Mr. Hardy's article in your columns, on Tennyson's "Grail," awakes a sense of gratitude to him for so penetrating and loving a treatment of his theme. It, of course, led us to re-read Dr. Stopford Brooke's lucid and luminous pages on this subject, and it made us try to "re-think" the interpretations over again, if I may be allowed this Adamsonian expression. One naturally reflects, after reading Stopford Brooke, "What can the man do that cometh after the king?" No doubt Mr. Hardy felt so too, but also felt that the artist's admiration for the artistic unity of the great poem led him to endorse what seemed an obvious spiritual or ethical contradiction in the work. Hence the startling question at the head of Mr. Hardy's article: "How can an ideal or a principle be at one and the same time morally obligatory and morally destructive?" Mr. Hardy clearly believes it cannot be, and that it is not so in the "Holy Grail" he strives to show, and offers a clue or spiritual key by which to discover that unity of interpretation, which he affirms Dr. Stopford Brooke has sacrificed under the fascination of the artistic boldness of the poet, who for the sake of mere consistency would not exclude the glorious episode of Galahad. Dr. Brooke's interpretation is based on the assumption that the poet intended to teach that "the search for the Grail is a mistake, an evil, and not a good." "Then what of Galahad?" asks Mr. Hardy. Dr. Brooke replies: "The artist was stronger than the social moralist." But the Grail and the search for it do not disappear, says Mr. Hardy, with the ethical elimination of Galahad. One thinks, he says, of Percivale and Sir Bors and Lancelot, and if we concluded that the search for it is an evil and not a good the idyll would remain a hopeless confusion. But I doubt whether this affects Dr. Brooke's position. None of these knights saw the Grail in any serviceable way whatever. For as King Arthur says:—

"Out of those to whom the vision came
My greatest hardly will believe he saw;
Another hath beheld it afar off,
And leaving human wrongs to right = themselves,
Cares but to pass into the silent life.
And one hath had the vision face to face."

Now Galahad is the only one whose successful perception of the vision and its meaning made so serviceable, as, far from leaving human wrongs to right themselves, he is made to exclaim in the passage quoted by Mr. Hardy:—

"In the strength of this I rode,
Shattering all evil customs everywhere,
And broke through all, and in the strength
of this
Come victor."

There is a consuming joy about the spirituality of Galahad, of which there is not the faintest trace in the knights Mr. Hardy refers to. They, at any rate, would only too willingly confess that in their case the search for the Grail had been a mistake, an evil and not a good. And when the King endeavours to point out where the mistake lay, it is hardly to be wondered at that Percivale should own that "he knew not all he meant." Had he been absorbed in things, had he died to live, and been buried in duties, he would have risen, he would have lost the self (which he found by other ways he could not lose), and found the radiant self whose characteristic note, as of all the sons of God, is joy and not melancholy. Do we therefore impair the unity of the interpretation? I should be inclined to say in regard to Galahad that his absorption in the desire to right the wrong had drawn him from all ordinary earthly and human ties, not because they were in any way necessarily sinful, but merely because they hindered the consuming passion of his soul to hasten the "kingdom." He is no ascetic in the ordinary sense, as Dr. Brooke clearly indicates. Now, these same ties in no way hinder the King, nor hinder him from knowing himself and God and Christ, not as a vision, but as a spiritual reality. To me, one of the most remarkable passages in the poem is the little allegory of humility. It seems to me to give a natural unity to the poem that precludes all subtle searchings after it. And it may be said in passing that Mr. Hardy occasionally wanders off along a by-path of fascinating speculation which is more exhilarating than illuminating. "What is it," for example, he asks, "to which religious faith may be blind?" And he answers, "To spiritual things made visible." And then we are led along to consider the possibilities of feeling "stigmata," "hearing voices," seeing "signs of the Cross in the heavens," seeing "the cup from which the Saviour drank," &c. Does it follow that because a spiritual thing is not a phantom therefore it must be something visible? Now, if, as in the allegory of humility, humility is said to have become the star in the East, is there any difficulty in supposing that the spiritual principle of "dying to live," of losing self to find self, should have become the Holy Grail, or should be represented by the Holy Grail? If the principle were grasped by spiritual intuition, or by doing the duty nearest to us, and not sought after as something that might be obtained by seeking, then it would manifest itself as the Holy Thing that never failed from his side, as Galahad said, nor became covered, but moved with him day and night. It is, of course, this intimate spiritual knowledge that is figured in the expression of seeing the vision. Surely the spiritual experience would be none the truer for being visualised as a Cup, nor surely should we be the surer of the spiritual truth or of its efficacy if we saw such a cup as the token of it. The passage which I have referred to as offering the obvious key to the allegories, and in which I think most people would instinctively look for it, runs as follows:—

"O son, thou hast not true humility,
The highest virtue, mother of them all;

For when the Lord of all things made
Himself
Naked of glory for His mortal change,
'Take thou my robe,' she said, 'for all is thine,'
And all her form shone forth with sudden light
So that the angels were amazed, and she Followed Him down, and like a flying star
Led on the gray-hair'd wisdom of the East;
But her thou hast not known: for what is this Thou thoughtest of thy prowess and thy sins?
Thou hast not lost thyself to save thyself
As Galahad."

I do not know that even with this clue one can confidently say of every detail of the poem that "This means that"; and as Tennyson himself seemed to discourage over-penetration, one need not mind. The artistic unity, perhaps, no one could be found to doubt, but I should doubt whether there ever could be artistic unity without a spiritual unity. And perhaps Dr. Stopford Brooke was not anxious on that account to seek more narrowly that spiritual unity. It is not surprising that the only sure method by which the principle of losing self to gain self should be referred to, and in the striking words of Galahad, for whom the Holy Grail was closely associated with "the bread which cometh down out of Heaven:"

"I saw the fiery face as of a child,
That smote itself into the bread, and went."

Mr. Hardy's article is distinctly original, and sets flowing many new currents of thought, and such a contrast as the inward vision of the king and the open vision of Galahad may repay more thinking about. But I cannot say I grasp the distinction, although there seems a distinction to be drawn, between the single-minded king and the single-minded knight. The problem was indeed, as Mr. Hardy clearly sees and states, to find the unifying principle that could explain the attitude towards life of these two without involving a moral or spiritual contradiction. It seems possible to evolve such seemingly diverse lines of conduct from the same source. The curious and unique description of Sir Galahad has led me to think sometimes that perhaps by the "spiritual city" (where it is said he will be crowned King—"far in the spiritual city")—is meant the coming Kingdom of Heaven on earth, and by Sir Galahad himself Christianity victorious. There seems some justification for this interpretation, when one reflects on the confined range of the operations of the King and the limitless operations of Sir Galahad.

"In the strength of this I rode,
Shattering all evil customs everywhere,
And passed through Pagan realms and
made them mine,
And dashed through Pagan hordes, and
bore them down,
And broke through all, and in the strength of this
Come victor."

But allegory is sometimes like the precious stone a friend showed me not long ago. He said in a certain light and at a certain angle you will see a strange bright colour in the stone. A gleam of bluish purple rewarded a diligent search. If someone told me he had seen also a blood-red gleam I should not doubt it.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE & OTHERS.

SIR,—The question opened up by Mr. Jones is much wider than any difference about persons, and impels me to take part in what must be to everyone a very disagreeable discussion. Mr. Jones seems to think that letters like that of Mr. Charlesworth, criticising the work and preaching of a deeply revered liberal minister, ought to be welcomed and even encouraged by THE INQUIRER.

"It is difficult to imagine a letter more pertinent."

Pertinent to what? Who will benefit by it? What good will it do? A man does not stick pins into somebody else like a mischievous boy unless there is some serious and important end to be gained. Will this kind of letter alter the action of the Committee or the character of the man criticised? Everyone knows that this is not the way to bring about any change. You may inflict personal pain, you may reveal your own likings or dislikings, but you don't do good to any cause or person. There are few appointments made to a college which someone—if he had the courage—would not like to criticise. Mr. Charlesworth has plenty of courage, but I fail to see any reason why THE INQUIRER should give him the opportunity of showing it.

In College matters involving personalities, surely the Trustees' meeting is the right place for their discussion, or if the objector is not a Trustee, then a letter from him and others who agree with him to the Committee would have more force and be in better taste than an attempt to raise a discussion about a great religious teacher in THE INQUIRER. When such attempts have been made and failed, and when the matter is thought to be of grave importance, I can imagine a letter to the papers may be the last resort. But it ought to be the last resort, and from a man who, through long experience and ability and close contact with the College, is qualified to take the lead in a definite movement against the action condemned. Otherwise, it seems to me, such letters, as Mr. Fripp says, are impertinent, and entirely out of place in the columns of THE INQUIRER.

Mr. Jones seems to give—although, no doubt, unconsciously—a wholesale invitation to anyone to air his personal opinions about the abilities of every new lecturer in our colleges. This would doubtless make THE INQUIRER more spicy, but is hardly in accord with its best traditions or its character.

POSTAL MISSION WORK IN DENMARK.

SIR,—Some time ago the Central Postal Mission received a communication from Mr. Theo. Berg, of Copenhagen, about the progress of Postal Mission work in Denmark, which will, no doubt, interest many of your readers. Mr. Theo. Berg writes:—"During 1905 we advertised 10 times in 18 papers, and had 199 applications for books. About 20 per cent, asked again for books, and a few have joined as members of 'Det fri Kirkesamfund.' 'Det fri Kirkesamfund,' at its last general meeting, resolved to take over the Postal Mission as a branch of its work, and as such to assist its committee in every way. So when Pastor Birkedal a short time ago issued a collection of sermons for every Sunday in the year, 'Det fri Kirkesamfund' bought a hundred of these, which it placed at the disposal of the Postal Mission Committee, for which gift we are very thankful. It will be a great help to us in our work, as we have not too many Unitarian books in the Danish language. This year we have begun to form a lending library; we have already about fifty books which we hope will do good service."

We also learn from the same source that the sister of Miss Westenholz, Mrs. Sass, has undertaken much of the correspondence arising out of the advertisements, and with excellent results. This good news brings back to mind the visits to Denmark of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the earlier stages of this pioneer movement, and how near it was to his heart. I am certain that all English Postal Mission workers will rejoice to hear of the good progress in Denmark, and wish their Danish fellow workers every success.

FLORENCE HILL,

Hon. Sec. Central Postal Mission.

MOTHER BICKERDYKE AS I KNEW HER.

BY MRS. FLORENCE S. KELLOG, OF FAY, KANSAS.

(From the Chicago "Unity.")

I HAD known Mother Bickerdyke by report for many years, my first definite knowledge of her being gained from two sketches that told of her life and her work in the army, published in Arthur's Home Magazine, in 1879, I think it was. Being only a little girl away back among the hills of Chautauqua County, New York, during the war, I had known nothing of her then. Later, after coming to Kansas to live, I had gazed with reverent admiration at her as she sat upon the platform among the "a good and great"—with none better or greater than she was—at soldiers' reunions and at Decoration Day exercises. I had worshipped at her shrine from afar for years, but it was not until New Year's day 1891 that I met her face to face, and felt the clasp of her honest hand. She was living then with her son at Russell, our county seat. I had gone in from the ranch to spend a few days there with a friend. The two homes were near together and my friend was a close friend of Mother Bickerdyke's. It was a warm, beautiful morning and I, with a light shawl thrown over my head, was out in the yard enjoying the sunshine and the balmy air. My friend, coming to the door, and seeing me there, called out, "Why don't you run over and say 'Happy New Year' to Mother Bickerdyke."

"Just as I am?" I asked, woman-like, thinking first of my unceremonious dress. "Oh yes; she will like you better so than she would if you were more formal," was the reply, and a moment later I was knocking at the door at which no one ever knocked in vain. It was opened by the dear old mother herself, who, upon mention of my name, graciously told me she had often heard of me through our many mutual friends. With my hand still held in hers she drew me through the hall and into her plainly furnished, but cosy and home-like sitting room, and soon we were visiting as earnest women ever do visit one with the other. I noticed then, as at each subsequent meeting with her, how instantly I felt at ease in her presence; there was a certain graciousness and kindness of manner in all she said and did that forbade any embarrassing thought of difference in age, rank or condition. Though my heart and mind were full with the memory of all she was—of the work she had done and was still doing—and I felt a great reverence for her, she would not then or ever allow it to hinder the free interchange of thought and speech. It was the woman—the mother—who met me, not the noted public worker—and the woman within me responded easily, naturally, to her touch. The mention of my two noble brothers, who fell upon the battlefields of Virginia, was a further "open sesame" to her heart, and when, at parting, she kissed me even as a mother might, I felt it was of them she thought—for them it was given, for her love for the soldier boys was almost greater than the love of a mother for her child. Always after, at meeting and at parting she kissed me. Whether she did this generally with others I do not know. I only know this tenderness never failed me, and the memory of it is a blessing to me now—a sacrament that helps to keep my "lips from speaking guile" and consecrates them to truth and purity.

It was a happy hour I spent with her then. Though many visits came afterwards none were ever quite like this. It was one of the "blessed first times," of which Holland used to tell us, never to be quite duplicated. What did we talk about? you ask. What did we not talk about! Of life and love, of home and war, of the work she had done—of which she spoke unreservedly when once the subject was introduced, but she did not introduce it, and spoke of it always as if any woman could have done the same if so minded, and under like circumstances. I had heard that she was writing her life story and asked about it. "Bless you! no! I'm not writing it at all. There's been plenty written about me now. I have no time to write a book, and, if I had, I shouldn't do it. I've too good an opinion of human nature to believe folks want to waste time reading what I could write," and she laughed in that hearty way that brought always an answering laugh from the one hearing it. "What I have done," she continued, "I have done. It doesn't need to be written up. My boys (as she always called the soldiers) know what I have done, and that's enough."

But it is not "enough." All the world should know of her brave, untiring work, of her self-sacrifice so complete as to be almost self-effacement; of the long, weary marches she followed, and how like a good angel she appeared in camp and hospital and upon the field of battle; an angel of mercy to the suffering, but an angel of accusation and of wrath to those who would in any way impose upon her charges or hinder her with too much official red tape. This red tape she cut with determined hand, and went resolutely on with her work of giving comfort to the sick and bringing order and thrift where before had been disorder and, as she styled it, "dilly-dallying" with which she had no patience. She was a law unto herself "with a commission from God," as she said with reverence. Though never lacking in womanly tenderness where tenderness would avail she had a resolution and a determination that would not brook defeat—to her there was no such word as fail—no looking weakly back when once she had set her hand to the plough and made up her mind a given thing should be done.

That the soldiers felt her tenderness is proved by the name.—Mother—they gave her. Indeed she was Mother Bickerdyke to us all—to soldier and civilian, to men, women and children alike. She prized this dear name as she did no other. It was the brightest gem in her crown of womanhood.

With her at the time of my first call was an unfortunate feeble-minded little daughter of an old soldier who lived some twenty or more miles out in the country. There Mother Bickerdyke had found her, and bringing her to her own home was busily at work with preparations to send her to a school for such as she was. She introduced the child to me as "Our Flora," telling me at the same time, "She is a good little girl, and very fond of music. She has some strong points. I think, under the right conditions, she will grow to be a strong, good woman, and I am going to put her where she will have a chance." That was ever her way—to help each one to be placed "under right conditions," and "to have a chance." All she did was done in a spirit of good will and helpfulness, "I do not work for money," she told me. The thought that anything she did, any story told of her, should be coined into money was repulsive to her—this dear old mother who ever seemed "Lifted by something over life

To power and service."

David Starr Jordan tells us, "It is for us to express love in terms of human helpfulness," and none, it seems to me, ever did this more fully, more truly, than did Mother Bickerdyke. She had a sure instinct for want and suffering that led unerringly wherever there was need of woman's love and ministry. Others might stand back in fear, might shrink from scenes of want, carnage and suffering, but not she. She only went forward with open, ready hands, and strong, true heart. We used to wonder how it was that she knew of the need that was so far from her. How did she hear of cases of sickness and of want of which those nearer to the scene than she knew little or nothing? Did she wear spectacles of the "Sitbottom" kind that revealed the real needs of all around her whether near or far? Sometimes it did indeed seem so, for nothing seemed to escape her; no case of need or of suffering seemed too far away for her to reach, and reaching, help. In very truth she "Lived in a house by the side of the road," and was a true "friend to man" always.

Away out on the prairies some twenty-five miles from her home in Russell, an old soldier was slowly dying from cancer and there we found the good mother, caring for him, dressing the loathsome sore with her own hands, and, in every way possible to her making smoother his pathway to rest. Back and forth on the long ride she went, nor failed in her work until the soldier was "mustered out" of earthly service. It was when returning from one of these trips she stopped at our home. Her eyes grew tender as she looked out over the peaceful river valley, set in its strong frame of hills. "It is so like the old Ball farm back in Ohio where I grew up," she said, and then she added with a sigh, for she was weary, weary, "if I could only stay here for days and rest how glad I would be." We urged her to do so, but no, "I have so much to do—so many to look after, I cannot stop," she said, and she soon went her way again.

Still farther from her home was another old soldier—one who had been a very brave scout during the war, but ere its close was stricken with a sickness that never left him, though he lived until very recently. His disease was of such a nature that he lost nearly all control of his motions, and though a temperance man, he was often suspected of drunkenness, where he was not known, as he had every appearance of one under the influence of liquor. Toward the later part of his life he lost his mind and would often wander away from his miserable home and be gone for days at a time. His family, strangely enough, cared little what became of him, and gave little heed to his coming or going. Consequently they were objects of much "righteous indignation" on Mother Bickerdyke's part. A friend of mine who lived close by her in Russell, tells me that at one time some one of this poor man's family came to Mother Bickerdyke and told her he had wandered away and had not been seen for days. Full of wrath for such neglect she "stayed not on the order of her going," but had the old black horse hitched to the buggy, and accompanied by her son, went at once in search of the old soldier. After a long, weary time they found him lying in some tall grass too sick and weak to move. They got him in the buggy and, supporting him in her strong arms, they drove back to Russell, where by due process of law he was declared insane and sent to the asylum at Topeka. Mother Bickerdyke was appointed his guardian and used often to go down to see him. On one of her visits she discovered that he sat the most of the time in a hard-bottomed chair, and as soon as she got home she went to work, and though her hands were so badly crippled it was only with great effort that she could sew, she made a patchwork cushion for him to sit on and sent it on to him. Some one from Russell who visited the asylum soon after the cushion was sent, was commissioned to see if "Comrade C——" was sitting on it. The report came back that he was not—did not have it in fact. The friend who tells me of this incident says: "The letter she dictated and I wrote back to the superintendent of the asylum was enough to make him quake," but, not content with writing she went immediately to Topeka herself (a distance of two hundred miles) and we who knew her could imagine the scene when she confronted the delinquent official. All this that Comrade C—— might have a cushion to his chair, for needless to say, he had it after that as long as he lived.

GATEWAYS TO THE SOUL:

III.—HEARING.

ALL great Scriptures witness to the analogy presented by objects of sense to cosmic facts, at least in the matter of sound. Creative energy operates as a voice. God creates the world as man thinketh. His thought expresses itself in the matter of the universe, builds itself into forms, becomes a creative word: Hence the Greeks had but one word for thought and speech (logos). In Hebrew mode, "God said, Let there be light!"

In his lectures on "Ideas of Revelation," Professor Carpenter tabulates some of these conceptions. Not only are the arts and sciences and the civilisations of men the outcome of divine speech, but the world-process is connected with some Bathkol (voice-maid), Vac (speech), or Nebo (who is ilu tasmitu, "the god who makes to hear"). God in activity is a speaking God, a God of song, and the ideal significance of music depends upon it being an echo of heavenly harmony, of the "music of the spheres." From the "hi ki" to Wordsworth's Ode to Duty, wherein he calls her "stern daughter of the Voice of God," who preserves the stars from wrong, human thought has testified to the close connection between the Word and orderly form; between Sound and Creation:

Science the Handmaid of Poetry.

That the connection is not merely fanciful may be shown by interesting experiments. Sound is the effect of vibration in the particles of a physical medium, communicating itself to the sensorium of the hearer. To give visual shape to these effects we have but to strew dust or sand on glass and metal plates, and draw a violin bow across their edges. The vibration of the plates sets these particles of dust dancing, and makes them fall into regular shapes. Another experiment is to take a vessel covered with an indiarubber disc, and sing through a tube inserted into the side of the vessel. The disc vibrates in harmony with the waves of sound, and light dust thrown upon it will fall into pretty shapes that vary with the note sung: The same note always produces the same figure, proving the causal connection between Sound and Form. By using liquids the surface becomes corrugated with wavelets breaking into beautiful patterns. As the medium is changed forms imitating frost-ferns, shells, flowers are obtained.

These experiments suggest that there may be more than fancy in the old parables that tell how God spake and the world came into being, how ministering spirits sing continually before the throne; or even in ancient legends, to wit, how Orpheus built the walls of Troy through playing his lyre; or in the claims of Pythagoras that the three great factors of creation are Sound, Light, and Number

The Medium of Sound:

The poet may aver that "heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard are sweeter," but unless they travel through a coarse material medium, such as the air, or wood, or metal, or rock, or water, they will, for all their sweetness, remain unheard. We find also that the rate of sound-vibrations depends on the nature of the medium. Through the air sound travels slowly at the rate of about 1,086 feet per second. Through water four times as fast. Through iron fourteen times as fast. In experiments made on the Alps, the sound of a tap was heard coming through the rock long before it came through the air. These results demonstrate that the true medium of sound is neither wood, iron, nor air but something that they possess in common, which really impedes its action, though we are normally made aware of it only through that impediment. To that medium the name of "sonoriferous ether" has been given. So, in examining the commonest phenomenon we are thrown back into a darker mystery, and the most familiar experience is rounded with a hidden wonder and a meaning deep concealed.

Wanted—An Etheric Ear:

We have only one etheric organ—the eye; if we had an etheric hearing organ it would be as easy to hear a sound uttered at New York in London, as seeing the sun in eight and a half minutes. Scientific invention has made that indirectly possible. In the earliest invented telephone it was only possible to convey sound, not articulate speech. But the electric telephone was discovered. An etheric (otherwise electric) impetus was given to sound, which reduced material resistance to a minimum, so that you may speak in London to your friend in New York. Abnormal hearing, as found in the sensitive who hears voices from great distances, may be due perhaps, not to finer sensitiveness, but to the opening of an etheric organ of sound.

By means of the electric telephone we are enabled dimly to realise that most of the harmony of the world is lost for lack of a vehicle sufficiently swift to convey it ere it dies away. Vibration in the physical medium of air being unable to keep up with that of the sonoriferous ether, and wearying except within a very small range. Huxley used to say that if we had a much keener hearing we should, upon putting our ear to the bark of a tree hear the shutting and closing of tori in the doors between cell and cell, and the swish and cataract-fall of the moving sap. With his inner ear Emerson perceived infinitely more.

"Let me go where'er I will,
I hear a sky-born music still;
It is not only in the rose,
It is not only in the bird,
Not only where the rainbow glows,
Nor in the song of woman heard;
But in the darkest, meanest things,
There always, always something sings."

Carlyle has a similar thought: "All inmost things we may say, are melodious: naturally utter themselves in song. See deep enough, and you see musically: the heart of nature being everywhere music, if we can only reach it."

Our Tone-Gauge:

In the human organ of hearing is an instrument of three thousand chords to answer to the vibrations of sound. They are in the shape of arches (the arches of Corti), and it was an idea of Professor Helmholtz that each of them is tuned to a particular note, the narrow arches answering to treble sounds, the larger to the bass. We may therefore suppose that in a non-musical ear the majority of these arches are undifferentiated, inflexible. Whether we should go so far as Lorenzo and say that the physical implies an ethical defect, is questionable.

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils.
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus;
Let no such man be trusted."

But Lorenzo places the root of harmony in immortal souls not in the arches of Corti, and the fact that Tennyson, Wordsworth, M. Arnold were insensible to music of tabor and pipe, yet were sensitive to musical thought, shows that music consists not in a tintinnabular play on the tympanum, but in a process of mind. It is essentially the art of the Muses, who preside over the principles of harmonious operation upon which the universe is built. Without soul for the soul of harmony, we are, according to Wordsworth, "out of tune"; if we have no heart for Nature, if sea and flowers and stars move us not, we are not musical.

Being in Tune

A well-known fact in acoustics serves to explain the principle: "To the pure all things are pure." If in a room containing a piano, the voice or a violin sound a note, say, B flat, the string in the piano corresponding to that note will vibrate and resound, while it will remain mute to all other notes: So will the heart of man respond to kindness, and purity, and truth, and love, if it have chords corresponding to these, but remain irresponsive to the appeals of wickedness and vice. We all respond to the vibrations that fit our group of strings; to the sweet and gracious, the beautiful and loving, if we have these qualities in ourselves. We are bewrayed by the response we give to the inspirations or the seductions of the world.

Music as a Purifier.

According to a Chinese scripture, it is the sage alone really knows music; the rest only care for modulations. The Hindus for centuries have studied the effects of harmonies, and Max Muller has left personal testimony of the healing effects upon himself of the chanting of powerful mantras by Hindu priests on behalf of "the friend of India." Religious ministers in the West may be pardoned the desire to develop the music of our churches to such a pitch of efficacy, that it may prove not only a healing and consoling agency, but a purifying and chastening influence; music that shall awake the holiest longings lying locked in the breasts of wearied worshippers, and give wings to anxious broodings—

"When the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day
Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away."

Music has been successfully employed among methods of healing the discord involved in madness, and a future age may perchance, in other cases of illness, send for the maker of melody instead of the doctor, and ask that instead of prescribing drugs, he shall discourse

"Music that gentlier on the spirit lies,
Than tir'd eyelids upon tir'd eyes."

Providence and Laws of Sound.

A certain benign purpose may be detected in the phenomena of sound. We may be sure that if there is benevolent control of the universe, it will manifest in common processes rather than in supposed violations of law, such as staying the sun to prolong a massacre, or curbing the waves to further a flight of slaves.

We need no deeper instance of the miraculous than the exceptional behaviour of water in the matter of the law of expansion, by which substances expand when heated. Upon this peculiarity depends the inhabitability of the earth. No fortuitous concurrence of atoms could arrange that water should contract upon being heated from zero to 4 degrees. Yet without this universal miracle, life would be unbearable for man.

Sound offers another common instance of apparent benevolent design. The velocity of sound depends upon the kind of medium through which it travels. The warmer the medium, the more rapid the velocity. But it is remarkable that the velocity of sound is independent of the loudness of sound and of its pitch. Upon this rests our enjoyment of choral and orchestral music. Without it a chorus would become a mass of frightful discords. If the loud notes travelled quicker than the soft, if the high notes were heard sooner than the low, melody and harmony would become impossible. It is in these commonplaces that the operation of the Good Law is to be traced, and all natural processes will stand the minutest scrutiny from the keenest sceptic. Believe me, the closer you look into familiar phenomena, the larger and deeper will grow your sense of wonder, and He whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain is still seen to be God in the clouds, in the clod. The day's doings in air and earth and sea will bear the fullest examination; you may sift and dissect, probe and peer; telescope and microscope; spectroscope and stethoscope these doings; and the deeper you go the more open-eyed will grow your marvel—until you walk the earth, arrested and amazed, a denizen in Wonderland, a dreamer of unutterable dreams, who has awakened to find reality far transcending his sublimest vision.

J. TYSSUL-DAVIS.

In our spiritual life we never can stand still. Our characters are either being injured by the conversion of our faults into customs, or ennobled by the increased influence given to every consideration of duty and love, by constancy of obedience to their commands.—H. W. Crosskey.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The Rev. R. G. Fillingham, M.A., Vicar of Hexton (at present under sentence of suspension) conducted services in the hall of the new Church, on Sunday, the 9th inst. His sermons evoked a lively interest, and their critical force, sincere persuasiveness, and enthusiasm for spiritual religion were keenly appreciated. The day was one of the September holidays, and the city was much depleted of people, but the hall was well filled at both services.

Glossop (Appointment).—The Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, of Rawtenstall, has accepted an invitation from the members of the Glossop Unitarian Church, to become their minister. Mr. Thomas hopes to commence his new pastorate on the third Sunday in November.

Harvest Services.—We have reports of successful Harvest Thanksgiving services from Great Yarmouth, Halstead and Walsley.

Manchester: Broughton.—The Rev. Henry Dawtre, B.A., commenced his ministry on Sunday last. Two excellent services were held, and Mr. Dawtre spoke of his hopes for the future of the church. The attendance was particularly good, both morning and evening. A welcoming soiree will be held on Wednesday next, the 19th inst.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—At the close of morning service, Sunday last, a memorial tablet was unveiled by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. The tablet is of brass and of handsome design, and is inscribed as follows:—"In loving memory of James and Anne Allison, who for many years were faithful workers in this chapel and school, this tablet is placed by members of the congregation and teachers of the Sunday-school. James Allison died December 28, 1903; Anne Allison died January 29, 1905." At 3.30, in the school-room, an enlarged photograph of the late Edward Oldfield was presented to the school by Mr. Ernest Hardy and Leonard Short, on behalf of the subscribers, in memory of another faithful worker in chapel and school. Mr. Oldfield died December 12, 1905. The photograph was received on behalf of the school by the president (the Rev. A. H. Dolphin), who conducted a memorial service and gave an address.

Southend-on-Sea.—Principal Gordon, of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, was the preacher last Sunday, and there was an excellent congregation.

Stourbridge.—The 754th monthly meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring counties was held at Stourbridge on Tuesday, September 4, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. George St. Clair, F.G.S., on "The Faithful Use of Divine Gifts." The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Cullompton. At the business meeting votes of sympathy were passed with the Revs. Joseph Wood and G. L. Phelps, in the very sad loss they have sustained. Later in the day a telegram of sympathy was also sent to Rev. James A. Shaw, of Wolverhampton, who, owing to a very serious illness, had been prevented from being present. At the close of the meeting the members adjourned to "The Hill," where they were entertained to luncheon by Mr. and Mrs. Worthington.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., is to preach at a special week evening service in the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, Kentish Town, on Friday, the 28th inst. The service is at 8 o'clock.

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties is to be held at Lewes on Thursday, Oct. 4, and particulars will be found advertised in another column. We understand that the secretary has obtained a reduction in the railway fare, and will have further particulars to communicate next week. Both the meetings and the place of meeting promise great interest, and we hope for a large attendance of members and friends. The last time the Assembly met at Lewes was in 1890, the second year of its existence, when the late Dr. Sadler was President, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter.

THE new Unitarian Church at Aberdeen, which is to be opened to-morrow (Sunday) by Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, has a fine situation in Skene-street, not far from the Public Library. It commands the vista looking northwards towards the Rosemount Viaduct, from which it will be prominently seen: The building, which has a frontage of 65 ft. and a depth of about 72 ft., is in Italian renaissance style, which was judged to be best suited to the situation, and is, of course, of granite. The great central gable is flanked by two Italian towers, at the base of which are the arched entrances. These lead into spacious vestibules, from which a few steps lead down to the hall below the church, which is itself above the level of the street. The church, with a small end gallery, has a total seating accommodation of about 460. The minister will speak from a platform standing in an arched alcove, above which is a five-light window. The acoustic properties of the building are said to be admirable, and the floors and staircases throughout are of fire-proof material. The total cost, including the site, is set down as about £6,500. For the old church £2,000 was received, and many generous donations have been received, including some from citizens of Aberdeen unconnected with the church, in recognition of the Rev. Alexander Webster's public services; but there is still a considerable sum to be raised to clear the cost.

A "HOUSE - WARMING;" as we announced last week will be held in the new building this (Saturday) evening, and following on to-morrow's opening services, Dr. Carpenter will lecture on Monday evening on "The First Three Gospels and how to read them." On Sunday, Sept. 30, the special preacher will be the Rev. John Glaspe, D.D., of the Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, and on Wednesday evening, Oct. 3, the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow.

THE Unitarian Van reached the high water mark of success in its mission on Sunday evening at Todmorden. In the previous week it had been at Sowerby Bridge and Hebden Bridge, the Rev. C. D. Badland having come from Kidderminster to take part in the work. Friends from Halifax and Bradford also brought effective help. At Todmorden Mr. Badland took the chair at an evening meeting in the Market Place, and the chief address was given by the Rev. A. W. Fox to some 1,500 people. For the closing hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," it was estimated that 2,000 were present. A policeman remarked that it was the biggest meeting he had seen in Todmorden Market Place during the two years that he had been stationed in the town.

MR. V. R. SHINDE, in a letter of greeting to the President of the Central Postal Mission, reports the good progress of the work in India, and the devoted help he receives in it from a young Mahomedan convert and member of the Brahme Samaj, who now acts as his assistant. A large number of tracts have been received from the A.U.A. as well as from our own Association.

THE London Missionary Society is sending out a deputation to visit its mission stations in India under circumstances which possess an interest considerably broader than its purely professional object. The importance of India as a mission field will be readily grasped from the fact, that no less than 104 out of the society's 277 Missionaries, are at work in this immense dependency of the British Crown. Nearly two-fifths of the L.M.S. force is concentrated on, or should we say lost among its teeming races. A sufficient reason for the despatch of the present party of visitors, consisting of the Rev. Wardlaw Thomson, the Foreign Secretary, Rev. W. Bacon, and Mr. A. W. Whitley, a brother of Mr. H. Whitley, M.P., might be found in the lapse of twenty-three years since the last deputation. But in fact, the present is regarded as marking a crisis in the affairs of the Mission. Such questions have to be considered as whether it is possible to establish the native Christians in self-sustaining and self-directing religious societies. If this is impossible, the work done is obviously incomplete and insecure. Till then Christianity cannot be regarded as having anything but an exotic existence. And this question depends on another. There is a difference of opinion between the directors in England and the English missionaries in India. The former wish the native teachers to be regarded as "brethren in Christian service on an equality with the brethren sent from home." The English missionaries will not concede this equality. Hence the crisis which is virtually creating a new caste in the Christian churches in the land of caste.

THIS is a serious position in missionary politics, and it throws much light on the unsatisfactory nature of the relations generally existing between the men of the dominant and those of the subject races. It is exactly the difficulty of the Civil Service over again. Among our officers in India are many men who do splendid and conscientious work; but almost without exception the Englishman looks down on the Indian, the Indian repays this with equal contempt or with hatred. The Englishman thinks he must be superior, the Indian is too hastily dismissed because he is different. We regret to find Anglo-Indianism so strong in the minds of missionaries as a substitute for their Christianity. There has just been a painfully interesting correspondence in the Times on the economic effects of our rule in India, but in some respects this spiritual estrangement is a still more serious mischief: Whether it is possible to remove it we do not venture to say, but the incident does serve to drive home the conviction that while we continue to govern India the people of this country ought to treat their responsibility with a less cavalier indifference.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

FOR A TWENTIETH CENTURY DISCIPLE:

VII.

I: God is love!

II: If God were not love there would be no pity in the heart of man, no tenderness of motherhood, no compassion in the strong, no mercy in the powerful, for in the likeness of His creator man is made.

III: For many ages the world dare not trust "The Father," dare not accept His love: Now we know in whom we believe. A new spiritual existence begins with the knowledge, our outlook upon all the universe changes, history assumes a new meaning, our intercourse with each other becomes a fellowship divine.

IV: Thou art to be like the Father, therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him.

V. No conduct is fit for you as a child of God but loving conduct; none, anywhere!

VI. Love restoreth our souls! Like the breath of the morning, like the sun after rain, it gives us strength when we look up, it makes us glad to be alive!

VII: There is only one victory really worth the winning, the triumph of that which is highest in our own lives, the victory of the divine!

VIII. While a man hates his brother, God Himself cannot make him happy.

IX. The coming of the Holy Spirit is like the coming of the sap to the growing plant. All you want you can have! Even now the wind blows, and the flame of fire is gleaming upon your brow, the inspiration of Pentecost is yours!

X. True happiness, true peace, is in being, in living. How is the Almighty spirit to help you if you come to a stand-still? Take the next breath, keep alive! This holds in every conceivable crisis, even what seems to you irretrievable loss, is only preparation for yet further and further blessing!

HOWEVER much is wrong in the world, it is enough for us if all things are in the course of being set right. That is Christian optimism.—Henry Jones.

WHEN, by means of the writings or conversations of Christians of various denominations, you look into their hearts and discern the deep workings, and conflicts, and aspirations of piety, can you help seeing in them tokens of the presence and operations of God's Spirit more authentic and touching than in all the harmonies and beneficent influences of the outward universe? Who can shut up this Spirit in any place or any sect? Who will not rejoice to witness it in its fruits of justice, goodness, purity, and piety, wherever they meet the eye? Who will not hail it as the infallible sign of the accepted worshipper of God?—Channing.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XLVI.

THERE are other sanctions, says Mr. Birrell, besides the religious, and he gives, as an example, the code of honour which makes cheating at cards a hateful offence, even to careless men of the world. That there are such sanctions, hardly needs saying; it is of their worth that we need to be convinced; and in this instance, if I am not mistaken, the moral value is somewhat over-rated.

A distinction may be drawn between honour and a code of honour—between the honour which is self-respect, and the honour which is little more than respect for the respect of others. Honour may be a native nobleness of mind, a law in itself, or it may be an acceptance, more or less high-minded, of rule and regulation from without. It is with the latter that we are concerned, for the excellent virtue of not cheating at cards is entirely due, we are assured, to a code of honour punctiliously obeyed. A code of honour, I take it, is the unwritten rule of any association for mutual trust by which we are willing to be bound. This rule we may scrupulously observe, and take a pride in observing, but its ethical worth is open to question on several grounds.

First, the sanction is a sanction of convention, and is not necessarily connected with moral consideration. A member of a society is a man of honour in a sense determined for him by that society—a sense that may be determined without reference to abstract right and wrong. Under the law of duelling, no moral choice of alternatives is allowed. The same thing may be said of the vendetta, and of vows and compacts made in secret societies. Thus we reach, at last, the absurd contradiction of "honour among thieves"; though, indeed, it is no absurdity to them, for they trust each other and stand by each other, and are as punctilious in obedience to their code as if they were gentlemen who do not cheat at cards. In all these cases the conscience is a corporate conscience, and the end in view is not to defend the members from evil, but to protect the body to which they belong from harm. It is a finer form of the instinct whereby lupus non mordet lupum. Even the fine maxim Noblesse oblige will hardly stand a moral test, for action is not noble if it is chosen simply because it becomes good birth.

In the second place, the acceptance of a code of honour is both optional and terminable. I abide by the terms of association as long as it pleases me to do so, and the obligation is very often one from which I can be released without discredit. A German student at an English university would find it advisable to part with some of his notions of what student honour demands. But a moral law is not a law into which, and out of which, I can contract myself. Those whom it binds it binds always, and binds fast.

A third objection is this, that duty, as defined by honour, is generally strained and one-sided. Some points are unduly exalted, others are ignored; particular circumstances are made of more account than general principles; broad responsibilities are narrowed down to the requirements of special functions. Ulysses in the Odyssey, as Ruskin has observed, is rallied by Pallas, not for cheating, but for cheating his best friend, and in his own land. Honour of this kind shrinks into loyalty—loyalty to an order, a party, a class, a profession—and large conceptions of duty are measured by a minute and artificial scale. Offences are scheduled, and that which is not in the schedule is not an offence. The result is a kind of limited liability. Codes of honour are for public life, and have little effect upon private action outside their scope. A soldier's honour is his honour as a soldier; commercial honour keeps the man of business very strictly to his engagements, but is supposed to be left unblemished by the tricks and frauds of uncovenanted trade. So, too, the honour of the card-table checks cheating at cards, but suffers the player to run the risk of cheating other creditors by risking more than he can afford to lose.

Some are for teaching honour in schools, under the head of Moral Instruction. Let us hope that the teacher will avoid all reference to codes. Let us hope also that in time he will have the wisdom to show that the only valid, universal, and enduring sanction is that of the love which worketh no ill to his neighbour, and the courage to admit that this sanction is something more than moral.

A NOVITIATE.

Too great the great things are for my weak thought;

I must be humble to be truly taught

The mystery of man's upbuilt life:

Brief meadow-blossoms, faint and dewy—wet,

Mosses and buds, shall be my alphabet,

Whereby to spell out love, and cosmic strife:

Nature, that looms so large on timorous eyes,

Cares nothing for the majesty of size,

But spends her diligence on smallest things—

The curving of a flower, the iris spray

Of weir and tide, the glow-worm's lambent ray,

And gauzy meshes of a gadfly's wings;

Almost in spite of her, it seems, the mounds

Rise into hills, and oceans spread their bounds;

Her thought shapes not so much the coral-reef,

As the frail life that dies to build it up.

Glowing she pores upon the buttercup,

And tints the fabric of a wild-rose leaf:

This, then, shall my chief care and comfort be,

To dwell with beauty in simplicity,

Rather than power that terrifies and stuns

The faltering soul: so shall I bear at last

To hear of star-worlds strewn along the past,

And the fierce radiance of God's million suns.

SOCIAL REFORMERS.

IV.—JOHN RUSKIN.

"In art," said the Edinburgh Review, "Mr. Ruskin is often right; in political economy he is always wrong." The saying, though a foolish one, is (may one who reveres him say so?) not wholly inappropriate, for it criticises in his own manner a writer who freely criticised men and institutions, and set them down without hesitation in the categories of good and bad. The saying, more usefully, is indicative of the attitude of many readers of Ruskin. They like his art materials, his picture criticism, his nature sketches, and his romance of history; and so long as his dogmatism is confined to aesthetics they let him amuse them where he does not convince. But when he comes to practical matters, the hire of servants, the profits of speculation, and the enjoyment of luxury, they take him either for a fool or else for a most mischievous person. On the whole, in spite of the fact that he really seems at times to have liked to play in sheer sport with the victims of his criticism, he is really better worth taking in earnest, even if one must accept him as an enemy to sound principles.

Certainly, no socialistic writer of his generation wrote more fiercely of social ills than Ruskin did. You must go to his well-loved Bible to find his models and inspirers. "The guilty Thieves of Europe," he declares, "the real sources of all deadly war in it, are the Capitalists—that is to say, people who live by per centages or the labour of others, instead of by fair wages of their own." All civilised countries he views as "corrupted," by landlords, soldiers, lawyers, priests, merchants, and usurers. "Pay every man for his work," he cries, "pay nobody but for his work, and see that the work be sound." There is much beneficent mischief in the writings of such a man, especially when his writings are of that high quality that they cannot be neglected, but rather gain in attractive charm as we recede from the personalities and temporary incidents that gave rise to them. What a treasury of noble thoughts, nobly uttered, he has left us! Think of his great works: "Modern Painters," "Seven Lamps of Architecture," and "The Stones of Venice"; then listen to this: "A 'civilized nation' in modern Europe consists, in broad terms, of (a) a mass of half-taught, discontented, and mostly penniless populace, calling itself the people; of (b) a thing which it calls the Government—meaning an apparatus for collecting and spending money; and (c) a small number of capitalists, many of them rogues, and most of them stupid persons, who have no idea of any object of human existence other than money-making, gambling, or champagne bibbing." Is this mere extravagance? At least it is not the froth of envious poverty. And his whip is not for the back of the capitalist only. He tells the working man: "It has been shown by Professor Kirk, that out of the hundred and fifty-six millions of pounds which you prove your prosperity by spending on beer and tobacco, you pay a hundred millions to the rich middlemen, and thirty millions to the middling middlemen, and for every two shillings you pay, get threepence-halfpennyworth of beer to swallow. . . . You helpless sots and simpletons! Can't you at least manage to set your wives—what you have got of them—to brew your beer, and give you an honest pint of it for your money? Let them have the half-pence first, anyhow, if they must have the kicks afterwards."

Well, that is, doubtless, sufficient as illustrating the "divine rage" which his friend and mentor, Carlyle, observed in him. Something more is needed to justify George Eliot's assertion that Ruskin "teaches with the inspiration of a Hebrew prophet." For it is always the final test of inspiration that that utterance only is inspired that inspires the hearers; and proofs of such inspiration are in Ruskin's case, happily, not difficult to discover. Witness the organisations and groups that in his life-time drew together under his influence, the social and industrial experiments (whether successful or not) that were made under "the Master's" direction. Witness also the groups and societies that still persist, and the wide-spread traces of discipleship in homes of decorous simplicity, and in lives innumerable touched to finer issues. And yet again, witness the ever-deepening currents in the educational life of the country, the springs of which are often to be traced back to Ruskin's witching eloquence, infectious feeling, and sterling wisdom. It is clear that he who would understand the power of this special prophetic message to our age must set aside much, forgetting intrusive egotisms for the sake of self-revelation that illumines more than the story of one man's life, and press on believing that, at the heart, Ruskin's social gospel has something vital in it.

In truth, it is far from being a hidden gospel. Already in his earlier art-criticisms it is to be found, and, when his meditations on the causes of the rarity of noble art in our times led him to the conclusion that art failed because manhood failed first, he spared no effort to make his meaning clear. There came a time, he tells us, when the misery of ordinary human conditions destroyed his joy in his dearly-loved treasures of beauty. He could no longer study the sculptures and paintings of Italy; the sufferings of his countrymen appealed with stronger compulsion. It was midway in his life, in 1860, when "Modern Painters" was completed, and seven years after the publication of the last of the three great works mentioned above, that he broke into the arena of economics with the amazing group of essays on the social problem, which he entitled "Unto This Last." Subsequent volumes and lectures rather amplified and illustrated than substantially modified the declarations of social policy set forth in this book. In "Sesame and Lilies" he calls it "the only book, properly to be called a book, that I have yet written myself, the one that will stand (if anything stand) surest and longest of all work of mine." Again in 1877 he expressed the opinion that it was "the most precious, in its essential contents, of all I have ever written," and though the wary student, accustomed to Ruskin's superlatives, will be on his guard here as ever, no one is likely seriously to dispute that "Unto This Last" is the most explicit and formal of his writings on this subject.* Familiar as Ruskin's writings are supposed to be, and really are to some readers, I may be allowed briefly to recall the chief arguments advanced in its pages.

In the first place he broadly impugns so-called "political economy" as futile, since its theories ignore the influence of social affections. The notion that men are wholly, or even dominantly, moved by self-interest he repudiates as not merely unworthy but untrue. He points out that great battles are rarely won except when the soldiers are devoted to their general, and he asks why there is no affection comparable to theirs in the relation of workmen to their employers. These toilers are the privates of the industrial army, and are assuredly as capable of noble emotions in the employments of peace as they are in those of war. He detects the secret of this grudging service on their part in the absence of a stable relationship between employed and employer; and above all he laments the absence of a high standard of honour in commerce such as normally obtains in the professions, e.g., of the soldier, who will die rather than run away; of the physician, who steadfastly adheres in the post of danger; in the parson, who will perish sooner than preach falsely; and in the lawyer, who will starve rather than take a bribe. If it must be granted, with humiliation, that not all of every type referred to lives up to the standard of honour set up, at least the standard exists, and is broadly recognised as the ideal, and as the only source of personal merit in each case. It is imperative, says Ruskin, that a similar standard of honour should be recognised by the merchant—using that term to cover all varieties of commercial and industrial citizenship. It is the "merchant's" business to provide, and not primarily to get profit, any more than it is primarily the soldier's business to get pay or pension. The "merchant" should die rather than break faith or supply a bad article; he must have so keen a sense of honour that as the captain is last to leave his ship, so he, in times of adversity, must think of his own interests last, and of his dependents' interests first.

Thus far, Ruskin makes appeal to that deeper feeling, that social affection, which on entering into the social problem is potent (as he says) to overthrow wholly the systems of "political economy" that are so foolishly constructed as to exclude an element quite inseparable from human nature. But he cannot end here. That which calls itself "political" economy has no right, he declares, to the name; for it does not really make for the welfare of the polis, or state, so long as multitudes of citizens are, not merely poor, but brutalised in their poverty. The rules of what should really be called "commercial" economy are doubtless quite valid as showing the way to acquire riches; but then riches take on quite different values in different circumstances. It is only too obvious that enormous wealth exists in our modern great cities, or rather that there exists enormous power on the part of a few to command the labour of the many. For this, says Ruskin, is the essence of riches—they enable one man to command the labour of others, and whether this is a condition of things good for the individuals concerned and for the state of which they form part depends entirely on the way in which the power represented in riches is directed. If, as is very much the case, wealth has been acquired by taking a keen advantage of the weakness of others, and is then expended upon the services that degrade or impoverish the character of those who serve, the “commercial” economy may be held indeed to have justified its precepts in leading to great accumulations of capital, but “politically” the community is getting poorer.

If, then, men are to refrain from “robbing the poor because he is poor,” and to bethink themselves that the ennobling of their helpers is their best prosperity, how can society set about reforming its present very erroneous practices? First, by paying well for good work, payment being guaranteed to the workman as surely as to the soldier or sailor. Secondly, and all the time, by the strong (which includes the rich or those in any way specially gifted) taking care of the weak. As to mere evasions of the problem of social well-being such as the proposals to “colonise,” to “bring into culture waste lands,” and the like, Ruskin sees little promise in them. After all, they can but postpone a recurrent evil. His faith is pinned to no such external expedients. The tree must be made good if the fruit is to be good, and it is to that end that his criticisms and exhortations are chiefly directed. Men must co-operate more and compete less. Men must aim to live more and be satisfied to get less. On those fundamental ideas rest all Ruskin’s “Law and Prophets.” “There is no Wealth,” he says, “but Life,” and he prints the sentence in capitals. “Life,” he continues, “including all its powers of love, of joy, and of admiration. That country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings; that man is richest who, having perfected the functions of his own life to the utmost, has also the widest helpful influence, both personal, and by means of his possessions, over the lives of others.”

He admits that this is a “strange political economy”; nevertheless, with all the opulence of his great mind and heart, he preached it forty years, and died having only caught Pisgah-gleams of the better land he longed to see in this England that he loved. Farthest of all men from what we ordinarily call “democracy,” a believer in royalty and aristocracy—when they could be really found—he had in a democratic age to go his own way, and was burdened with its solitariness. So far was he from sharing the political opinions of men like Mazzini that he says “the entire teaching of Mazzini, a man wholly upright, pure, and noble, and of subtlest intellectual power—Italian of the Italians—was rendered poisonous to Italy because he set himself against kingship.” And yet nothing can be clearer than that John Ruskin was passionately a lover of the common people. He declared that he “went mad” (alas, too literally) “because nothing came of my work.” “The enduring calamity under which I toil is humiliation—resisted necessarily by a dangerous and lonely pride.” How much of the abnormal, not to say diseased, element preceded and followed that catastrophe we cannot tell. But ages to come will tell in long and bitter experiences that he was very sane in the thought that as there is no true beauty apart from the expression of nobleness and truth, so there is no social prosperity without justice, kindness, and mutual service. “There is only one cure for public distress,” he says, “and that is public education, directed to make men thoughtful, merciful, and just.” What a criticism upon our pretensions to sanity it is, that such a prescription reads like a platitude, and that we go about seeking some neat economic method to save men, independently of the condition of their souls!

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN EDUCATION*

IF the education question had to be settled by appeal to the practice of the early church, Miss Hodgson’s book, or books of its kind, would have been in well-nigh everybody’s hands of late. But though many people would fain return, and have us all return, to the theology of primitive Christendom, there are few, if any, who desire to return to its pedagogy. Nevertheless, the story of schools and schoolmasters among the early Christians forms an interesting and important chapter in the general history of education, and therefore, if only for the subject’s sake, the book before us would be sure of a goodly number of readers.

“Primitive Christian” is a somewhat elastic expression. It may apply only to the Church of New Testament times, or, as in this book, it may be extended to that of the whole period down to about the fall of Rome. In a volume of scarcely 290 not very closely printed octavo pages we can hardly expect an exhaustive treatment of the subject. Miss Hodgson does not attempt to give us that. She seeks rather to be simply suggestive, and to bring her readers into touch with authorities, and in this purpose she succeeds very well. From the mere literary point of view her work is marred, though not very seriously, by occasional irrelevancies, repetitions, and faults of arrangement. Among several misprints we notice togo virilis for toga virilis—the printer having been thinking, perhaps, of the Japanese hero, who, no doubt, is virilis!

Stated more particularly, Miss Hodgson’s aim is to show what she considers to have been the attitude of the Primitive Church towards classical learning. She girds throughout at Compayré, the French educationist, for having said that “in their struggles with the ancient world the early Christians included in a common hatred classical literature and pagan religion.” But she fails to convince us that he grossly misrepresents the fact. Compayré admits that there were exceptions to what he conceives to have been the general rule of hostility to classical learning, and he expressly mentions Basil as one in whom Christian faith and Pagan culture were harmoniously united. Those, however, whom Compayré and many other writers have regarded as exceptional, Miss Hodgson takes as representative of the Church as a whole. We regret that we cannot follow her in doing so. The Church of those times was engaged in dire conflict with the forces of paganism, and we should as little, therefore, expect to find a widespread love of classical literature among the Fathers as we should hope to find a general enthusiasm for mediæval lore among the Protestant reformers and their immediate successors. And the evidence fully justifies our lack of expectancy. Doubtless in many cases the feeling towards the classics was one of mere indifference; it was felt that they belonged to an order of things which was passing away, to a world with which Christians had nothing to do. But in most cases there was a rooted and easily explainable antipathy to them. The Church early realised that they were in a manner “the enemy,” since, more than anything else, they rallied many of the higher minds to the defence of the ancient faith, or, at least, prevented them from coming over to Christianity. The period under review is long, and the field is wide, and it was inevitable that now and then and here and there some seeds of the classical learning should take root and be fondly cherished; but their occasional cultivation alters not the fact that as a rule they were regarded as weeds in the garden of the Lord and summarily ejected. Wherever the early Fathers did manifest any love for pagan literature, it was, as Compayré has said, mainly due to the fact that “in their unbaptised youth they had frequented pagan schools.” Probably this love was often greater than converts were willing to confess even to themselves. The voice which said to Jerome in his dream, “Thou art no Christian; thou art a Ciceronian; for where the treasure is there is the heart also”—that accusing voice must have spoken to many besides him, and not in their dreams only. Clement of Alexandria made use of illustrations from Greek poetry and of ideas from Greek philosophy, and, like Paul, he frankly acknowledged himself debtor to the Greeks. Others who helped to shape the thought of the Church were influenced consciously and unconsciously by Hellenic and Roman culture. But, as we have intimated, for Christians generally such culture had no attraction, rather the opposite. “Hearts consecrated to Christ are closed to Apollo and the muses,” said Paulinus. The Old Testament, the Gospels, and the Apostolic writings had become the true objects of study, and men were esteemed learned according to their skill in the reading and interpretation of them.

Miss Hodgson gives us an interesting sketch of the Roman system of education. She shows how the schoolmaster followed the flag and taught the young barbarian idea how to shoot. The schools thus established throughout the Empire became a perplexing problem for many a Christian parent; and, as showing that the religious difficulty in connection with education is a very ancient one in Christendom, we venture to reproduce a passage which our author translates and quotes from Boissier's La Fin du Paganisme:—"All the schools were pagan. Not only were all the ceremonies of the official faith—and, more especially, the festivals of Minerva, who was the patroness of masters and pupils—celebrated at regular intervals in the schools, but the children were taught reading out of books saturated with the old mythology. There the Christian child made his first acquaintance with the deities of Olympus. He ran the danger of imbibing ideas clean contrary to those which he had received at home. The fables he had learned to detest in his own home were explained, elucidated, held up to his admiration every day by his masters. Was it right to put him thus into two schools of thought? What could be done that he might be educated like everyone else, and yet not run the risk of losing his faith?" These questions were answered for a while according to the consciences and circumstances of the parents, and were finally settled by the Church taking over the secular education of the young, even as she had already, in her catechetical schools, taken in hand their religious training.

FOR THE FELLOWSHIP.*

AT a year's interval Mr. Binns has brought out (with a new publisher) a second part of his Free Rhythms, as he calls them in the first part, "For the Fellowship," another twenty-page booklet, in a linen-paper wrapper. Meanwhile he has published his "Life of Walt Whitman," a work of the highest value, ample in its research, and full of sympathetic insight, the completest study of its subject that we have yet received. In this second part of "For the Fellowship" the influence of Whitman in the manner of these rhythms is strongly marked, and while we find here nothing so beautiful, or striking so deep a note of feeling, as the first piece of last year, "April Begins," prompted by the death of Wilhelm Rowntree, there is the same mystical communion with the deeper Life in Nature and Humanity, and the celebration of Fellowship, as the secret of what is best in that hidden life.

The fellowship is with every living thing, and with the whole harmonious life of Nature, with human friends, who cannot be divided by death, and with God, "the Divine Companion." This last thought is expressed in the following piece:—

"We are a band of comrades scattered over the world,
Hardly seeing from so far one another's faces,
Hardly reaching from so far one another's hands:
Yet are we inseparable, livingly co-ordinate, one Body,
The Body of thy Fellowship, O Thou Nameless, Divine Companion, in Whom alone

We, scattered apart, and each one separated unto some task the others cannot share,

Find our unfailing food, and our eternal home.

Nay, Friend, Thou art not without a name among those who are in Thee,
For each by some name passionately invokes Thee,

Thou answering each.

Yet when we speak of Thee with one another

Nameless art Thou,

For verily we know our word were but the shadow of our fancy's finger

Pointing at Thee.

But Thou no shadow art, nor fancy,

Blood of our Body, Soul of our Fellowship,

So near, so sure, we need no name for Thee."

And this other tells of what a human friend may be in that Fellowship, a friend, who, if we mistake not, has passed beyond all mortal shadows, to the fuller life:—

"By what name can I call thee?

What word that will be faithful to us who are together spite of partings,

To us who dare accept what Love shall bring,

For He is greater than it all, and wise to choose,

And He hath made us fearless of its fear,—

Ah, He embraces all things, and the All speaks to my heart of thee—

By what name can I call Thee?

Comrade!—

'Tis the word of the wind that carries the awakening rain,

And of the thrushes answering:

A word that is the grip of a man's hand,
the secret of a woman's face,

Heart-worship, pouring out its treasure, uttering itself,—

The word of Love Creative, whose very saying lifts the lowest,—

The word thy self hath taught and teacheth me,

Comrade."

Death is here welcomed, as in Whitman, simply as the perfecting of life.

"Behold, as out of a seed that dies and breaks asunder,

Under the eyes of Love comes forth the new life we call death,

More beautiful and winged and free."

The thought in itself is true and beautiful, but, reading the two pieces, "Up from the Road" and "The Barriers Break," the question arises, whether the expression of it is altogether true. Do we, as a matter of fact, call the new life death?
It is rather the breaking of the barriers that we call death. The joy of our faith is that, whatever may be broken, it is life that remains.

"Green among the dead stubble, springs
the three-foiled clover:

Already in the harrowed ground sleeps
the new seed:

And in the tossing wind, darkening to the night,

Blithe answer make the birds among the branches,

'Welcome to Death,' they chirp and sing, and quail not."

But is that what they really sing, even into the poet's ear?

As to the form of the rhythms opinions will be as diverse as in the case of Whitman, and it is perhaps idle to discuss the question whether this is poetry or not. It is, however, of interest, and not, perhaps, unfair criticism, to take such a piece as that on "The God Within," and set it down simply as prose, not divided into lines, as Mr. Binns has printed it, and then see whether all that it contains, and would express, is not there just the same.
This was the suggestion of a friend, to whom we read the piece aloud, and whose comment was: It is a beautiful prayer, and it has rhythm, as many of the old collects have. But why print it as though it were poetry?

That Mr. Binns does not entirely abandon all affinity to other forms of verse, one piece in this booklet testifies, and curiously enough, the one entitled "The Rebel":—

"As first it said, still saith the soul, 'I dare':

Virtue and Prudence and Religion, yea, Love, Friendship, Wisdom, all together say

'Beware!'

But unto all the soul replies, 'I dare!'

'Draw back! Repent!' they cry:
'Learn to obey!

Rebel not, venture not! Thy foolish way

Forswear!'

Humbly answers the soul, and says,
'I dare!'

'Yonder lies all disaster and dismay:

Dar'st thou to summons Madness and dim grey

Despair!'

Solemnly, proudly, saith the soul, 'I dare!'

'A spark of God is mixed into my clay, Destined, I know not whither, nor the way:

I dare

Only to be mine own self everywhere.'"

A WORK OF JUSTICE AND HUMANITY

SIR,—The Committee of the International Arbitration and Peace Association ventures to ask the readers of the INQUIRER for practical sympathy, support, and cooperation in their important task.

The Association was founded twenty-six years ago to educate the minds of men and women regarding the enormous evils of war and proposed methods for its abolition.

In the pursuit of this object it was resolved to seek the co-operation of fellow-workers in other countries, through correspondence and personal interviews; as also by the foundation of Peace Societies throughout Europe. Among other measures adopted for united action, the Committee especially devoted itself to the work of removing those misapprehensions of fact which, when appearing in the newspaper press, are so frequently a cause of groundless suspicions and widespread animosity.

To promote mutual good-will between the peoples, international meetings were held in many places, leading to the formation of committees and societies, on behalf of this common object. It soon became

* "For the Fellowship," Part II. May, 1906.
H. B. Binns, (London: C. W. Daniel, 6d. net.)

possible to arrange for an annual congress of these societies, to be held successively in the chief cities of Europe; and at the third of these meetings (held at Rome in 1891), it was resolved to create a central "Bureau of Peace," at Berne. From this time forth the Peace Movement increased in volume and importance, and an extensive literature relating to the subject grew up in several countries.

Owing to the education of public sentiment thus achieved, the Great Conference of the Powers, held in 1899, became possible; and resulted in the constitution of a permanent body of jurists and statesmen whose services should be available for deciding upon the merits of international differences submitted to them. It was not found possible, as yet, to induce the Powers to agree to an absolute obligation to refer disputes to such a Court, except in cases of minor importance not involving the "honour" and "vital interests" of States; but it was felt that the great step thus taken would be followed by a greater measure at no long interval. The two great conflicts that have since taken place have everywhere deepened the horror attaching to war, and have intensified the desire to get rid of this overwhelming evil. At the same time, through the absence of some adequate means for its prevention, national solvency and prosperity are increasingly menaced by the ceaseless growth of fleets and armies, accompanied by an eager search for new methods of destruction.

It is now known that a second conference will shortly be convoked, in order to consider in what way the work commenced in 1899 may be extended. It is hoped that, among other important things, agreements may be entered into for the proportionate and simultaneous reduction of armaments, or at least for their arrest. It is certain, however, that there will be strong opposition to such changes on the part of great military States; and that no Government will concur, unless compelled by the people. It is essential, then, that in every country a great and unmistakable expression of opinion should be called forth in favour of this pacific evolution; and it becomes the urgent duty of every man of peace, who sees the greatness of the cause at stake, to join in a national demand for the measures above mentioned.

English workers for this cause find themselves at this moment in a more favourable position for its prosecution than at any previous time. Through the growing unity of aim and of ideals with their brethren in other lands the working classes of all countries will be able to bring about a policy of unity, peace and concord in international relations. In order to secure the ultimate triumph of this cause of justice and humanity, the Peace Societies must become more strongly organised.

The small number of persons who have done the work of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, have laboured under circumstances of much discouragement, for want of adequate pecuniary and personal support.

In view of the declarations of the Prime Minister, and more recently of the Foreign Secretary, however, they are filled with new hopes, and are eager to enter upon the larger sphere of action which now presents itself. For this the Committee needs an income which is adequate for the several plans of action before them. As their work has always commanded strong approval in many countries, and as their journal, Concord, holds the highest place in the esteem of many, this committee still hopes that the personal co-operation and pecuniary resources which they need will not be wanting.

The Committee, in submitting these considerations to the readers of the INQUIRER, feel that they could hardly address any body of persons more likely to appreciate the ideals of this Association, or to approve of the efforts of the latter on behalf of their realisation.

On behalf of the Committee,

HODGSON PRATT, President.

SOME THOUGHTS WHILE THE CHURCH WAS CLOSED.

THE church was closed during August, and I had been stopping with some friends who were Socialists. And that morning I had met a member of the church who was also a Socialist. He had handed me a tract containing the programme of the Independent Labour Party, and had hinted that the Church was, after all, not much use, as it contained too many people who were indifferent to Socialism. And all that day the thought recurred to me: "Was this continued working for the coming of a new social system any real and satisfying substitute for the individual religious life?" These ardent Socialists, who seem so wrapped up in their propaganda and work, are they in truth on the right path? Is not the building up of character, the suppression of evil propensities, the closer walk with God still above and beyond all social systems? And I thought of some of the needless misery which I had seen in my pilgrimage through life, caused, as it seemed, by defects of character, and the words of Channing recurred to me, though it was years since I had read them, where he asks what causes the most misery in the world: "Is it sickness or selfishness? Is it want of outward comfort or want of inward peace?" And again I thought of some social reformers to whom I had looked up in my younger days, but on whom a cloud had seemed to descend in after life, and some evil spirit had seemed to possess, while men of more moderate views seemed now to be doing better work than my early heroes. Then the thought of Wordsworth came to my mind, that Conservative Churchman, who was yet somehow so democratic, and who wrote:—

"Love had he found in huts where poor men lie;

His only teachers had been woods and rills,

The peace that is beneath the starry sky

The sleep that is among the lonely hills."

Ah! his teachers had been woods and rills, not social systems. Was this the answer?

And then I thought: Why is it that some of the great philosophers of the last century, like Herbert Spencer and Professor Lecky were so much against Socialism? The reply of the Socialist that they were in the backwaters of the individualism of the last century scarcely seems adequate: "How to live," says Spencer, "that is the essential question for us, the right ruling of conduct in all directions under all circumstances."

Is not this true for each one of us? Will Socialism or Liberalism, or in fact any "ism," as systems, really teach us how to live?

And again I thought of that problem that presented itself to John Stuart Mill of what life would be worth, if all the social reforms wished for were gained. And then I thought of Mr. Philip Wicksteed's wonderful little book, "The Religion of Time and of Eternity," where this problem is dealt with. That evening when I got home, after a day's wandering on a Kentish common, I took the book from the shelf, and it seemed to me on re-reading it that some of the lines were an answer to my questions.

"Surely," says Mr. Wicksteed, "we should value progress, not as mere change or movement, but for the abiding treasures which it brings, treasures of knowledge and of love, the possession of which is at once the most exalted activity and the deepest peace. Progress has a meaning if there is a goal. Fighting against the foes of life, gathering and spreading the means of life has a meaning, if we know how to live."

Yes, we must know how to live. Mr. Wicksteed repeats Spencer's phrase: And to learn to live we need the Church, even if it only puts us into the right attitude to learn. Not Socialism, not Liberalism, not Unitarianism, nor any other "ism" or social system, will really help us to live, unless we also have the "closer walk with God," the heart, as Wordsworth says, that "listens and receives."

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

XVII.—DISCIPLESHIP.

THE avoidance of the term "proselyte" in Christ's final missionary charge is worthy of notice, for it was a term in common use, and was applied to those who "came over" from heathenism. It is not, "Go ye and make proselytes," but "Go and make disciples."

We feel at once that "disciple" is the better word. It is a name which binds but does not restrict. It leaves the way open: Not with the image of the soldier, bound by the soldier's oath, but with that of the willing scholar, the learner, did the Christian profession begin: Discipleship is open to all grades, all ages; is progressive, experimental; allows of immediate adaptation, and leaves room for future expansion.

That this discipleship was not to be simply the schooling of the mind into intellectual agreement is clear from those earlier statements—"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another"; "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed"; "If any man come to me, and hate not his own life, he cannot be my disciple; whosoever he be of you that renounceth not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." The conditions of discipleship are here explained as Love, Obedience, Self-devotion, Self-denial. To teach these is to make a moral and spiritual appeal; and it was through this appeal, and not through argumentative statement, that the first preaching of Christianity took effect. We read that an angel loosed the apostles out of prison and bade them go and stand and speak to the people "all the words of this life." They were to be living witnesses radiant with the life they preached.

Over against this evangelising spirit stands the proselytising spirit, the spirit which says, "Be one of us by thinking as we do," fastens on doctrinal error rather than on moral defect, and encourages a doubting man to think that it is his religious system only which is at fault, and that truth can be reached by exchanging one set of propositions for another. It is a shallow spirit. It imagines that a new adherent can "come over" from the habits and affections of a lifetime and shed his faith like ill-fitting clothes. It is a jealous spirit, and keeps close watch upon outward signs of conformity and observance. A proselytising Church is not so much in love with truth as with its own presentation of it, or so much concerned with men's souls as with its own success. If stigma is attached to the word "proselytism" because of the condemnation in the Gospels of the making of proselytes by the Pharisees, it also attaches to it because it stands for a permanently mischievous tendency in the religious mind.

It cannot be too often remembered that it was ever the way of Christ to regenerate with new affections rather than to indoctrinate with new beliefs. The recruiting spirit is quite absent from his teaching: He shows no desire to detach his followers from the religious use to which they were accustomed. His object is not to win souls, but to save them—Learn of me, for I have a secret to tell you for your good: Nor does it seem to have been in his mind that those who afterwards taught in his name would ever seek the furtherance of a society smaller than the Kingdom of God. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Oh! you dear 'ickie thing! you dear 'ickie thing!" crooned little Lilian, as she sat on the grass bending over something in her lap. At this moment Tommy came up the garden, satchel on back, just returned from school.

"Hullo, Lilian," he called out, "what have you got there?"

And Lilian lifted her head, tossing back her drooping hair, and showed a baby thrush. "Look at him, Tommy; such a poor, funny little thing—all fluff, and such a big beak! And he's so cold! I think he's tumbled out of his nest, don't you?"

"Poor little chap!" said Tommy. "Let's ask mummy what we shall do with him; I'd like to keep him."

So both children ran to Mrs. Welldon, where she sat sewing in her summer-house at the other end of the lawn. "Look, mummy!" they cried. "What shall we do with this little thrush? He's so cold, and we think he'll die."

Mrs. Welldon took the little baby bird and warmed it in her hands, and laid it against her cheek. "Come, children," she said, "we will take it in and warm it and feed it, and see if we can save its life."

So she carried it into the house, Tommy and Lilian dancing excitedly along by her side; and they found a little basket and lined it with something soft and put poor little Dicky into it.

"Now we must feed him, mummy," said Tom; "he must be hungry; I am, and it's nearly dinner-time."

So they asked Cookie to boil an egg and chop it up very finely; and then began the great business of feeding little Dicky with a spoon. At first he didn't understand, and Mrs. Welldon had to open his beak and slip the spoon in; but very soon he understood, and opened wide his beak to have the egg put in. Such a great beak it was, too! yellow inside, with a wee little orange-coloured tongue at the back of it.

Dicky Specklebreast, as the children called him, was a very amusing pet. He had to be fed with a spoon for three weeks, and he was a very hungry baby. He would open wide his beak and cry, "Cheep! cheep!" loudly when anyone came near his cage, and Tommy and Lilian liked nothing better than putting egg into that yellow, gaping beak.

So Dicky grew and thrived, and at the end of three weeks he began to peck, and they weren't obliged to feed him with a spoon any more.

"Now," said Mrs. Welldon, "I'm not going to buy him any more eggs. You must find out what is the proper food for thrushes, and we'll give him that."

So Tommy went and had a talk with his crony the village barber, who kept all sorts of pets; and he came back with some of Thurston's food for thrushes, which he mixed with breadcrumbs and moistened with water, and which Dicky much liked. So on this Dicky lived and flourished; and he had, besides, cress and lettuce from Lilian, which he enjoyed, and delicious blue-bottle flies and worms from Tommy, which he enjoyed still more.

Dicky's fluff came off gradually; but the fluff round his head, that looked like an old gentleman's rim of white hair, came off last of all, and he looked very funny when one side of it was gone and the other left! But soon it was all gone, and his pretty feathers grew—all but his tail, which was so long coming that Lilian said one day anxiously, "Mummy, I think God has forgotten to give Dicky a tail!"

"No, dear," said her mother; "God forgets nothing. Everything that is right He gives in His own good time, and we mustn't be impatient."

So in time Dicky's tail began to appear, and then he was able to fly better, and Mr. Welldon told the children they ought soon to let him go.

Then Lilian came crying to her mother in the summer-house, Tommy following with a very gloomy face.

"Oh! mummy!" cried Tom; "father says we must let Dicky go, and he is such a dear little chap! Do let us keep him always! He doesn't want to go."

"Ye—yes, mummy," sobbed Lilian, "he's qu—quite happy. He always sings in his inside when we bring his cage out here"—for this was how Lilian described the faint, soft little warble Dicky used to make in his throat with his beak shut, by way of trying to sing.

Mrs. Welldon looked gravely at the little appealing faces. "Children," she said, "do you love little Dicky?"

"Yes, mummy; of course we do!"

"Then you will wish him to be happy, to be happy not in your way, but in the way God meant him to be—flying about in the beautiful world like other birds, and by-and-by building his nest in a tree under the blue sky, and having a little mate and little nestlings in it like other birds. Wouldn't you like your dear little Dicky to have this happy life?"

The children dropped their eyes. "Yes, mummy," they said, softly. And they went into the house and brought out the cage and opened the door. Out flew Dick, with an excited squeak, and alighted on the rose-bed, where he spent the morning standing on one leg and looking about him. The children watched him anxiously, and went for once unwillingly into dinner. Directly it was over, they rushed out to look for Dicky; but he was nowhere to be seen. Nothing more was seen of him till evening, when his voice was heard calling, calling loudly, but his person was not visible. Guided by the voice, Tommy and Lilian searched around, and presently Dicky himself was found hiding under a tall plant and calling loudly for his friends. He hopped out to greet the children, and let Lilian pick him up and carry him back to his cage for the night. "He wants to be put to bed," she said; and right glad she was to have him again.

Next morning the children let him fly again, and once more he spent the morning in the rose-bed, and disappeared in the afternoon; and again at night he called loudly from the same hiding-place; and again the children hoped to catch him and have their dear birdie in his cage for the night.

But not so Dick! He came out to greet them, and perhaps to thank them for saving his life and being so kind to him; but as Lilian's little hand went down towards him, he flew away, and vanished in some bushes, and Lilian has never seen him since.

But she hears him often chirping to her when she comes out into the garden; for he sees her, and calls to her, and she calls to him; but he never lets her see him, for he has tasted liberty and does not want to be caught again.

He does not know that Tommy and Lilian have sacrificed the pleasure they would have had in keeping him that he may be a free and happy little bird; but that is what they did, and by so doing they have learnt one of the great lessons of love.

THE APPEAL OF BEAUTY.

It is a happy coincidence that, while we are able this week to publish a sermon by the late Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG on "The Beauty of Nature," preached more than once in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, after a summer holiday, we can at the same time say a first word of cordial welcome to the new book on "The Religion of Nature," by his friend, the Rev. W. J. JUPP, of Croydon, and formerly, for some years, of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool.

Of Mr. JUPP's book* we shall have more to say when we return to it for fuller review, and here propose rather to let it speak to us, as a token to many friends, who will delight to have the book, of what they will find in it. Into it a man's heart has been put, and the heart of a man who knows "the healing grace of Nature," and can lead us with true insight to the teaching of WORDSWORTH, "seer and poet," and of the later "poet-naturalists." But for the moment we turn only to the one chapter on "The Appeal of Beauty," to show what it should mean to us, who have our own place in the great "kinship of Nature."

Mr. ARMSTRONG tells in his sermon of how much more there is in the beauty of Nature than merely physical effects, and so Mr. JUPP also speaks of the appeal of beauty, as making us aware of the deeper truth, of the divine harmony in which we are at one with the universe.

"Here, perhaps," he says, "is the deeper significance of that sufficing joy which this vision often brings to the mind. There is a power in beauty which satisfies even while it subdues and masters us. It can so affect us, emotionally, as to leave, for the time, nothing for the heart to desire, nothing to regret, nothing to hope. 'Great art' it has been said, 'is that before which we long to die.'

But Nature can so affect us by her loveliness that life becomes too deep and passionate to permit of any thought of death. We belong to that which is manifest there; and though its forms may change—are, in fact, changing while we behold—the reality is eternal, and we ourselves are a vital part of that. In such moods the lines of KEATS, at the opening of Endymion, are no longer an over-statement of the fact; they become inevitably, irresistibly true:

'A thing of beauty is a joy for ever:
Its loveliness increases: it will never Pass into nothingness; but still will keep
A bower quiet for us, and a sleep Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing.'

"A spray of wild rose by the wayside; a field of corn waving in the morning wind; a willow-wren flitting among the summer leaves, dispersing his simple melody there; the glow of purple heather on a wild moorland bathed in sunlight; the intense clear blue of the sky flecked with light fleecy clouds; the wonderful brightness of still water at sunset, in an open valley—these things, and a thousand other such can so affect the mind, in receptive moods, that we become, there and thus, in the very moment of perception, one with the Reality which the visible scene in part discloses and in part conceals. We are caught away from the trivial and personal; we are carried beyond ourselves and our narrow individual interests; 'we see into the life of things'; we lose and find ourselves in that larger life which meets us there in loveliness, and masters us without an effort, without a word."

That all the meaning of the beauty in Nature is in its message to us need by no means be assumed, and there are clearly other purposes, which it effects in the great economy. But neither are these others the whole, and we are foolish, indeed, if we suffer our life to be impoverished by any such suspicion. This Mr. JUPP clearly shows:—

"The utilitarian purpose is only a small part of the matter. There is an affluence and lavishness of beauty which transcends our theories of 'Natural Selection.' Loveliness for its own sake is here, for our amazement and pleasure. The colours of flowers are attractive to insects! But why such delicacy of colour, such exquisite shadings and markings on folded bud or expanded petal! A bee or a butterfly, as someone has suggested, might be attracted as well by a rough splash or a careless blotch of red or yellow as by that grace of form and richness of bloom which a rose or a buttercup displays. Granting that beauty in many living things plays its part in the struggle for existence, is there not something over and above that—a charm or enchantment of loveliness, which hints of a joy in existence, finding its own spontaneous expression or fulfilment thus? And here, perhaps, we may find the inmost secret, the ultimate significance of our human joy in beholding. The spirit immanent there, 'delighting in its own ideal forms,' kindles a responsive delight in us. Man and Nature rejoice together, and in that pure, impassioned gladness the meaning of creation is realised, the purpose of God is fulfilled in the heart of His wondering child. It cannot be an accident, a mere chance coincidence, that the sights and sounds of the external world should awaken this response within the human breast. It was meant so. It is a part of the eternal order of things: Some word of the great secret, some voice from the great silence makes itself heard, whenever Nature's appeal moves us, either to laughter or tears, or to the simple gladness of being in the presence of something fair and comely.

"However much we grant to the claims of scientific theory, what are we to say of those manifold aspects of beauty in Nature which, so far as we can see, have nothing whatever to do with 'Natural Selection'? The glow of colour on snow-clad hills at dawn or sunset; the 'orange sky' of evening fading into tender greys and warm purple above, with one bright planet set in the darkening heavens; the magnificent form of cloud-masses built along the horizon—mountains of grey mist clothed in sunlight and moulded by the winds into such dignity and grandeur of outline; the bright curve of the new moon, with the old one faintly discernible in its embrace; the enchantment of woodland places and the aisles of ancient forests; the splendid curve of sea waves breaking on a lonely level shore, showing at times that clear translucent green, which is one of Nature's most perfect colours—of such things none would claim that they play any part in the 'struggle for existence.' But they do play a very noble part in our enjoyment of existence, and in the refinement and enrichment of our spiritual being. The mysterious Power, whose work these forms of beauty are, appeals to us through them; and our wonder and delight in beholding must be the response of a life within us that is at one with the Life that is manifest there."

With beauty there is also sublimity to speak thus to the soul of man: "Through insight and love and admiration," so Mr. JUPP concludes, "we have fellowship with the indwelling spirit of the whole. 'God's home' is in this living universe, and man's home is in it too. And when we see and enjoy we are made one with the great heart of all."

THE BEAUTY IN NATURE.

[A SERMON AFTER A HOLIDAY.*]

BY RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

"The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein."—PSALM XXIV. 1.

I AM afraid a strict interpretation of the Hebrew would hardly justify me in the use I would make of this text to-day. But I like to think of these two clauses opening the famous Psalm as though they stood for those two great divisions of the land-surface of this planet—the vast untamed tracks of hill and mountain and forest on the one hand, fresh from the impress of the hand of God, and on the other hand the man-made towns and cities teeming with busy men and women, swarming with children—the men and women that are to be. "God made the country, and man made the town," says Cowper—yes, but country and town alike are God's domain. Man is the tenant only; God the landlord. The natural earth, heaving with crested hill, stretching afar with billowy plain, that is indeed the Lord's with all its fulness of noble tree and lowly flower, of cataract and stream, of rock and river; yes, but no less the world of man in crowded market-place and row upon row of street, thronged with human dwellings, that is the Lord's as well.

Though city shades off to suburb, and suburb to country lanes and hedgerows, and country to vast open spaces where the foot-tread of man is rare, and you can perhaps nowhere draw a sharp line between, yet there are few main divisions of the world that mean so much to us as open country and crowded town, the great natural unspoiled play-grounds where we drink in new store of health and strength, the packed streets and squares where we expend that health and strength in the battle of life and the service of man.

"The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein." Where is God's heart the most? Which lies nearer to His care and love? Though we must surely believe that where there are the greatest number of His children, there is there most of the divine love, yet there are few of us, I suppose, to whom it is not easier to feel God's presence, and His love in scenes of beauty far away from the warehouse and the office than where dull and ugly streets and the feverish haste of city-life obscure the quietude and benignity which God breathes upon the earth.

Whenever one is brought into contact with the glories of mountain, waterfall, and tarn, the question often presses itself in on one, "Why are these things so beautiful? Whence their fascination? What is it in them that now makes the heart sing with delight, now stirs the soul's depths as with a solemn appeal? Why are the mountains grand? Why is the cataract beautiful? Why is the bosom of the lough so lovely? Why does it sometimes seem so easy to be good in the silent places of nature? Why in the great wild on the breast of the giant hills or lying beside the marge of the translucent lake does God seem sometimes so real, so near, so good? Why is our mood softened, and our temper attuned to a new concord? What is the secret that the hills enfold and the rivers enshrine? What is the secret of natural beauty by which it gets at a man and finds his soul?"

There are those who seek the explanation of this great fact on a purely material plain. If you have long been among huge mountains or encircled by precipitous heights, and then of a sudden are confronted by a level meadow pasturing its flocks, there is a peculiar delight in the vision, which seems actually to be physical. The muscles of the eye seem to have an exquisite relief in the substitution of horizontal lines for the perpendicular lines which have occupied the field so long. And in like manner there are some who would find a purely physiological reason for all our sense of joy in the earth's variant scenery. But it needs but little thought to see how inadequate are all such explanations.

For a little reflection shows that the beauty lying at the heart of a splendid landscape is not really physical at all. The landscape itself is physical, but its beauty is above the physical. Mountain and valley, cliff and torrent, are material things, but the loveliness they enshrine and distil in the heart of man is spiritual. And that you may see by the simplest proof.

Is this not so indeed? Have you never gazed on a landscape new to you, as evening was drawing on, and beheld away there on the distant verge of land and sky a rugged blue-grey line, all jagged, pinnaced, and broken? And you have been in doubt whether that far off mass was cloud or mountain. For a little while you have thought it a mountain range, and the towering height of cliff and massive range of rock has filled you with sense of the gloriously sublime. But presently some small shifting of outline has shown you that after all it is but a pile of cloud. It has been beautiful still, perhaps with the sunset tint upon it. But with a beauty how wholly different! Probably your æsthetic sense experiences sharp and sudden disappointment. It is not the view you had thought it was. It is a landscape other than you dreamed, tamer and many stages less sublime.

And yet to the physical eye it is just the same. It was hard to discern whether these were solid rocks blue-grey in the evening light or accumulated vapours from the humid earth. It is not the physical man that feels the difference; the difference is all in the mental interpretation of the emotions thence resulting. At first you took the spectacle for the titan grandeur of everlasting hills; now you know it is but the floating mists of evanescent vapour. And the key in which the music was set is all changed, and the choral splendour of the oratorio the mountains chant has been displaced by the pastoral melody of the shifting clouds.

Again and again, in travel, one has like proofs pressed in on one. It is demonstrated that the secret of beauty is not in the physical vision, but in the interpreting mind. In such a land, for example, as Norway, often and often one sees rising above the trees on some mountain side the floating spray of some vast and tremendous cataract the actual fall of whose massive waters is concealed from view. And few sights are more beautiful or impressive. But occasionally one has thought one was gazing on that spectacle and feeling the joy of it, when some shifting of the light revealed that it was but the high-flying dust from the hidden highway, thrown up by a cavalcade upon the road. There was no change in the physical impression upon the eye; but the spirit was taken out of it and that which just now seemed lovely became commonplace and an offence against the landscape's sanctity.

And so to careful thought it would seem that this beauty which stirs us with so strange a power is as much in ourselves as in the form and colour of the landscape. It is the interpreting mind that makes the glory of Norway or of Switzerland, of the Rhine or the St. Lawrence. "We receive," it has been said, "but what we give." "Our own soul," said a great Scottish preacher, who doubtless loved well the Highland crags and glens, "our own soul is the urn which sprinkles beauty on the universe." The universe mirrors the mind of man gazing on its face, he receives back from it what is loveliest and purest in his own heart. He reads in it the present God; but only if God first be in his own soul present. The mighty mountain purple-breasted is in physical truth but a lump of earth. Yet it speaks to man of a steadfast power that moulds the rocks and holds up the cliffs in their places. The river leaping from the mountain-crag is but so many gallons of water obedient to the behest of gravitation, yet to man it seems to shout in the gladness of its young strength pæans of praise to the Almighty. The still lake only sends back the image of the engirding hills in obedience to the laws of the reflection of light. Yet a strange peace steals over the heart of the man whose eye sweeps over its sunny face. The snow lying field behind field on the huge upland slopes is but so much water chilled to deadness. Yet it whispers to the gazer strange messages of the eternal loving-kindness and the divine care which covers the world as with a garment.

Yes, the beauty of the Welsh hills or the Scottish moors or the Swiss glaciers or the Norwegian fjords, or the wondrous and glowing Sicilian outlines is not in their mere physical shapes and tints any more than the beauty of the poetry of Shakespeare is in the strokes and curves of the letters in which it stands printed on the page. Were there no mind, no heart to interpret, there would be no beauty there. It is what we read into or read out of cliff and tarn, snowy height and forest depth, that renders them all-glorious. And so we find that uncultured races of men, nay, the vulgar and coarse of our own race, find no beauty in them, and marvel at our delight.

Is it then a delusion, all this message which some of us seem to read on our summer rambles, this philosophy, this poetry, this evangel which we spell out line upon line, this hymn which hill and river seem to sing, this summer psalm of the God so good, so kind, so great, over all and in all? When vista after vista the mountains rise above the margin of the lake, and their interfoldings seems a message of the harmony that lies at the heart of God, is it all an illusion which we are reading into mere mounds of earth, and is the whole a fancy and a lie? Is there no message? Is no one really speaking to us? Is no one really saying to us out of the vast, "I am good and great, trust in Me, and be at peace?"

Let us answer that question by another. Because there is no poetry in the triangle of A, or the double loop of B, or in C's half-circle, no message in the stiff straight line of I, of the cross of X, is there therefore no message, no poetry in Shakespeare, who uses these strokes and curves as speech by which to speak to us? They are but symbols, it is true, in themselves but dull and mute. Yet symbols are they, and through the medium of these straight lines and circles comes poured upon us all the wealth of Plato's wisdom and Milton's majestic lore, and the fiery burden of Isaiah, and the everlasting gospel of the very Christ.

And so with these marvellous scenes of hill and dale and sunny waters on which we love to gaze. They are nothing but masses of solid or liquid, just as a page of Shakespeare is nothing but a splash of printer's ink. But just as the page of the book is the vehicle through which the immortal bard speaks to us heart to heart, so are these various landscapes the medium through which the Divine Love utters itself to every attuned soul. Though their voice is not heard, yet are they language, speech—the language and speech of God. And often through them God speaks to a man with a convincing power beyond that of Hymn or Bible, a more direct and persuasive speech from the divine heart to the human than oratory of modern preacher or rhythm of ancient prophet.

Shall we then be sceptical of the messages nature seems to speak in mountain-fastness or in rushing river? But in language of man to man we trust that kind of speech the most. Often words fail to convince, but a look into loving eyes sets all doubt at rest and wins us altogether. The words "I love you," have often rung hollow on the ear and carried no conviction on their wings. But when eyes say "I love you," be they the mother's gazing on her child, or the wife's looking at her husband, there are no unbelievers any more; we all trust what the eyes say. And yet this language of the eyes is but an arrangement of the muscles surrounding the visual organ. It is physical entirely, solely a special disposal of the tissues. And the loveliness or sublimity of nature is only a certain arrangement of soil and water. Yet is it of a truth the expression on the countenance of God. And if the little child does well to believe what the mother's eyes seem to say to it in silent eloquence, the man does well no less to believe what the great hills or the rushing waters, which are the face of God, seem to say to him in the hour of communion. If the one cannot lie, neither can the other. If the one is the mirror of the highest human truth, the other is the mirror of the holiest truth divine.

And so in all noble poetry of Wordsworth or Tennyson or their kin, in which the word of God is read in scenery sublime or beautiful, there is not fancy only, or poetic simile, or pretty flight of imagination, but there is the very essence and substance of truth, truth as real, as literal, as profound—perhaps more so—as any conveyed in scientific treatise or philosophical address.

The philosophers, the men of science, the students of physics and of life and of the social organism, these all have words to say to us in these latter days which are full of wonderful new truth. They are flooding the world with new and marvellous revelations. They are all prophets of God, speaking His word to the generation that now is. But I am not sure but what the poets, whom some deem only the amusers of our vacant hours, and others mere weavers of gossamer tales, are not some of them saying to us the things that will wear longest and need least revision, showing the stoutest grip on the rock of eternal truth, expounding the universe in most literal accord with everlasting fact, because they see in the framework of things, the starry heavens and the sweet and beautiful earth, the very countenance of God, and read therein His living word as the child reads the very truth in its mother's eyes.

With the words of one such poet, who has had many things to say to many wanderers in lands of sunny beauty or sombre majesty, let us close these meditations. He is likening the great mountain with its walls of precipice to some vast cathedral towering towards the heaven of God, and tells how as he stood high up in its stone-built gallery the speech of God found way into his soul.

The Silence, awful Living Word
Behind all sound, behind all thought,
Whose speech is Nature-yet-to-be,
The Poem yet unwrought!

That day it spake within the soul,
Through sense all strangely blent with sense:

The vision took majestic rhythm,
We heard the firmaments.

And listened, time and space forgot,
As flowed the lesson for the day—
"Order is Beauty; Law is Love; Childlike his worlds obey."

And all the heaven seemed folding down
Above the shining earth's sweet face,
Till in our hearts they touched! We felt
The thall of their embrace.

WHEN your own burden is heaviest you can always lighten a little some other burden.—G. S. Merriam.

THE progress of Christianity, which must go on, is but another name for the growing knowledge and experience of that spiritual worship of the Father which Christ proclaimed as the end of his mission; and before this the old idolatrous reliance on ecclesiastical forms and organisations cannot stand. There is thus a perpetually swelling current which exclusive churches have to stem, and which must sooner or later sweep away their proud pretensions. What avails it that this or another church summons to its aid fathers, traditions, venerated usages? The spirit, the genius of Christianity is stronger than all these.—Channing.

THE PADIHAM CENTENARY.

The Centenary of the Padiham congregation, which had its origin in the "Unitarian Methodist" movement of 1806, when Joseph Cooke was expelled from the Wesleyan Methodist body on account of heresy, was celebrated on Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 8 and 9, as we noted last week. The proceedings were of unusual interest, both on account of the remarkable history, and of the vigorous and hearty life with which the congregation enters on the second century of its existence.

The centenary volume,* compiled by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, the present minister, contains a full record of the congregation's origin and history, and its successive ministers, with portraits and other illustrations. Mr. Jenkins speaks modestly of his undertaking as having proved greater than he anticipated and beyond his ability; but he has collected the material with great diligence, and for the history he was fortunate in being able to make free use of the Rev. C. J. Street's account of the "Rise and Progress of Unitarianism in Padiham," published in 1881. In fact, the greater part of the history, up to that date, is told in the words of Mr. Street's earlier narrative.

The early history of the congregation is a very precious memory for all who are connected with it. The Rev. Joseph Cooke, at the time of his expulsion by the Wesleyan Conference in August, 1806, was stationed at Rochdale, and both there and in the neighbouring towns and villages he had many earnest adherents. Thus, every fourth Sunday he went to Newchurch in Rossendale to preach, and on the following Monday and Tuesday, preached also at Padiham and Burnley. After his early death in 1811, the congregations thus formed maintained their faithful efforts, and the lead was taken by the Rev. John Ashworth of Newchurch, whilst at Padiham two local preachers, both handloom weavers, James Pollard and John Robinson, continued for forty years as ministers of the congregation. In the first years these "Unitarian Methodists" knew nothing of any other body of Christians holding such views, and had been brought to their Unitarianism simply by their earnest study of the Scriptures, and determination to follow truth alone, but soon the neighbouring Unitarian ministers heard of them, and warm fellowship and mutual help ensued. From the first, though humble people, with very little means, the Padiham congregation was full of vigorous life and a determined spirit of self-help. The story should be read of their struggles, of their building of the first Nazareth Chapel, and then again of the new Chapel, opened in 1874, of how much was done by the members themselves as a labour of love, and in what spirit all difficulties were overcome. It was only following the good old tradition when in preparing for the building of the memorial schools now happily opened, the young men of the congregation and their present minister set to work to dig out the foundations.

* "History of Unitarianism in Padiham, 1806-1906." A Centenary Volume by J. E. Jenkins, Minister. Together with some Reminiscences contributed by past Ministers. (To be ordered from Mr. Admiral Shaw, 9, Villiers-street, Padiham. 2s. net; by post, 2s. 2d.)

The record of the successive ministers must be read in the Centenary volume, and with this also the pleasant reminiscences contributed by the Revs. H. S. Solly, C. J. Street, J. McGavin Sloan, E. T. Russell and J. H. Wicksteed. These recall happy days spent at Padiham, and the memory of many devoted members of the congregation. There are some amusing stories too. Mr. Solly and Mr. Street both pay a tribute to the memory of Thomas Holland, who did so much for the music of the church, and Mr. Street tells of how he never forgot the mistake made by their nervous domestic who went to his shop one day and asked for "a tin of potted Unitarians!" Mr. Solly who was the first minister of the present chapel, tells of their delight in the school-room which was then also new, and adds: "I remember a grand gathering of all the old Sunday scholars whom we could get together, when friends met who had not seen each other for thirty years, and one woman was heard to exclaim, "Oh, if heaven will be like this, I will try hard to get there!" Mr. Street, who succeeded Mr. Solly at Padiham, concludes his reminiscences with the following passage:—

"As my father is to preach the Centenary sermon, it may be appropriate for me to recall a walk which we had one Saturday night through the town. Looking into a shop window, we overheard the following conversation: 'Art 'a goin' to Top o' Taown to-morra?' 'Yigh.' 'Who's prachin'? Young Street or th' owd felley?' And this was a quarter of a century ago; and 'th' owd felley's' vigorous still!"

Mr. McGavin Sloan's reminiscences of his seven years at Padiham are full of interest too, and so are Mr. Wicksteed's of his four years, and especially his account of the making of the famous Padiham "potato-pie," for the first party which he and his wife gave.

In this book may also be read an account of the men whom the Padiham congregation has given to the ministry, ten in all, counting James Pollard, John Robinson, and Henry Dean, who ministered to their own congregation, and including William Robinson, Joseph Pollard, Joseph Anderton, and Alfred Lancaster, Alderman Briggs, of Crewe, and the late Revs. Robert Wilkinson and Daniel Berry. And finally there are notes of the other congregations which owe their origin more or less directly to the vigorous life of Padiham.

THE CENTENARY CELEBRATIONS.

The fine new school-buildings, which are the permanent memorial of the Centenary, have been erected at a cost of a little over £1,200, the whole of which was raised before the end of last year, but as Mr. A. Blesard, the treasurer of the building fund, said at the opening, there was a further £60 spent for furnishing and a new boiler, and of this £25 had still to be raised.

The celebration on Saturday, Sept. 8, began with a procession, led by the Burnley Temperance Band, and the banner and officials of the congregation and school. About 650 in all took part in the procession, including the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, the present minister, the Revs. J. H. Wicksteed and E. Allen (former ministers), J. C. Street, J. Anderton, J. M. Whiteman, J. Evans, J. Islan Jones, and H. J. Rossington.

At the door of the schools the proceedings were conducted by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins. After he had offered prayer, Mr. Andrew Wilkinson, the oldest scholar and teacher on the books, presented a gold key to Mr. Wicksteed, who was to open the building.

Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED said that to open the memorial school was a great honour and a great pleasure to him. His sympathies had been with them during the time the schools were being raised, and he was one with them in the splendid effort they had made. Their thoughts went back a hundred years, to the men and women—their ancestors—who had raised money out of their poverty to open a room where they could worship, according to their own highest lights and deepest convictions. Those men and women opened a little room, and as years went by they raised, first the old chapel, and then that beautiful building; and there that day they were opening one more splendid building, which testified to the spirit of those early pioneers—a spirit which was living and working to-day. That spirit which started in their fathers' brave hearts was still alive to-day. When they looked upon the tangible results of their labours, those noble and beautiful buildings, they were reminded that success was not due to their fathers' outward positions, or their wealth, but their inward hearts, their courageous and manly and womanly hearts. They must now look forward to the future, and they must remember that in another hundred years' time those looking back upon them would feel that the Divine Spirit was in them, and that there was something more than outward show, that there was something in their hearts as good as sterling gold. The things that they were rejoicing in now, and that they could look upon with so much pride, were the outward manifestations of inward piety. He hoped that might be a new era of work for the raising of lives on that earth, to make men happier and truer.

Unfortunately, when Mr. Wicksteed essayed to open the door, the golden key broke in the lock, but, nothing daunted, the company found their way by another entrance into the building, and tea was served in time to some 500 people. The accident to the key Mr. Wicksteed turned to good account at the beginning of his speech at the evening meeting.

THE EVENING MEETING.

Mr. T. WRIGHT WADDINGTON presided at the evening meeting, and gave an interesting historical address. Amongst those who sent letters of regret for absence were the Revs. Adam Rushton, H. S. Solly, C. J. Street, J. M. Sloan, and E. T. Russell, former ministers of the congregation.

The Rev. E. ALLEN told of a visit he had paid to the Rev. W. Robinson, who was a native of Padiham, and Mr. H. Helm, of Blackpool, and Mr. Robinson Bertwistle, a veteran of 84, having spoken, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Wicksteed for having opened the school. This was moved by Councillor Jackson and seconded by Mr. Nicholas Ingham.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, in responding, referred to the fact that the golden key with which he was to have opened the door had been broken in the process. The door, he was told, ought to have been first opened by an ordinary key. The golden key might be a fine thing to remember an occasion by, but it was not the right thing to do the work with, and there was something of a moral in that. The work of the world was not to be done by gold; the solid work was still done by iron and steel, and their golden hours and moments were things they should have afterwards for recollection and enjoyment. But always beneath it all was the solid, stern work of the earning of bread and butter. Underlying everything was the stern, hard, manual work of the world. It was not enough to have bread and butter alone; they must have something of that higher life for which bread and butter was useful. Since he was in Padiham there had been a tremendous change; there had been a remarkable general election. The remarkable thing was not that they had had a tremendous Liberal majority, but that there was a unique Labour representation such as they had never had before, and which gave promise of more Labour representation in future. As days advanced they were certain to see the country more and more in the hands of the working classes, and perhaps less and less, or, at all events, less exclusively in the hands of the middle classes. The middle classes had in some ways managed the country fairly well; they had made it a very comfortable place for the middle classes to live in, and it was going to be managed in the future by the working classes. They could not help asking whether they were going to manage it better or worse. He did not doubt that they would manage it better for the working classes, but those who were idealists would not be satisfied with that. What they required was that the country should be managed well for the people who lived in it. There they had what he believed was the only thing that would make this working-class regime a blessed and noble thing. They had religion, without which he believed that movement would be a mere change, and in many ways a change for the worse; many of the beautiful and noble things which had hitherto flourished would be swept away, and though other things would come they would not pay for the things that had been taken away. But religion was never made from the pulpit: it grew in the homes. In that schoolroom they were enlarging their opportunities for working at the root questions which were going to help to mould and make the nation in the future. They were nearer the heart of the problem than such as he, who were removed from the problems which were in their lives. If they could learn in their discussions to talk out face to face the things that mattered most, they would learn and teach more than anyone could do from the pulpit about the real things which moulded the life of the country. Having worked to better the conditions of life, they had done nothing to make the world a better and sweeter place to live in, unless they had induced a higher life, unless they had more love for what was beautiful and true, less dependence on bodily pleasures and indulgences. Unless they had something of the higher life it was nothing for men and women to be able to earn better wages. It was not upon their material comforts, but upon the way they used them that the value of their life depended. He knew not whether there was a God in heaven, he knew not whether there was a heaven in another world, but he did know there was a God in men and women; he knew there was a heaven on this earth for those who were able to reach it, and he believed that there was no life so worthy as the life which strove to live the divine life on earth, and to make it easy for his brothers and sisters to enter the kingdom of heaven which was amongst us, and easier for those who should come after us to make it a broad reality over all the world.

The Rev. J. C. STREET referred to two processions he had taken part in. One was an election procession when he was a boy, and the other was that day's procession. In the first case he shouted for "the flag of freedom," and that day he again felt he was taking part in a procession that meant freedom—freedom in the higher sense. Mr. Street referred humorously to one fact he had been struck with that day, and that was that their old men were so young—in thought and in life—and their young people were so old. But all were full of fire and zeal. They used to think things 100 years old were very decrepit, but instead of their being dead alive at Padiham, they were at the beginning of the century, instead of at the close. The old folk had trained the young ones, and they were full of the same humanness that he saw when he first went there. He was not sure that he knew what Unitarianism was, but he knew what religion and humanity were, and he felt he was standing at the very gateway of greater days than any which the world had yet seen.

Mr. PETER BIBBY spoke as a teacher for over sixty years, and Mr. S. LANCASTER appealed to the young people for devotion and enthusiasm in this generation, and to make the church their home. The Rev. JOSEPH ANDERTON recalled some of the noble memories of the congregation, and spoke of the great evil of drink as standing in the way of their ideals. A hearty vote of thanks was then passed to the architect, Mr. Arthur Dodgeon, who had done the work for nothing, and he responded. Other speakers followed, including the Rev. J. M. WHITEMAN, who referred to the new impulse of missionary zeal, marked by the Unitarian Van, and Mr. J. S. MACKIE, of Burnley, who said that after all the grand things that had been said about Padiham, and all the glowing history that had been given, one would almost think one of the finest things in the world would be to be a native of Padiham, and a member of that church. They might be something a good deal worse, and if he had not the honour and pleasure of upholding the traditions of which they were justly so proud, his children had Padiham Unitarian blood in them. When they considered that 100 years ago there was no Unitarian Church anywhere in this district, and that they had now six, some of which were fairly strong, he thought that Padiham Unitarian Church had every reason to be exceedingly proud of the work that they and their ancestors had done. It was his duty to bring them the congratulations of a church which was not at all ashamed to call itself a daughter church. It was through the Rev. Benjamin Glover speaking in the Market Place, that his father became a Unitarian, for after he had heard him he went home and told his wife that he had heard more sense about religion in a quarter of an hour than ever he heard before. After he had broken with Bethesda Chapel he scarcely ever missed going to the Unitarian Chapel twice every Sunday, and very often superintended the school. In conclusion, Mr. Mackie said he had great pleasure in thanking them, on behalf of the Burnley Church, for what they had done for Burnley, and in hoping that the ties, which used to be exceedingly close, but which had not been so close for some time, would be closer.

A vote of thanks to all who had taken part in the proceedings brought the meeting to a close. The collections that day amounted to £10.

The morning service on Sunday, Sept. 9, was conducted by the Rev. Joseph Anderton, and the afternoon and evening services by the Rev. James C. Street, of Shrewsbury.

To the Burnley Gazette of Sept. 12 we are indebted for our report of the speeches:

A SAN FRANCISCO LETTER.

IN the Walsall Observer of August 25 there appeared a letter written by Miss Una Dean, daughter of the late Rev. Peter Dean, formerly for many years minister at Walsall, to her mother. It gives the most vivid description that we have yet seen of the terrible condition of San Francisco after the earthquake of April 18, and, both on this account and for the writer's sake, many of our readers will be glad to have the passages which we here reprint. Miss Dean had already shown high capacity as a nurse in trying conditions, and notably in Cuba, before she was called upon to face this appalling disaster. A month before, she had undertaken some nursing for the Associated Charities in the "Latin quarter," and had just been appointed one of their regular visitors. The letter is dated from San Francisco, June 18, following an exchange of briefer letters between the daughter and her mother.

Miss Dean tells first of the earthquake itself, the helplessness of the first moments of terror, and the dire confusion into which the city was thrown, and then of the new terror of the encroaching fire. On the morning of June 19 she walked to the office of the Associated Charities, but only to find it so shattered that it was useless remaining there. Thence she went over to the Latin quarter, and found Chinatown in ruins. All this time the fire was steadily gaining ground, and martial law was established in the city. She reached home again utterly exhausted, and an hour later a soldier came to tell them the fire had broken out in the street next to theirs, and they must leave immediately. So they escaped, leaving nearly all their possessions behind, and encamped that night in a playground, and next day had to move on again, and found refuge on a hill-side with some 5,000 others. They had been able to take a scanty supply of food with them, but suffered terribly from the lack of water.

From this point we quote Miss Dean's letter:—To the heart-sick thousands on that hill-side it was a night of horror, and keenest anxiety—horror at the sight of the red monster, rushing along so madly, flinging greedy arms of flame around all before it, roaring with demoniac laughter at the ruin and desolation it left behind. Nearer and nearer it swept, scorching our faces with its hot breath and spitting showers of hot sparks over us, so that we were singed and stung and smarting the whole time. Oh, how frantically we worked to beat out those wicked sparks as they fell on the innumerable bundles of clothing and bedding piled all about us, for I think we all realised that a conflagration in the midst of that overwrought, worn-out, grief-stricken multitude would mean a panic and stampede of the wildest description in which the weakest would be stamped and crushed out of existence, or left to perish miserably in the flames. Then it was that, not knowing what the next hour might bring forth, I scribbled that letter to you, and it will always be a matter of delightful surprise to me that in the midst of such utter confusion it reached its way safely to you. Next day I tramped into the city, hoping to find some of my colleagues, but found a smoking desert, and parts of the city still burning. Military guards patrolled the desolate ruins of what had once been streets, and martial law in its most uncompromising form ruled the city.

Martial law, although apparently harsh, is really beneficent at such a time, when all the most villainous elements of the population were on the alert to maltreat the dying and the dead, and, in short, commit any crime that greed and depravity could suggest. I walked as far as the guards would permit, and saw enough to convince me of the uselessness of attempting to locate anyone. The weather being fairly hot, and walking over heaps of warm debris very fatiguing, I was proportionately grateful when in the unburned district a man invited me to have a drink of water from a well in his back yard. In almost three days I had tasted no liquid but the juice from a can of tomatoes, and my teeth were gritty from inhaling cinder dust. I hadn't even seen soap and water since the night before the earthquake, consequently my face was black with grime, and the light blouse and collar I had perforce worn night and day since then were simply filthy. To crown all, the long chiffon veil which twined artistically round my hat had just been removed by a soldier at the request of a squad of firemen, who said it was just what they wanted for "blindness" to keep the dust out of their eyes while they worked; so you can imagine what a dirty, bedraggled, broken-down object I looked and felt. So when this stranger offered sympathy and a glass of water, it seemed too good to be true, and I was so overcome that I burst into tears—the first I had shed since the disaster. I followed him into his yard and drank all I wanted, and then he brought a towel and soap and water, and I had a good scrub.

Talk about a good Samaritan—that was the real thing! He also informed me that the California Baking Company—a large concern, which had fortunately escaped destruction by either earthquake or fire—had received military instructions to bake bread for free distribution only. So off I went to try to secure a loaf and gladden the hearts of the Bacon family. I found a "bread-line" of refugees extending from the bakery, backward, along seven or eight blocks, and planted myself at the end of it. It lengthened so rapidly that very soon the end had become the middle. Little by little I drew nearer to the bakery until after about an hour I had reached the door, and eagerly awaited the signal to pass in and secure one of those precious loaves; but, alas! a soldier appeared with the announcement that the supply was exhausted and the next batch would be given out three hours later. Oh, how dejected I felt; I nearly cried with disappointment as I turned away and trudged homeward. You see, Wednesday was, by a law akin to the Medes and Persians, baking day in the Bacon household, and, as the earthquake had "battered" on that particular day, we had had no bread since Tuesday night, and now it was Friday afternoon. The terrific heat had made sad havoc of our provisions, so all told I had good reason for dejection as I trudged along the two or three miles that lay between me and the hill-side. However, before I reached camp, I saw a wagon labelled "Oakland Relief," piled up with provisions, on its way to some hastily selected headquarters for food relief. I suppose I must have looked wistfully at the wagon as it passed me, for one of the soldiers in charge leaned out and said to me, "Could you eat a sandwich?" and when I answered "Yes, please," he handed me four, each neatly tied in white paper, while another soldier handed me a paper bag containing oranges. This made me so happy that all the lead went out of my feet, and before long I was in the bosom of the Bacon family, pouring my treasures into the old lady's lap. I needn't tell you that on closer acquaintance with those sandwiches and oranges we voted them the best we ever tasted.

That afternoon the first relief supplies came to camp, and then the tug-of-war began. That period will always remain in my memory as the time when the fleetness of foot which enabled me to reach the head of the food line, and the obstinacy which kept me there, despite more or less jostling, were amongst my most valuable assets. I had nothing to do but keep my eyes open for approaching wagons and water tanks, so when I caught sight of one I would sprint along over bundles and impediments of all kinds, reach the line, receive my dole, race back to the Bacons, and then off again, for I was taking care of a blind musician and two old women whose sprinting days were over. I enjoyed my foraging tremendously. The humorous side was ever present to keep me mirthful, and I was having lots of fun when, on Sunday afternoon, one of "the powers that be" noticed the frequency of my visits to the food-line, and I was haled before the officer in charge, who was very stern, while he questioned me closely as to the location and destination of all the bread and canned stuff I had already annexed. When I explained, he sent a soldier over to the camp to investigate, with the result that I never again had to stand in the bread-line, but was placed under a specially benevolent dispensation, for which in return I undertook to hunt up and report all the helpless cases I could find in camp, so I had quite a delightful time, and the interview which began with the severity of a court-martial ended with the sweetness of a "pink tea."

A few days later I heard that a gathering of the clan of the Associated Charities had taken place in the city for Red Cross work, and that they were trying to locate me; so away I flew, happy in the thought of seeing my colleagues once more, the Bacons meanwhile having arranged with a teamster to convey them fourteen miles into the country, where they own some land on which they can tent for a while. I found the Associated Charities destitute but cheerful, and ready for any kind of work. The fire had destroyed their offices and papers, and the pecuniary losses from the same cause of their principal supporters has left them financially much crippled, so we were told at the outset that our work, pro tem., must be a labour of love, since no money from salaries was procurable for the present at least. This also meant that the salaries for our month's work ending April 20 were relegated to the dim and distant future, and, as mine was supplemented by additional claims for the official telephoning and car fares, which had been a constant drain on my purse, I suppose I had reason to feel the upsettiness of things as acutely as anybody. However, we all took an optimistic view of the matter, and speedily got to work. I was assigned to the clothing relief, and, by way of adding to my own interest and pleasure, and also facilitating the distribution generally, I annexed all the children's and baby clothing I came across, and organised a children's clothing relief department. I enjoyed my work immensely; it was like dressing dolls, only very much nicer. A wealthy San Franciscan offered his house to the charities workers for a month, which solved pro tem. our most pressing problem. The house had been badly shaken by the earthquake, but was still habitable—that is, unless another earthquake should come to finish the work of destruction already begun in the roof and foundation. Our usual number of workers was augmented by a batch of Stanford University students, who rendered very efficient service in the relief work, and camped on the floor of the drawing-room in our temporary home at night. You can well imagine that when we all reached home at night from our various relief stations, and gathered (about twenty of us) around the big dining table to eat our supper of Government rations, and retail the events of the day, we were a very merry party. The fact that, along with the rest of the city, we had to do all our cooking in the street, only added to our hilarity. No light whatever was allowed in the houses or tents except candle light for two hours after sunset. The students proved themselves both able and willing to work, so, although it was a very rough-and-tumble kind of existence, we managed to enjoy ourselves very much. Nobody went out at night, for the streets were too dark and dismal for anything, and the military lines were rigidly kept. Three weeks after the fire some of the ruins were still smouldering, and the red glow from them could be clearly seen at night. Anything more pitiable and depressing than these streets upon streets of desolation, where so recently all was energy and gaiety, cannot be imagined.

After two weeks of clothing distribution, I was sent to take charge of the health of Telegraph Hill until a doctor could afford to look after the sick from purely philanthropic motives, but up to the present nobody has turned up to relieve me, and I'm getting thin over the responsibility. The saving of Telegraph Hill is quite an interesting story. I think I have referred to the hill before. When the fire was raging in the city, Telegraph Hill and its 1,500 inhabitants were forgotten and abandoned to their fate. They had no water or any apparatus for fighting the fire, but, being to a large extent an Italian community, they had on hand a large quantity of "Dago red," the cheap sour wine of their country. In sheer desperation they took their wine in bucketsful and drowned the flames, while the women soaked gunny sacks and blankets, and did their share in beating back the fires. Three times the fire broke out on the Hill, and three times it was drowned in wine, and then the precious fluid was so nearly exhausted that when the fourth time the fire leaped up, the case seemed hopeless, and the people, after their heroic efforts, were faced with the prospect of being surrounded and roasted by those awful flames. Just at this terrible crisis somebody discovered a well underneath a porch—a well whose existence had never even been suspected before, and the water from that well finished saving Telegraph Hill. Talk about the miraculous water that appeared for Hagar and Ishmael in the desert! To my mind it wasn't in it, compared with the heaven-sent well on Telegraph Hill. After the fire was finally extinguished that well was the only available water supply for several days, and probably that was the reason why it soon ran dry. However, it served its purpose while the surrounding district cooled off sufficiently to permit the Hill people to take long tramps, armed with buckets, &c., in search of water. Think of it! From April 18 to May 30, these people had no city water supply of their own, even for flushing purposes, and the sewers were so broken by the earthquake that in one place filth was oozing up through the earth, forming an open cesspool and attracting millions of flies. It was really pathetic to see those people day after day toiling up those 300 feet of steep hill-side with the water they had travelled so far to seek, and the fact that the precious water was so contaminated by the broken sewers all over the city that it was unfit for use only made their hardships worse.

I was installed in an empty schoolroom on the Hill, together with a miscellaneous heap of medical supplies, and, apart from the usual number of contusions, &c., I was kept busy trying to stem the tide of dysentery and stomach trouble and sore throat that overflowed into my dispensary during the first four weeks on the Hill. Fortunately for everybody concerned, the people received me in a very friendly fashion, and at once fell into a habit of running to me at the first onset of pain, and so giving me a chance of averting further trouble. Then, too, my daily preachment from the text, "Boil your drinking water," began to filter through the people's minds by degrees, and up to date, even with such shockingly insanitary conditions, we have only had three typhoids and one diphtheria case, all of which were immediately whisked away to the fever hospital at the other side of the city, where they couldn't be any further menace to the well-being of the Hill. On Decoration Day, May 30, the water supply again returned to the Hill, and twenty-four hours later that hill was one huge washing day. Everything that could be washed or scrubbed (children included) fell a victim to this outburst of cleanliness. Then, too, my repeated complaints to the Board of Health about the condition of the sewers bore fruit, and now we have a brand-new sewer system, which is a daily joy to me. As a consequence of all this, my work is becoming lighter and lighter every day. I haven't seen a sore throat for more than a week past, and dysentery is daily becoming more rare.

One particular feature of my work on the Hill I must not forget to mention. This whole district, comprising Italians, Porto Ricans, Mexicans, Spanish, Irish, &c., is wholly Roman Catholic, and the priests belonging to the various churches, together with six nuns, took charge of the Red Cross clothing and food relief stations on the Hill from the first, and have managed them so methodically and well that these stations have been the admiration and ideal of every other station throughout the city. When, in response to their request for medical help, I was sent up on the Hill, they received me with the utmost cordiality. They, of course, inquired as to whether or not I was a Catholic, but when I told them I was a Unitarian they simply set out to show me by their practical kindness and goodwill that our theological differences didn't matter at all. The nuns were relieved from conventual rules during their sojourn on the hill, and they are just as jolly as a bunch of school girls. Sometimes the priest and I have afternoon tea with them, and we have lots of fun together. Altogether the situation is delightfully piquant. Meanwhile San Francisco is recovering from the stunning blow of April 18; but so far from being altogether restored by the end of five years, as your English papers tell you, we who are on the ground know that this will be a wooden city for many years to come.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from A. S. C., J. H. C., E. G., F. A. H., H. W. H., W. H., E. M., R. J. O., M. P.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE AND OTHERS.

SIR,—I trust you will permit me to make a brief reply to Mr. Gow. He agrees with Mr. Fripp that my letter was impertinent, and is apparently pained that Mr. Jones should share with me the view that Manchester College is in any sense a public institution. It is with the first point that I am concerned. Mr. Gow says:—

(1) That such a letter will do no good. Well, I wrote it in protest against an action which I think will do no good to the College, the churches, or anyone concerned, and with the hope that indirectly it might serve what I conceived to be the useful end of suggesting to the College authorities that under certain influences they had made a mistake which it might be hoped they will not repeat, when at the end of a year the appointment comes up for re-consideration. In Mr. Gow's judgment I have acted like a mischievous boy, who has seized an opportunity of sticking pins into Dr. Hunter, in order to enjoy his suffering. Mr. Gow would never use a pin on anyone, except, at the worst, to fasten the flower of sympathetic difference in his coat. To my mind it is futile to criticise a public appointment, except on definitely stated grounds of what appear to be the critic the disqualifications of the person selected. The question is unescapably a personal one. That being said, I wonder if I shall be believed if I add that I have not the slightest personal animus against Dr. Hunter? I laugh, indeed, at the estimate which some others form of him. I wince at the apparent attempt to grab him as a great man who is outside our circle in order to remedy home deficiencies. But I am not incapable of joining with Mr. Fripp and Mr. Gow in gratitude for whatever fine religious work Dr. Hunter is doing in his own individual way. I only say that that way makes him an ineffective person for the peculiar kind of service to which the College has called him.

(2) The columns of THE INQUIRER are not the place for such a letter. I ought to have drawn up a document to which I should have obtained the signatures of those who agreed with me, and then have gone through the solemn farce of submitting it to the Committee. On the contrary, I submit that Mr. Jones is right when he says that such an appointment "is matter for proper comment or criticism, approval or disapproval in the columns of a newspaper, especially of a religious newspaper," and makes a proper appeal when he begs you "to keep them open to the criticism and discussion of the ways and means of our Colleges."

(3) In any case, Mr. Gow says that I am not the man to have expressed such criticism, because I have little experience, am lacking in ability, and am not in close contact with the College. I am ready to concede that my years are not as the years of Mr. Gow, that they compare ill with his in intensity of experience, and that beside him I am an ignorant, foolish, and negligible person. But is the plain man not in our ranks of freedom to have or express a view of his own? Are we lesser men to be simply humbly deferential to the illuminated few? For one, so long as I can kick and scream, I shall be found in expressive opposition. And as to close contact with the College, I should dearly like to know wherein Manchester College presents radically different problems from other theological colleges, and in particular wherein its homiletical requirements are unique. For, in spite of my general disqualifications to express a reasonable view on matters of Unitarian public interest, I really have been to college and had opportunities of observing at close quarters the methods of homiletical instruction. Indeed, I have some views which I sometimes feel I should like to express, based on my personal experience. But probably a mischievous fool's best chance of a peaceable life is to keep silent.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Colne.—A special service in memory of the late Rev. Thomas Leyland, a former minister of this church, was held on Sunday evening, Sept. 9, conducted by Mr. J. B. French, one of Mr. Leyland's old scholars. The preacher was Mr. J. W. Hird, who said in the course of his address: "To know Thomas Leyland was to love him. His glorious optimism, his simple goodness, his firm devotion to duty, and, above all, his loyalty to principle, made him, at all times, the most reliable and helpful of friends. We who knew him so intimately cannot but mourn his passing hence, but when we think of his life, so purposefully high, so noble, so helpful, as it was, we feel constrained to say from our hearts, 'Thank God for this precious gift, and especially for our association with it.' It is personal heart and soul work by which the rough places will be made plain and the crooked ways straight, and the lives of men be drawn to the strong, kind righteousness which he so strongly displayed. . . . My recollections of Thomas Leyland date back to my boyhood days. I vividly remember the impression which his noble presence made upon me as a boy. I was unknown to him then, but I was always impressed with the thought that 'there is a good man if ever there was one.' In those days I thought it a heinous thing for a man to call himself a Unitarian. I had been nurtured in the erroneous belief that Unitarianism was a kind of Atheism. Never did I think then that the time would come when I should have this man as one of my best and most precious friends, or that I should come to regard, as I do regard, Unitarianism to be the very essence of Christianity, and of all true religion. Let us see to it that all the influences we exert, directly and indirectly, be pure and holy and health-giving; that after our bodies are laid in the grave we spiritually may live on in the lives and aspirations of those who come after us."

Dundee.—Re-opening services in connection with the extensive repairs required to the Unitarian Christian Church were conducted on the 16th inst. by Principal Gordon, of Manchester. The interior of the church has been cleaned and repainted. The organ has also been improved. Principal Gordon's services were extremely helpful and sympathetic. He also addressed the Sunday-school. An appeal is to be made to friends for assistance to complete the necessary repairs. About £40 having been raised by the congregation, another £100 will be required.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FOLLOWING the sermon in last week's INQUIRER by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong on "The Beauty in Nature," preached in Liverpool after a summer holiday, we hope next week to publish another sermon of his on "Östensö Church," also preached in Liverpool after a visit to Norway:

THE Secretary of the Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern Counties writes to say that subscribers, as well as ministers and delegates, are entitled to the benefit of the cheap return railway fare, 5s. 3d., from VICTORIA STATION to Lewes (see advertisement), and that, on production of their luncheon card, tickets will be issued to them at that price by the booking clerk.

WE are glad to publish this week the "Address to the Churches," which has been issued by the committee of the National Conference Union for Social Service. It has been sent, we understand, to all the Ministers, Secretaries, and School Superintendents of churches on the roll of the Assembly. The objects of the Union, it will be remembered, are, "careful study of the social problems of modern civilisation," and "the undertaking of definite practical work towards their solution." Membership is open "to any member of, or attendant at any church on the roll of the Conference, signifying sympathy with the objects of the Union," and paying a minimum subscription of 1s. The object of the present address, it will be seen, is to invite further co-operation on the part of members of the churches.

THE opening of the new Unitarian church at Aberdeen was celebrated most auspiciously, as will be seen from the report in another column, at the beginning of the week which has seen a greater festival in the city in celebration of the 400th anniversary of the founding of the University. This has been signalled by a Royal visit, and the opening by the King on Thursday of the splendid new University buildings. The celebration began on Tuesday with a commemoration service in the University Chapel of King's College, which opened with the singing of the Old Hundredth and prayer by Professor Nicol. The first lesson was read by Principal Iverach, of the United Free Church College, the second (1 Cor. xiii.) by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The sermon was preached by Professor Cowen, Dean of the Faculty of Divinity.

AMONG those upon whom honorary degrees were conferred on Wednesday, in connection with the four hundredth anniversary celebrations, was Professor Bonet-Maury, of Paris, who, together with the Archbishop of Canterbury, Professor Driver, the Bishop of Ripon, and many others, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Among the honorary LL.D.'s were Count Goblet d'Alviella, of Brussels, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Sir Henry Roscoe. At the Chancellor's reception on Tuesday afternoon the Papal Bull authorising the formation of the University 400 years ago was exhibited. At this reception Principal Carpenter represented Manchester College Oxford.

THE Edict of the Imperial Government of China, issued on Sept. 20, strongly condemning the opium vice and ordering the abolition of the use of opium, both foreign and native, within ten years, has been thankfully welcomed by those who have felt the shame of Great Britain in its Indian opium traffic, and the wars waged with China for its maintenance. It is hoped that now something effectual may be done, following on the declaration of Mr. John Morley, Secretary of State for India, in the House of Commons, on May 30, to the effect that if China wanted seriously and in good faith to restrict the consumption of opium in China, the Government would not close the door.

IN this connection the Rev. W. Stoddart, of Boston, writes to remind us that in April, 1881, when Mr. Pease moved his resolutions in the House of Commons, condemning the opium traffic, a movement in support of that protest was organised by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, who wrote some powerful articles on the subject in these columns, and, as a result, 175 of our ministers preached on the subject on or about the Sunday agreed upon (April 10). Mr. Stoddart urges that now again is a time when our ministers ought to speak out, to help in the formation of a sound public opinion on this subject. "Could we not," he writes, "have a special Sunday set apart for the preaching of sermons on this topic? There is greater force in united effort. There is not only a question of our international duty to China, but there is also the question of the effect of this trade upon India, where thousands of acres that might be devoted to producing corn and cotton are given up to the poppy. There is also the encouragement given by the Government to this cultivation of the poppy, and, worst of all, the means afforded for the use of opium and the consequent degradation of the natives of India. The introduction of Government-licensed opium-smoking dens into Burmah by the British was a scandal which was denounced by Government officials." Mr. Stoddart suggests that the National Conferences Union for Social Service might move in the matter. We may remind our readers that the best authority on the whole subject is now Mr. Joshua Rowntree's book (published by Methuen last year, 5s. net.), "The Imperial Drug Trade. A Re-statement of the Opium Question, in the light of recent evidence and new developments in the East." See also what is said on the subject in Morley's "Life of Gladstone."

LORD ELGIN has had occasion to remind the Roman Catholic Bishop of Malta of the principle of religious equality, which it is the aim of British rule everywhere to maintain. The Archbishop having objected to the holding of a Protestant mission in Malta, Lord Elgin wrote to the Governor, on Aug. 15:—"The only basis which His Majesty's Government can admit for the settlement of the question is that all denominations should be treated with perfect equality. They are not aware of any pledges given by their predecessors, or of any circumstances peculiar to Malta, which preclude them from proceeding on that basis, or would justify them in denying to one religious body privileges granted to another. There is, fortunately, but one respect in which the existing conditions need alteration in order to carry out the principle of perfect equality and mutual toleration between different religions. The only practical restriction upon the religious ceremonies of other denominations than the Roman Catholic Church is that they are not permitted to take place in public. Whatever may have been the grounds on which it was originally imposed, such a restriction is plainly inconsistent with the principle which His Majesty's Government desire to see followed, and you will accordingly raise no objection in future to the holding in public of the religious ceremonies of any denominations, provided, of course, that they are bonâ fide religious ceremonies, and not in the nature of demonstrations intended to give offence."

THE Rev. J. R. Campbell, of the City Temple, holds, among other offices at the present time, that of president of the London Board of Congregational Ministers, and his presidential address on the change in theological sanctions is giving occasion to much vigorous controversy. He has given piquant expression to views which many, indeed, of his brethren share with him, but which are not usually stated quite so indiscreetly, and we are not surprised to learn that the Board is to hold an extra meeting for discussion of the address. Meanwhile, Mr. Campbell has supplied the Christian World with a précis of the positions he has laid down. The general treatment of the old Evangelical Biblical doctrines may be gathered from such a remark as this: "The Fall is in a literal sense untrue." His treatment, again, of that central feature of orthodox Christian teaching which is concerned with sin is marked by a wide departure from the generally proclaimed faith: "Sin is assumed in popular theology to be not only individual disobedience to God, but an inherited taint of nature and defect of will which render such disobedience inevitable. We are to be held blameworthy, and yet cannot help ourselves. This is a false view. Sin is simply selfishness. It is that which makes against the lifewardness of the race." Such a view might command the assent of Dr. Stanton Coit, and seems to indicate a preference for the sonological over the theological point of view. Or take this on the person of Jesus: "What popular theology says of Jesus is true of the ideal humanity which is ever in the bosom of the Father. Jesus was and is divine, but so are we. His mission was to make us realise our divinity, that is, our oneness with God." Our readers will recognise in these quotations the pith of many sermons they are accustomed to hear. It is a welcome sign of progress to find them thus enunciated by one of the most prominent of Congregational ministers.

The annual meeting of the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt," is to be held on Wednesday and Thursday, October 3 and 4, at Potsdam, in the Hotel "Stadt Königsberg." On Wednesday afternoon at 4, Professor Herrman, of Marburg, is to give an address on "Our Task," after which Professor Baumgarten, of Kiel, and Pastor Schian, of Breslau, will introduce a discussion on "The limits of freedom in teaching," to be continued on Thursday morning. The proceedings are of a confidential character, but any friends of liberal religion in the neighbourhood of Berlin, who could attend, are assured of a welcome.

At our Association meetings last Whitsuntide, the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt" were represented by Pastor Hackmann, of the German Church at Denmark Hill, who afterwards sent some interesting impressions of the meetings to the Christliche Welt, the weekly paper edited by Professor Rade, of Marburg. Mr. Hackmann wrote with admiration of the organisation of the meetings. To a later number of the Christliche Welt (August 9), the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, contributed a most interesting article on "How can we help towards bringing the Christians of Germany and England nearer together." She spoke first of the movements of liberal theology in this country, and of what it has gained from German theologians, and then described the various bodies of Nonconformists, and particularly the position of the Unitarians, and the vitality of their religious life.

IN concluding her article, Miss von Petzold notes how the people of each country may usefully learn from the other, and in particular says:—

"In Germany the Church is struggling with the turning question, how the great mass of the people may be kept as Christians. In England the question has been in part successfully answered by Nonconformity.

"In Germany many minds are occupied with the problem, how the new critical theology may be combined with religion, i.e., with simple piety; English Unitarianism has already given a practical answer to that question.

"In Germany the Lutheran Church is in danger of dissolving into religious individualism; the English Free Churches, on the contrary, are entering more and more upon the social and political field, as leaders and liberators."

The object of such comparisons, says Miss von Petzold, is not to decide how far German theology is superior to English, or how far English Churchmanship is in advance of German, but simply to show how the two peoples may be drawn nearer together in the great field of religion.

THE Sunday School Association has issued a pleasant memorial of the fifth summer session for Sunday-school teachers, held at Manchester College, Oxford, June 29 to July 7 this year, in the form of a "Reminiscence," by Miss Marian Pritchard, to which is added a diary of the full week, and a list of the lectures and the close upon a hundred students who took part in the session. Thus Miss Pritchard begins her "Reminiscence":—"The Session is over; the happy 'nine days' wonder' at Oxford, enjoyed by nearly a hundred of our teachers, from some forty-three centres of our British Isles, is past. And done with? Oh dear, no; not done with; only just 'begun with.' Day by day the Magic Memory Painter sketched and painted; so that at the close of the session each of us has been able to bring back a large portfolio of beautiful pictures, carefully packed up in a convenient corner of our brain-box, ready to be taken out and enjoyed whenever we feel that need of a little refreshment of soul and spirit. And the Seed Sower was hard at work, too; not scattering the seeds so thickly as to make it impossible for them to germinate and grow, nor confining his operations to seeds of one kind only. Now we have returned; the seed-time is over; but the time of the harvest is not yet." Then she goes on to tell of the various lectures and the closing meetings, and concludes as follows:—"It is comparatively easy to speak of the lectures, to tell of the Council meetings, and of the gathering of the Mission children at Manchester College on the Sunday afternoon, while the Seed Sower was openly at work. But for the rest; who can describe the sowing of the seeds of joy, of happy comradeship, of gladness and enthusiasm which gave the charm, the finishing touch to the whole. The magic glass of imagination must be called forth for that! Look through it at the College grounds, at the houses of our Oxford friends 'At Home'; on the river, on the grounds around Nuneham and Oxford, at our social gatherings, and in the corridors of Manchester College between the lectures; and you will see myriads of wonderfully beautiful seeds flying about, which will justify our hope and faith in the harvest which is to be."

THERE are many surprising things told in the newspapers concerning our churches about which those who are supposed to know are quite ignorant. In the St. James's Gazette of some few evenings ago, the following paragraph appeared:—"Mr. Chamberlain's Greek Testament.—Mr. Chamberlain still goes to the same church at Birmingham which he attended in the days when he took a Sunday-school class. It is known as the Church of the Messiah. He has a Greek Testament in his pew, which he uses when the lessons are read." Perhaps the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, or his church secretary, will make a search for this Greek Testament in the pew which bears the name of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. It would prove an interesting "find."

AT a meeting of the Consultative Council of the United Kingdom Alliance, held in Manchester last week, it was unanimously decided to recommend Mr. Leif Jones, M.P. for North Westmoreland, to the Annual General Council meeting, in October, to succeed the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., as president of the organisation for the ensuing year. Mr. Leif Jones has been an active member of the Council for many years, a vice-president, and a member of its executive committee. He was born in London in 1862, and is the son of the late Rev. Thomas Jones, one of the poet-preachers of Wales, who was chairman of the Congregational Union in 1870-71. He was educated at the Scotch College, Melbourne, and at Trinity College, Oxford, where he took first class mathematical honours 1885. In the recent debate on his Local Option resolution in the present House of Commons he carried the motion with a majority of 227 votes.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

SOME of the most delightful biographies in existence hardly exceed the modest dimensions of an essay. How shrunk and diminutive do the Apology and the Memorabilia appear by the side of the giant volumes in which we celebrate departed greatness. We may hesitate to use the brief records of the world's most sacred life for the sake merely of a comparison; but, not to stray beyond the secular domain, is not Isaak Walton all the evidence we need of the supreme worth of the biographical essay? Some men have long biographies written about them because they are not great enough for brevity. It is impossible for them to make any impression except in bulk, by adding day to day and year to year, and they are fortunate if posterity ever disturbs the dust on the portly record of their lives. There are no more pathetic tenants of a library than the dead biographies. How many have perished that Boswell and Lockhart might survive!

But the mention of Boswell and Lockhart is a warning against the fallacy of comparison between things which are not, as the philosophers would say, in parimateria. The artist of the large canvas has his own laws of arrangement and technique, though nothing can compensate him for a poor subject; and the miniature painter, unabashed by more ambitious designs, must honour the limits of his own delicate and exquisite art. I confess, however, to some personal preference for the biographical essay in comparison with the fashionable long biography. The limits of space impose a salutary discipline upon the writer. They compel him to realise clearly the few significant features which he wishes to impress upon the mind of the reader, and to sift and select his material with a nicety of discrimination, which a more sprawling method of writing seems often to discourage. This reticence, so closely akin to good manners, this instinct for omission, which Stevenson classed among the essential qualities of great writing, help to confer upon the best work of this kind the excellence of a strongly-etched portrait.

Fortunately this art of writing in little has not died out, and we have many contemporary examples of its charm. I have been reading lately the memoir of W. T. Arnold prefixed to his "Studies of Roman Imperialism." It is a sketch which gains in impressiveness, because the writers have not tried to exhaust their subject. They appear to realise that even a posthumous friendship depends less upon knowledge than upon sympathy and imagination. Mrs. Humphry Ward has written in simple and affectionate terms of her brother and his work, and has added one more to the growing gallery of Arnold portraits. Mr. Montague, one of Arnold's chief friends and colleagues on the staff of the Manchester Guardian, has described his career as scholar and journalist, in pages which reveal him to be not only a kindred spirit, but also a writer possessed of strong analytic power and a happy prose style.

Mrs. Ward speaks of her brother as one of the "hidden lives" of England. His influence was felt widely and strongly through the great newspaper which he served;

but beyond a narrow circle his name was hardly known. He was one of the strong men, who are content to efface themselves because they believe that it contributes to the effectiveness of their work. William Thomas Arnold was a grandson of Arnold, of Rugby, being the second child of Thomas Arnold, whose curious spiritual career is described by his own pen in "Passages from a Wandering Life." He was born at Hobart, Tasmania, in 1852, but his father's conversion to Roman Catholicism soon caused a return to England, and it was among English scenes that his character was formed. Mrs. Ward gives us glimpses of him as a child on the Kingstown sands and amid the delightful haunts of Fox How. At ten he was sent to the Oratory School in Birmingham, of which John Henry Newman was the head. Then Thomas Arnold broke off his connection with the Roman Catholic Church, and the boy passed naturally to Rugby and Oxford. Like many other brilliant men he read omnivorously, and failed to get his first class in 1876; but he fully retrieved his position as a scholar three years later with the brilliant prize essay on "Roman Provincial Administration." Meanwhile he had married a granddaughter of Archbishop Whately, and in the year 1879 he left Oxford and joined the staff of the Manchester Guardian. Thenceforward his life was identified closely with his paper and the district which it served.

"From the beginning," Mrs. Ward writes, "he made Manchester interests his own. The vast machinery of Manchester trade and manufacture, its economic bearings, and its human implications; Manchester art and music; or the plays given at Manchester theatres; the neighbouring country, its moors and streams, and woods on which the mills encroached year by year; Lancashire dialect and Lancashire poets; Lancashire birds and flowers, the growth of Owens College, the development of an Art Gallery, the preservation of local traditions; to all these matters, great and small, he gave his eager mind, almost from the first." Nor are the claims of exact scholarship forgotten. We find him pressing continually with insatiable curiosity into fresh realms of intellectual interest, while his early enthusiasm for English poetry and Roman history is fresh and keen to the end. It is hardly a matter for surprise that this crowded life led to an early breakdown. When he was forty-five his work was done. The last years were a long fight with agonising pain borne with indomitable courage. Mrs. Ward's closing pages are a beautiful record of spiritual victory. He made new friends; he read new books; he planned new schemes of work; he never lowered the flag, or abandoned his high loyalty to "man's unconquerable mind," till he died worn out, but undefeated, on May 29, 1904.

I have spoken already of the excellent qualities of Mr. Montague's share in this biographical sketch. It is a fine tribute of friendship, and it is something more. It is a portrait of the ideal journalist that he has given us, as he saw it realised in the face of his friend; and in giving us this portrait he has analysed for us the moral and intellectual qualities of which it is composed. It is a very vital piece of writing, clearly perceived and strongly felt. Arnold believed intensely that a journalist should keep both his soul and his brains. His vocation is not to follow public opinion but to mould it. But if he is to do this he must win the right to believe, and this can only be done by severe training. "He must feel," to use Mr. Montague's words, "that to tell the truth is not a matter of will only, but of skill and pains. Having often to make up his mind swiftly on points of evidence, he must find a mental discipline to train in him some special faculties that are more easily kept strong and supply by the daily work of a scholar or a judge. Since he may have to write on many subjects and cannot be an expert upon them all, he must make himself a first-rate expert upon one, that he may keep unblurred his sense of what knowledge means, and that to themes to which he cannot bring an expert's knowledge, he may bring at least an expert's method—his sense of relative values in evidence; his caution, and also his reach, in generalising; his adhesiveness to the point; his enjoyment of accuracy as accuracy." It was just here that the morning hours devoted to Roman history stood Arnold in such good stead. He never lost, in all the excitement of popular writing, the fine and supple intelligence of the scholar. But, Mr. Montague continues, the true journalist requires something else as well in order to fit him for his work, namely wide curiosity. "Nothing should strike him as unclean or common that preoccupies many normal persons; rather he should have a touch of the child's or artist's tickled sense of fact, simply as fact." This curiosity Arnold possessed in rich measure, and with it the quick and versatile sympathy which it implies, and the instinct for new discoveries and fresh points of view, which are destined soon to occupy the popular mind. "Sometimes," his biographer tells us, "a fresh subject, large or slight, would draw him, and the same sweeping, small-meshed net would be cast in the new waters. Some years before the bicycle had become first a fashionable plaything, and then a general utensil, Arnold's attention was piqued by its possible uses; a friend would find him on Saturday morning scouring with swift minuteness the whole week's output of cycling periodicals from Western Europe, lest a fact or idea worth having should go to waste." Endowed with this rare combination of qualities, Arnold was never gruelled for matter. He had always something to say, and he knew how to say it. We have an attractive picture of him as he sat at his work surrounded by some 378 spacious pigeon-holes, in which his mass of cuttings and references was kept duly classified and ready for instant use. "The full strength of the method," Mr. Montague writes out of the fulness of his close personal knowledge, "was only seen in conflict with that old enemy of the journalist, the new theme sprung upon him by the wire late upon some night when miners have been rioting under the Equator or fishermen fighting for bait on the shore of Newfoundland. The challenge found Arnold's forces only waiting for mobilisation; he had good guns in action, while others would still be looking for stones."

I must content myself with one other reference, but it is to an aspect of this fascinating subject which is rich in critical suggestiveness. As a writer Arnold had two literary styles. He could write with all the slow and balanced caution of the scholar, and he could write with the rapid, eager flow of popular speech. The one method he consecrated to Roman history; the other he employed as a journalist. And he was prepared to defend the difference not merely as justifiable, but also as necessary and fitting, if the writing was to reach its aim. "He traced a relation," says Mr. Montague, "between the pace at which a thing is read and that at which it should be written; to a rapid scanning of a newspaper leader or criticism on the way to town, the right correlative, in his view, was a mode of writing that conformed more closely to the quick, broken flow of forcible speech than political or critical writing commonly does; and one of the means by which he thought that this sympathetic relation between reader and writer might be attained was an extreme rapidity in writing; that those who run might read, it was best to write running." The critical truth underlying this passage is the necessity of accommodation, and it applies not only to everything which is written for rapid reading, but in an equal degree to everything which is written in order to be spoken. Nothing that cannot be grasped easily, because it is either too allusive in style or too close in texture, is suitable for the swift flow of the spoken word. The impression must be made at the moment, or it is not made at all. Many sermons and speeches miss fire for this reason, not because they have literary style, but because they have not the right kind of literary style for their purpose.

As I place this beautiful essay in biography in its niche there is one criticism which I wish to deprecate, for it betrays a singular lack of perception of the standards by which a life like that of W. T. Arnold is to be judged. It has been suggested that it is a record of failure, of great promise and vast stores of learning which never reached their aim. Cui bono? men cry, if all that is left to posterity is this fragment of biography and this unfinished history? Even Mr. Montague in one passage seems to feel the pathos of it. "To work twenty years in a mine and send up nothing marketable, and then be brought up dead—to many minds this is the very type of futility. What ailed him, to waste the sun while he had it? . . . As a historian Arnold lost. Dying at fifty-two, disabled at forty-four, unable during his twenty working years to give to history more than the leisure of an exhausting profession, he published very little, and scarcely any part of his main design had been carried, when he died, to the point at which he would have wished a work of his to be judged." But what then? It was just the exhausting profession which was his life. It was in that that he gave himself to the world, and left his personal impress upon his time. Mrs. Ward dwells tenderly upon his delight in moderation and excellent seriousness, and they are qualities which gave distinction to everything he did; but in nothing was he more excellent than in the courage and pride with which he accepted the conditions of his calling. He remained unknown except to his private friends for the sake of his work. He bore himself to his paper, we are told, "as a Jesuit to the Order." His only care was to get things done, and he realised that it is the beatitude of much of the highest influence to be anonymous, and therefore to be undistracted by personal ambitions and unspoilt by praise.

A NEW "CHRIST" POEM.*

SEVENTEEN years ago the Rev. H. W. Hawkes published his poem, "The Man of Nazareth," in which he told, in simple blank verse, the story of the life of Jesus, "a true life," as he conceived it after reverent study of the Gospels in the light of modern critical scholarship. Mr. Hawkes had then recently concluded his sixteen years of service as minister of the North End Mission in Liverpool, and his poem was full of the spirit of earnest discipleship. The story was told by one who had faced the realities of life in a great city under the most trying conditions, and had fully tested the power of Christian faith and love. And now, with the added experience of his work in connection with the Unitarian Mission in Japan and the years of his later ministry, he has returned to the subject in a new poem, "The Coming of Christ," which he describes as a subjective counterpart to "The Man of Nazareth." It is "a reverent attempt to trace, from Nazareth to Cæsarea Philippi, the growth in the mind of Jesus of the ideal of a Spiritual Messiahship and of the Kingdom of God within."

The new poem is shorter than the other, being considerably less than a thousand lines in length, but it attempts a much more difficult thing. We wish we could say that it seems to us a success. Blank verse was the author's own chosen vehicle of expression, and we gladly listened to him as he told the story of the Master's life. And so we should have done, if, from his own point of view of discipleship, he had simply described the growth of the mind of Jesus and the greatest moments of his inward spiritual experience. But when in the same kind of verse Jesus is represented as himself relating the inward history in dramatic monologue, and at times addressing God directly in prayer, we confess that the experiment appears to us too bold. Too often the speaker moralises like an exemplary modern preacher, as at the opening of the poem, on the dignity of labour, or in this later passage in the section on "The Preacher of Glad Tidings," in which Jesus is represented in meditation alone on a mountain:—

"There is a wisdom higher than I know;
A well of love far deeper than my heart;

* "The Coming of the Christ," by H. W. Hawkes. (To be had at the Book Room, Essex Hall, the Liverpool Booksellers' Co., Lord-street, Liverpool, or of the Author, Waterloo, Liverpool. Price 4d., by post 5d.)

A power in which my weakness hides itself;
So that I speak not teachings of mine own
But am beyond all telling as a Son
Who voices what the Father bids him say!
Yet am I no blind instrument of fate,
No pipe on which another fingers tunes,
But in some mystic fashion I myself Feel so entwined with the Eternal Will
That I will with my God, yet if I would Might set my will 'gainst his, and so defy
The promptings of His grace.

Here is the choice
That makes or mars the very springs of life!
He who would save himself, be his own law,
Choose his own path, and stand in pride
alone,
Loses the very pith of life. He casts away
His dower of love and wisdom from on high,
And eats the husks and drinks the dregs of
earth.
But lose the self in God: forego the pride,
The wilfulness, the lust and earthly greed
Which strew the path with stumbling-blocks and briars;
Throw wide the gates of life to welcome in
The thronging angels of the heavenly grace,
And straight a higher self is born: a self
That images the very Self of God,
And is a thing divine beyond all words!
This too I have from God! I could not know
My higher self did He not speak within
And knit my soul to His!

Oh! Holy One!
My Father! Lord of heaven and earth! in thee
I find all strength, all happiness, all power!
I thank and bless thee for the daily grace
Which sends me forth to minister to men
And be their servant: for the yearning love
Which sees beneath the surface of their sins
The heart of purity not wholly dead!
It is such joy to mark on hopeless brows
The dawn of faith, the calm of settled trust!
In thy blest name I bid their carking ills Depart and leave them healed in mind and soul,
And lo! they go rejoicing to their homes!
Yet some there are, my God, whose hardened hearts
Respond not when I speak the word of love
And in a sinful man a brother see!
They murmur that I mingle with the fallen,
The outcast, and polluted as with friends!
Yet thou dost bear with them, and why not I?

Thou sendest sun and rain on all alike
Yet hatest sin and lovest righteousness!
Should we not do the same, and to the sick
Be wise physicians? Father! as I strive
To do as thou art doing day after day,
Give me the grace to bear with froward wills
And love the sinner while I hate the sin!"

We are challenged by the form of the poem to realise that it is Jesus himself who is here speaking, but we find it impossible to do so. At the same time, if one can accept the manner of presentment, and forget the repeated suggestions of an unwholesome self-consciousness in this kind of monologue, there are passages of real interest in the poem, as interpretations of the Gospel story and the experience of the Master. This is especially the case with the account of the temptations in the wilderness, which come after Jesus has realised in an ecstasy at his baptism the divine calling of his life as a son of God. Then, at the end, with the declaration of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi, comes the further conviction that he is actually called himself to be the Messiah of his people. We doubt, however, whether in the actual experience of Jesus, either at the baptism, or at that later point, where he was possessed of the conviction of his own Messiahship, it would have come in the kind of sudden ecstasy which Mr. Hawkes represents.

The poem concludes with a foreshadowing by Jesus of what the Messiahship must mean for him, and we will make a further quotation, that our readers may have ample opportunity of judging for themselves of the quality of the work.

"'Tis mine to show

A kingship higher than the world has seen,
Whose royal mantle is humility,
Whose sceptre is the healing touch of grace,
Whose crown the beaten gold of souls redeemed

And purified in fires of penitence.

My thrones shall be the hearts of living men

Glowing with lofty zeal for all things good;
And for my armies I will summon forth
A myriad helpful hands and steadfast wills
Which shall make war on all the miseries
And sins and follies that afflict the earth.
But not at once the victory shall be won.
Deep-rooted ills will rise in hot revolt,
And age-long crimes resist the voice of love!

Yet in the far-off end, in God's good time,
The kingdom comes and God is justified.

Oh, Holy Father! I can never speak
My thanks, my praises for this wondrous boon!

Thou chooshest me from out the sons of men

To be thy messenger: Thou fillest me
With mighty thoughts and love ineffable
And givest visions of serenest joy.

Yea! I will be Messiah! I will be Thy holy Servant, doing thy blest will.
Upheld by thee I will proclaim thy grace
And toil and suffer all things to redeem
My brethren from their sin and misery.

I shall be scorned, reviled, perchance be slain

Because I strive to be a Prince of Peace!
All this lies clear before me, yet the joy
Thou puttest in my heart outweighs the loss,

And having thee, my Father, I have all
That I desire! The rest I leave with thee;
Life, death, success or failure, weal or woe!
Thou art my Father, and I am thy son!
What more of good can endless ages give!"

THE Newmarch Lectures at University College, London, during the coming term are to be on the "History of Statistics and the Nature and Aims of Modern Statistical Methods," by Mr. G. U. Yule. There will be six lectures, the first of which is to be given on Wednesday, October 10, at 5.30. The course is open to the public, without payment or ticket.

ON THE HILL TOP.

FOR countless ages has this been one of Britain's natural "conning towers." The sides of the hill still show the deep trenches for defence, constructed with infinite labour by primæval men, and all around lies England—north, south, east (beyond Shakespeare's Stratford), and westward to the fastnesses of Wales. The morning sun is veiled in slow-moving clouds. Shafts of glory pierce the far Severn country and the long line of the Cotswolds, and gleam here and there, amid the vast expanse, on amber cornfields, mead and woodland, castle and cottage, gracious, beneficent, all-embracing, obliterating all boundaries, repeating the great assertion that "the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein."

The remembrance of another glorious prospect renews itself in me—the Umbrian Plain from Perugia. Contrasts seem more vivid than resemblances. This is far more extensive and all surrounding: the earth's natural giving is kinder, more bountiful, more respected. Hers are these meadows and moorlands, these green woods, these wide-armed trees that stud the landscape: hers the herds and flocks and singing birds. Nature here is more in evidence than the labour and toil of man:

"It is the land that freemen till;
A land of settled government."

Far away are the fierce days of contest: the life of terror for women, the uncertainty about to-morrow, the narrow limits of sympathy and affection, the widespread enmity, hatred, and desire to hurt and hinder. Now, from sea to sea, there is peace. There is only "natural sorrow, loss, and pain." The thoughts of many are bent on the solution of social problems, the healing of social sores, the doing away with injustice, the amending of evils bequeathed to us by the past. The feeling of responsibility for riches is more acute than ever before in the long history of mankind, the desire to share advantages animates those who possess them as well as those who have them not; model villages and garden cities promise a better time, when Nature and Beauty shall be recognised as part of the bread of life; class barriers, and, with them, servility and arrogance, are fast yielding before education and more equal opportunity. What increase of blessedness may be looked for in the land we love! England "at the summit of her greatness!" Nay, there is yet more light and truth to break forth for those who seek for them, and the heart of England is essentially the heart of a seeker.

All before us lies the day,
Night and darkness are behind.

Innumerable are the roads and lanes and field paths that wind about upon this map on which I gaze. They are all lines of peace, lines of communication and union, of friendliness and service. Tramp of armies, the stealthy tread of scout and spy, are among the far-off unhappy things. Along the ancient ways the children skip and trip to school and play and secure slumber, the happy lovers saunter, the grain-laden wagon passes to the mill. The doctor's gig, bicycles, motors, market carts, all tell of helpfulness, of harmless pleasure, of settled peace and a brightening future. The volcanic fires that heaved this great hill upwards from the plain are not more dead than is the horrible racial strife of which these trenches are the immemorial token.

The Sunday quiet broods over all things; around the vast horizon earth meets the bending heavens: every harvest field tells of the blessing that waits on faithful labour, every homestead is a monument of God's mysteries of birth and death, every village church testifies that the fleeting generations have an eternal heritage.

Rest and peace, joy and thanksgiving—these are the bells that ring their chimes in the heart!

AMONG the public Introductory Lectures at the beginning of the new Session at University College, London, is one on Friday, October 12 (at 5.15 p.m.), by the Rev. W. Garwood, M.A., on "The Scope and Limitations of Elocution." Earlier in the afternoon Mr. Garwood will meet intending students for the Elocution classes for teachers, barristers, and clergy. On the previous Thursday evening (at 7.30), Professor Henry Kenwood, M.B., is to give the first of a course of ten lectures on "The Hygienic Needs of the Scholar." This course, which is arranged in conjunction with the Education Committee of the County Council, is open without fee to all teachers in London schools.

THOSE who have long known and valued Dr. Edwin Abbott's "Philochristus" and "Onesimus," the historical romances which pictured with so much power and insight the lives of Jesus and Paul respectively, will welcome with the keenest interest a new work by the same writer, which has just been published by Messrs. A. & C. Black (7s. 6d. net). The book is thus described:—"The main object of this work is to suggest a conception of Christ, not as a prophet, rabbi, or philosopher, but as the eternal Son of God, incarnate as the son of Joseph and Mary, dying for mankind, spiritually raised from the dead, and introducing into the world a new spiritual life communicable by His disciples to their successors. The difference between the Son and the Philosopher is illustrated by the autobiography of a young Roman knight, Q. Junius Silanus, attending the lectures of Epictetus in 118 A.D. In order to refute the charge that his teacher plagiarised from the Christians, Silanus procures the epistles of St. Paul, which draw him towards Christ. Afterwards the Synoptic gospels repel him. Finally he is converted by the personal influence of a Christian, who lends him the fourth gospel. These experiences, with remarks on subsequent Christian developments, Silanus records forty-five years afterwards (163 A.D.)."

LET us not disparage that nature which is common to all men; for no thought can measure its grandeur.—Channing.

ANANDA MOHUN BOSE.

It was on Monday evening, August 20, that Mr. A. M. Bose died at Calcutta, after a long illness, at the house of his relative, Professor J. C. Bose, the distinguished scientist. The funeral on the following morning was marked by touching manifestations of the profound affection and the high regard in which he was held.

Prayers were first offered in the house by Pundit Sivanath Sastri, a life-long friend, and minister of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj, of which Mr. Bose was the founder and first president; the bier was then taken out into the grounds of the Federation Hall, close by, where hymns were sung, and the procession then moved on to the burning ghat at Nimtollah. Twice, on the way, a halt was made, first in front of the Brahma Mandir of Keshub Chunder Sen, where more hymns were sung, and then at the Mandir of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj, where Mr. Sastri again offered prayer. At the place of burning, where there was a large concourse of friends, offerings of flowers were made, and there was more chanting of hymns. Babu Surendra Nath Banerji, who was deeply moved, gave a brief address, and a final prayer was offered by Mr. Sastri, before the actual cremation.

Writing of his friend in the Indian Messenger of August 26, Pundit Sivanath Sastri says that his character was unique, and goes on to speak of him as follows:—

“His fine intellect, the great distinction he had won in the paths of learning, his eminent services to the cause of his country, the saintly purity of his life, the noble principles that always influenced his conduct, the leading part he took in religious and social reform, his sturdy manhood and unflinching courage in acting up to his convictions, combined with natural and inborn humility, his warm advocacy of every noble cause calculated to raise his country, his sincere and fearless patriotism, all mark him out as one of the greatest citizens who have graced modern India. But the secret of his greatness lay in his deep and abiding faith in the goodness of God and in life as a sacred trust. That was the moving spring of all his noble actions. Whether in the domain of politics or in the spheres of social and religious reform, that sense pervaded and permeated all his acts. Indeed the hunger for usefulness was almost insatiable in him. During his short course of life he had done and achieved more than any ten men amongst us could have done. Yet the feeling preyed upon him to the last that he had failed to do all that God had appointed him to do, and during the period of his illness his greatest suffering arose from the consciousness that he was lying useless, incapable of taking part in matters his soul so dearly loved. Indeed, the memory of his deep and unfeigned piety will live in the hearts of his friends as a priceless treasure. The world has seen and admired Anandamohun, the patriot or the Cambridge Wrangler, or the gifted advocate, or the sincere reformer, but we remember Anandamohun, the humble child of God, the gentle, loving, kind, forgiving and forbearing, pure, spiritual, sympathetic, and liberal member of a religious fraternity.

“To those who knew him intimately, his private life was far more charming and elevating than his public life. The public saw only a part of him, and that also a small part, largely due to his habitually retiring and modest disposition, which would not allow him to put himself in the front; but the real greatness of his nature and the sweetness of his piety were manifest to those only who had the privilege of nearer approach. And they have all along felt that Anandamohun, the private individual, was far grander and far lovelier than Anandamohun, the public citizen. In short, by his life he has taught us a great lesson—that the greatness of a people, political or social, should always be placed on the lasting foundation of truthful and honest, pure and spiritual private lives.”

Mr. Bose was not quite sixty at the time of his death. Born at a village in the district of Mymensing, near the mouth of the Ganges, in 1847, he had a distinguished career at school and college, graduating at the Presidency College, Calcutta, with high honours. Then with a scholarship of 10,000 rupees he came to England, accompanying Keshub Chunder Sen in 1870, and went to Cambridge, where on graduation he became the first Indian Wrangler. He then read for the Bar, and on his return home, in 1874, was enrolled at the Calcutta high court. Distinguished as a barrister, Mr. Bose was also a devoted friend of education and of social reform, while dominating all other interests was that of religion. In the year before he came for the first time to this country he had been received with his friend Sastri, by Keshub Chunder Sen into the Brahma Samaj. Then in 1878 came the breach with Keshub, and the founding of the Sadharan Samaj. In 1898 Mr. Bose was President of the National Congress, and in the spring of that year came again to England. He gave two addresses in Liverpool, which made a deep impression; but his health was already failing, and he was not able to speak in London as had been hoped. His remaining years were broken by constant illness, but his spirit was undaunted to the end.

On the Thursday following his death the General Committee of the Sadharan Samaj passed the following commemorative resolution:—

“Resolved that this meeting has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Mr. Anandamohun Bose, who was one of the founders of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj, and its first president, whose earnestness, wisdom, and piety largely helped to mould its life, and whose services to the cause of progress in India have given him an honoured place among the promoters of religious, social, educational, and political reform in this country, and whose enthusiasm was a source of inspiration to workers in every righteous cause to the last day of his earthly life.”

From the Rev. James Harwood, who went to India as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in the autumn of 1896, we have received the following tribute:—The death of Mr. A. M. Bose, of Calcutta, will hardly have come as a surprise to those who have known of his long and serious illness. Still the news is none the less sad, and affects one as one is always affected when a spirit of rare elevation passes away from a world in which it is sorely needed.

Though I had long known Mr. Bose by repute, we met for the first time on my visit to India nearly ten years ago. Almost immediately on my arrival in Calcutta he very kindly pressed me to make his house my home, and for some weeks I enjoyed his and Mrs. Bose's abounding and most considerate hospitality, which combined the freedom of a hotel with the intimacy of family life. A friendship thus begun, at a time, too, when it was specially welcome, for I was far from home in the midst of strangers and strange ways of life, was afterwards strengthened and deepened so as to become one of my precious privileges.

But this is not the place to write of private relationships. At the time of which I speak Mr. Bose was a busy barrister, he was a member of the Council of the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, was prominently connected with the University, took an active part in the proceedings of the National Congress, and also in the promotion of temperance and other social reforms. His eloquent voice and helping hand were ever ready on behalf of justice and righteousness. I often wondered how he managed to keep pace with his engagements and work, especially as even then his health was far from robust. He always had himself well in hand; he never seemed hurried. The secret of it all was great natural ability of the facile order, a whole-hearted interest in whatever he undertook, and a wonderfully sweet disposition. This last characteristic was the more noticeable since Mr. Bose possessed to a remarkable degree the oratorical gift, which is generally said, rightly or wrongly, rarely to keep company with a serene temper.

At the root of his character was a profound religious trust. His Theism was a working faith as well as an intellectual belief. He was indebted for it to the Brahma Samaj, and, in the first instance, at least, to Keshub Chunder Sen. The time came when he sorrowfully found himself compelled to separate from his former religious leader, and with others to establish the Sadharan branch of the Samaj. But in our many talks I never heard him speak in any but terms of the warmest appreciation of Mr. Sen. Several times he was President of the Sadharan branch, and was always one of its foremost leaders.

Death has lately pressed hard on our Brahma friends. The venerable Maharshi Tagore, Mr. Mazoomdar, and Mr. Bose were the three best known representatives of the Brahma Samaj, and they have all passed away within a comparatively short time of each other. English Unitarians and Theists will deeply sympathise with their friends in India, and with them will cherish in honour the memory of such noble confessors.

ALDERMAN THOMAS CROSS, J.P.

By the death of Alderman Thomas Cross, which occurred on the 19th inst., our little congregation at Canterbury has lost a valued well-wisher and friend. The deceased was born in Bristol seventy-eight years ago, and came of an Independent stock. He settled at Canterbury in 1851 as headmaster of the then British School, which position he resigned, after two years, to become the proprietor of a private school. He carried on the latter until 1878, and his work as a teacher is even now spoken of with deep affection and reverence by all who came under his care and influence. On his retirement from his profession he threw himself into more active service for the city of his adoption. And from the year 1879, until within the last few months, he continued his activities in civic life. He was elected a member of the City Council in 1880, and in 1891 was made an alderman. He served as a guardian and afterwards as chairman of the Board for some twelve years, and also as a member of the old Canterbury School Board, with conspicuous ability.

An ardent Liberal in politics, and a Nonconformist of a sturdy type, he took his stand in the van of progress. By nature kind and genial, he won the respect and esteem of all who knew him, and ever conciliated those from whom he differed most in politics or religion.

During the past few years his health was much impaired, and the intense sufferings of the last six months were borne with the heroism and fortitude of a truly noble nature.

Mr. Cross was twice married, and in the second instance to the widow of the late Mr. Edward Cowell, who for many years was an earnest supporter of Blackfriars Chapel. She survives him, but he has left no family.

The funeral was conducted by the Rev. J. H. Smith, who on Sunday last held a memorial service in Blackfriars Chapel, at which Mr. J. W. Brown, as a friend of the deceased, gave the address.

THE seventh annual conference of the P.S.A. Confederation has been held this week in London, and was attended by nearly 500 delegates, representing a membership of 200,000. Such a body of men is by no means a negligible quantity, and the importance to be attached to it is indicated by the fact of a Times report. The movement prides itself on being undenominational and outside of party. But the societies take up a strong antagonism to such evils as gambling and militarism, and to judge from the tone of the speakers are moving in the direction of what is sometimes spoken of as untechnical socialism. Some sentences from the address of Mr. Meyer, the president, will illustrate what we mean: "Silently as the coming of dawn a new age was upon us. Of that age Brotherhood would be the watchword. Men were ceasing to believe that the individual was the true unit of society, and that the law of social progress was to be found in rivalry and competition. They had awakened to see the possibility of a common life and destiny."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A LITTLE BIT OF CHIVALRY.

It was a very little act—just a slight nod of the head and a point with the finger. But it was a fine and chivalrous thing to do. I saw it at the Chess Congress at Shrewsbury, in the contest for the Championship Trophy, and a first prize of £60. So there was a good deal at stake. And how the players did work! sitting at the table with intent faces for hours silent and still, only the eyes glancing over the board, the pupils shifting to take in the position, and such eager brains behind! The players seldom spoke a word, and the spectators stood or moved about in dead silence; or if one of them wished to make a remark to another, withdrawing a little way and speaking in a whisper. The morning sitting lasted four hours, and most of the games were not finished in that time, and had to be adjourned till the evening.

The competitors would have liked to take longer, but there was a time limit fixed, and if that was exceeded the game was lost. They played with a pair of clocks at the side of the board, so arranged that they could be stopped and set going by a touch. An important game was being played, the result of which might be to give the first place to either of the two players. One of them had been a long time over his move. Another minute and his time would have been gone and the game lost. And then his opponent gave him a little nod, and just raised his finger pointing to his clock. It was no part of his business, to look after his opponent's clock. No one would have blamed him if he had allowed him to go beyond his time. If he had, it would have been his business according to the rules of play, to claim the win. He did not speak a word, and his opponent did not say a word in answer to his look; but only gave a cheerful smile that showed he was not taken by surprise, and knew how the time was going; and then made his move.

That was all. No one saw it but myself. There was no credit to be gained. And I thought it a fine little bit of chivalrous generosity, none the less because it actually made no difference. He was keen to win the game, which might have given him the prize. But he wanted to win it by play, and so he gave the hint which might have made all the difference. It was a very kind, honourable and generous thing to do.

You have perhaps read children's stories of how a boy or girl would not take an unfair advantage in competing for a prize at a school examination. This was a real occurrence, between men, who were contending more eagerly and intensely than children often do. And it was not simply abstaining from taking an unfair advantage. It was going beyond anything that could be required.

It was characteristic of Chess. The players are so interested in the game itself that they hardly think of the prize when they are playing. If they did they would be likely to lose.

Another player in this same competition lost his game unexpectedly by a clever move of his opponent's. He did not lose his temper, but smiled pleasantly and said—"That was very pretty. I did not see it."

I wish all sports were carried on in the same spirit. But they are often spoilt by the Gate Money and the Gambling.

The story tells its own moral: be honourable in your play. Then the games will be a fine training in character, and be a good preparation for an honourable life.

The same spirit which was shown in this little story is illustrated in one that is told in Green's "Short History of the English People."

"At Leicester, one of the chief aims of its burgesses was to regain their old English jury trial (or practice of compurgation) which had been abolished by the Earls in favour of the foreign trial by duel. It chanced, says a charter of the time, that two kinsmen . . . waged a duel about a certain piece of land, concerning which a dispute had arisen between them; and they fought from the first to the ninth hour, each conquering by turns. Then one of them fleeing from the other till he came to a certain little pit, as he stood on the brink of the pit and was about to fall therein, his kinsman said to him, 'Take care of the pit, turn back lest thou shouldst fall into it.'

"Thereat so much clamour and noise was made by the bystanders and those who were sitting around, that the Earl heard these clamours as far off as the castle, and he inquired of some how it was there was such a clamour. And answer was made to him that two kinsmen were fighting about a certain piece of ground, and that one had fled till he reached a certain little pit and that as he stood over the pit and was about to fall into it the other warned him.

"Then the townsmen being moved with pity, made a covenant with the Earl that they should give him threepence yearly for each house in the High-street that had a gable, on condition that he should grant them that the twenty-four jurors who were in Leicester from ancient times should from that time forward discuss and decide all pleas they might have among themselves."

That story, which I have copied from Green, shows us a curious state of things—two men who were related to each other—cousins or something of the kind—going to law about a piece of land that both said belonged to him. And instead of the matter being examined and the facts ascertained, they were set to decide it by fighting with deadly weapons, but, I suppose, with shields or armour that enabled them to go on for a long time without either of them being killed. And a crowd of people stood or sat round them looking on.

It was not a game but serious fighting with all the rage that must be produced by a long combat. And yet one of the men, though he was trying to kill or wound his relation, would not take advantage of the little pit into which he was about to fall. The moral might be expressed in the old saying, which is familiar to boys:—"Fair play's a jewel." There is a poor sort of honour that depends upon what other people say. And there is a true honour that depends only on ourselves, and our own doings. That honour, which may come out in play and in work, is indeed one of the jewels of life. C. D. B.

SOCIAL SERVICE.

At the annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, to be held at Lewes on Thursday next, under the presidency of Mr. W. WALLACE BRUCE, L.C.C., the report of the Public Questions Committee is to be presented, which we here offer for the consideration of our readers. At the same time, the two resolutions, with which the report concludes, will be moved on behalf of the Committee.

The report, it will be seen, deals with the fundamental question of the attitude of the churches towards matters of social duty. It is well that the issue should be clearly faced, and the appeal be pressed earnestly home upon the attention of all members of our churches. It is not, as a matter of fact, any new responsibility that the churches are called to undertake, but an old duty which needs to be more clearly recognised, and more thoroughly discharged. The special point to be made clear is in what manner the churches may best discharge that duty: Personal and social duty cannot be really separated. What is required now is that the religious inspiration of the churches should compel the people to realise that individual and personal duty demands of them a closer and more practical application to social concerns.

The report says that several of our Provincial Assemblies have already taken action of an organised kind to stimulate the conscience and instruct the mind of the connected churches. We know of only one other Provincial Assembly in the country, that of Lancashire and Cheshire, and this body has for many years been accustomed to deal fearlessly with public questions. Of other associations of our churches we know that the Manchester District Association has given an admirable lead in the vigorous activity of its recently appointed Social Questions Committee. It will be useful if the mover of the resolutions at Lewes can tell the Assembly what other action of an organised kind has been taken, with explicit information as to methods.

What the National Conference Union for Social Service proposes may be seen from their committee's "Address to the Churches," which we also publish this week. The members of the Provincial Assembly are to be asked to recognise the "duty laid upon the churches to study the problems of social distress, and to give guidance to the nation on the principles of social reform." That last phrase may, perhaps, raise a question. The report most admirably states the principle from which action should proceed as being that of social responsibility. On this, and on the aim to be achieved, also stated with much force, we should hope that there can be no difference of opinion among the members of our churches. But the report goes on very rightly to point out that the acceptance of this principle and aim does not by any means involve of necessity the acceptance of any specific "socialistic analysis of the facts" as sound, or a "socialistic policy" of reconstruction as possible, or, we may add, as desirable. What then is meant by giving "guidance to the nation on the principles of social reform"? It appears to us that guidance must come from experts in social science, and that the duty of the churches is to furnish the inspiration of a deeper sense of social responsibility and the overmastering impulse of brotherly love. Then the members would be naturally led to that earnest study of the problems of social distress for which the resolutions rightly ask, and to such action as faithful citizens as insight and conviction so gained might suggest.

Earlier in the report it is said that "in the task of purifying and educating the social conscience the churches ought to play a commanding part." If this is what is meant by giving "guidance to the nation" we should be well content, for that would seem a better way of defining the duty.

The churches, that is to say, the people, who themselves are the churches, are called upon to face the facts of our social condition, to understand what the conditions of life actually are, and what are the possible means of betterment; and then to see, in the light of their religious faith, what conscience demands of them to be done. This it is their duty fearlessly to declare, in the hope that others also may understand and recognise the claim, and then, by every means in their power, to set about doing it.

That is how the matter appears to us, and it seemed well frankly to state at once the impression we have received from the report, with the object of which we are in the fullest sympathy. The members of the Assembly will doubtless receive from the mover and seconder of the resolutions at Lewes a fuller elucidation of their meaning.

PUBLIC QUESTIONS COMMITTEE.

FIFTH ANNUAL REPORT TO THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

THE Public Questions Committee depart on the present occasion from the custom that has been followed in previous years of treating in detail some of those public questions in which moral and religious issues are involved, because there is a prior consideration of transcendent importance which they desire to bring to the attention of the Assembly. The question is nothing less than whether the churches as vehicles of the religious spirit of Christendom are, or are not, called upon to add a new and vast responsibility to that which they have hitherto generally recognised. They have spoken with power on matters of personal morality: Is it not also incumbent on them to deal as strenuously with concerns of social righteousness? And if this is so, in what way can the duty be best discharged?

The question is proposed because it must inevitably be faced in the near future if the churches are to retain or recover their position as leaders of thought and conduct; and because recent movements in our group of churches make the question specially timely now. During the last few months the National Conference Union has been formed, and several of our Provincial Assemblies have already taken action of an organised kind to stimulate the conscience and instruct the mind of the connected churches.

The Public Questions Committee suggest that in this province also more definite steps should be taken than the mere presentation of an annual report.

One comprehensive evil condition may be adduced as lying at the root of the moral unrest which we feel when we compare the principles of our religion with the actual state of our world. Society as it is constituted to-day does not secure for nearly all its members even the bare necessities of healthy physical existence, and among those thus left destitute, many are good and worthy up to or beyond the average standard of our humanity. Alike by the claims of our faith and citizenship we are impelled to remedy this evil, and while the ideals of life from which we proceed, and the aims towards which we move, must be determined by the will of the nation at large, yet, in the task of purifying and educating the social conscience the churches ought to play a commanding part.

The PRINCIPLE from which action should proceed is expressed in the phrase Social Responsibility. This responsibility is become actually a much more real thing through the development of industry, since every action and every article of use we touch is a symbol of our perpetual dependence on the unknown many, to whom therefore we have a corresponding duty. But this responsibility is not only a fact, it is also the ideal round which the higher aspirations of the age are rallying with enthusiasm. Recognition of the claims of society upon the individual, and loyal response of the individual to these claims, are among the first moral concerns.

THE AIM towards which we should move is to be discerned when we reflect on the economic pressure of poverty, resulting from the present unequal distribution of wealth. To the utmost limit of the nation's power the means of a truly humane livelihood must be placed within the reach of all. To attempt so much is more and more widely recognised as an elementary act of social justice. But there are many among those whose hearts have ached at the sight of unmerited and brutalising poverty, who have come also to understand that the possession of superfluous wealth is not less prejudicial to character than the extremes of poverty. They look forward to a time when the divisions of society, so far as they depend on wide differences of income, will be abolished; and they are convinced that only then will the full blessedness be discovered of that brotherhood in which they believe.

From this principle and this aim Socialism derives its moral sway in the hearts of men, and they are accepted by many of its critics as well as its apostles. But they do not themselves constitute Socialism, which implies a specific analysis of the industrial facts of life and a comprehensive policy for the realisation of better social conditions. In regard to this analysis and policy there is ample room for diversity of opinion. The mind of the Committee is divided (as doubtless that of the Assembly will be) on the question whether the socialistic analysis of the fact is sound, or the socialistic policy is possible. They believe, however, that the principle and aim, from which socialism derives its strength, must animate the churches if they are to treat social problems with authority.

We have to consider what the principle and the aim involve in our emotional and practical attitude towards the world of men, and especially towards the poor. With this as a basis we may go on to deal with particular forms of distress which vex and injure our national life, such as, for instance:—

Militarism:

The need for higher education of young men and women in citizenship, in industrial skill, and in the government of the home.

Unemployment and underpayment, or the needs of the workless and a living wage for worker.

The nature of poverty and the reform of poor relief.

Such questions are not easy ones, and can only be understood by hard study, which is the first essential step towards their solution. To such a study the churches are first of all called, for although on the surface these questions may seem to be, as they are, economic, political, and pedagogic, they involve also moral and religious issues, on which the lives of men depend. These are problems for the administrator and the politician, but we as members of religious societies are also bound to deal with them, for acquiescence in the evils here indicated is incompatible with justice and righteousness, and the love of God and man.

The Committee, recognising in these problems a first claim on the religious spirit of our age, and believing that the churches connected with this assembly should be moved to resolute consideration of the right position in regard to them, propose the following resolutions:—

(1) That a duty is laid on the churches to study the problems of social distress, and to give guidance to the nation on the principles of social reform; and, accordingly, that the congregations connected with this assembly be cordially invited to take the subject into their serious consideration.

(2) That the Public Questions Committee, in conjunction with the General Committee, be instructed to take all necessary steps for urging on the congregations the consideration of the subjects referred to in this report.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

AN ADDRESS TO THE CHURCHES.

The Committee believe that in asking for co-operation in their efforts to give effect to the aims of the Union it is unnecessary to dwell at length on the existence and serious meaning of the problems of poverty which vex our national life. The area of want may be less extensive than was the case a generation ago; our consciousness of the evil is certainly greater, while the social inequalities which still exist are at once a menace and peril to our civilisation, and an effective denial of our faith in brotherhood and social solidarity. The duty is accordingly laid upon us of studying and combating the economic and other evils by which so many of our fellow citizens are deprived of the good hope of life.

The imperative demand of social justice may be explained on three grounds. (1) The fact of the necessary mutual dependence on one another of the members of a modern society. (2) The responsibility resulting from increased knowledge. (3) The special obligation of the churches.

(1) During the early part of last century three-quarters of the population lived in the country districts, at the present time three-quarters live in the towns. This serious change in our manner of life carries with it a closer and more complex interdependence of man upon man and class upon class. In this fact we discover the emergence of the Social Problem. This has long been recognised in such matters of detail as e.g., town hygiene. What is now necessary is to work out the implications of this fact of solidarity in all our social relationships.

(2) Scientific students of society have accumulated stores of weighty information as to the conditions of life among the poorer classes and as to the intimate dependence of class on class, or people on people. This knowledge gives rise to an ethical problem. In the past the moral relation has been chiefly between a man and his neighbour, that is to say between people who know one another. At present the moral relation towards persons whom we do not know is becoming increasingly important. The ethical problem, then, is to find a motive force which will link us firmly to those who are strangers to us. We are growing more aware of this responsibility, and with the advance of civilisation the responsibility itself becomes much more grave and extensive. We purchase goods manufactured by persons we have never seen, the services we require are supplied by a crowd of unknown people. So far as these services are performed under circumstances of injustice we cannot escape our share of the wrong. By the unknown many each is served in countless directions, and to them each owes an equal debt.

(3) But the duty which rests on us as citizens is reinforced when we recall the special obligation imposed by our religious faith. The Christian Church has fostered individual holiness and helpfulness among its members in the personal relations of life, it has also a duty to the world at large. This duty consists in upholding the ideals of social, national, and international righteousness, in inculcating a spirit of universal brotherhood, and in helping to shape its embodiment in the institutions of society. All churches have this duty laid upon them, but ours enjoys a still more pressing obligation to preach the good tidings of love and to give effect to that preaching in strenuous efforts to create right conditions of life for all.

The Union for Social Service has been formed for the purpose of directing attention to the grave social problems of the modern world and of working towards their solution. We, the undersigned, therefore earnestly invite all the members of our household of faith to co-operate with the Committee in this object, and especially, as a first and preparatory measure, in the organisation of careful and sympathetic study of social questions. We desire and shall be grateful to receive information and suggestions on the following points:—

Whether there is in connection with your Church any reading or discussion class or other similar society for the purpose of understanding and dealing with the industrial and other mischiefs incident to poverty. The secretaries of the Union ask that they may be kindly furnished with particulars. The committee will be glad to render assistance in the formation of such classes, and to furnish outline syllabuses of study and lists of books on any special subject.

Social Questions Committees have already been established in connection with several District Associations, and where this is the case we desire to work in connection with such Committees. In districts where such action has not been adopted we would urge that the step should be now taken, or, as an alternative, that branches of this Union should be founded.

Members of the Committee or other friends will be prepared to visit congregations, Sunday-schools, or other societies for the purpose of giving lectures or holding conference as to the objects and work of the Union for Social Service. Signed on behalf of the Committee,

GATEWAYS TO THE SOUL:

IV.—SENSE OF COLOUR AND LIGHT.

"Of all God's gifts to the sight of man," said Ruskin, "colour is the holiest, the most solemn, the most divine." In whomsoever, truly, this faculty is wide awake, common day no longer robes the earth—it has become a palace of glamour and enchantment.

All who believed of yore in "a fallen world" and saw it but as a dull grey place, a vale of tears, under the curse, and what not, were surely deficient in a colour-sense, or had one abounding in a deeper shade of "blues." Others, like Richard Jefferies, to whom colour was a sort of food—yea, every spot of colour a drop of wine to the spirit—must have possessed a heightened visual sensibility. "Colour and form and light are as magic to me," he said: "It is a trance."

We may not fall so readily as he under the spell, but there are moments when our duller and slower optic lobes thrill to a stronger appeal than usual, and we enter adoringly into the "sweet wonders and charities of the earth." We pass in winter through the bare and sere woodland, expecting no romance, when there gleams across our path a sweep of bright green—simply a bole of a rotting tree, moss-mantled, but shining like a web of emeralds. Or later a tree of pink almond-blossom will smite our vision like a burst of glory against a drab background of city dwellings; or a gap in the brushwood on the hillside will reveal a golden splendour of broom in the halcyon days of June; or we alight upon a cornfield dappled with scarlet poppies, with a dream of blue in the sea beyond. Tinted rocks in the coves of the west sea-shore, purple hills in a haze of heather in the north; the sweet sanctities that weave themselves into the silent orchestration of the dawn; the pageant of sunset that makes thought expire in enjoyment, as the vespere-melodist plays the whole gamut of colour from crimson and gold to azure, turquoise, amethyst, and daffodil. We all have these moments in which come glimpses that make us less forlorn.

Light.

What shall we say of the ever-renewed, the daily miracle of the coming of light? Who has ever waited for the dawn and not felt its wonder? Who has seen the sun leap out of the sea and not felt his heart leap in ecstatic response? Who has walked beneath leaden skies and suddenly become aware of a burst of brightness through a rent in the clouds without an exclamation of rapture—so like the smile of God upon a forsaken world, it seems, so magnanimously vast! At once our thought leaps into that illimitable ocean across which came sailing with an inconceivable velocity of 186,000 miles per second, the gleam that falls upon the flower so gently as to break no fibre save its shell of gladness, and upon our eye more softly than sleep. The marvel of that common fact we may never exhaust!

Providence and the Law of Light.

Analogous to the benign purpose we saw present in the law that the velocity of sound is independent of loudness or pitch is that governing the sensation of light. It is stated by saying that the velocity of each colour is the same. Difference of colour means a difference of rate of vibration, but to make evenness in their effect, the shorter waves travel faster to keep up with their longer brethren. It would be awkward for us if the path struck our vision earlier than the dark hole into which it leads; or if red "stood out" from its surroundings like a disconnected thing; the harmony of colours which forms the charm of a landscape would be unknown to us.

Octave of Colour.

We owe the idea of an octave of colours to Sir Isaac Newton. By passing a ray of light through a three-sided rod of glass or a prism, he found light became decomposed into its constituent colours, which have been named red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet. As the disk of a siren, vibrating faster and faster, causing more rapid aerial motion, makes a louder and louder note, so the sun's energy, making the ether produce faster and faster vibration, makes the gamut of colour from red (39,000 waves to an inch) to violet (57,500 waves to an inch). The grosser ether of this class which quakes some 400 billion times per second affects us as red; the finer ether, at the rate of 700 billions, affect us as violet.

A Parable of the Sun.

Nothing so well illustrates the principle of diversity in unity as the reduction of light into its constituent parts. What appears more simple, more single, more indivisible than a beam of white light? Yet its simplicity is brought about by the unity of the many. These many so blend together, so harmonise, that they lose their peculiarity, their separateness, in the single whole.

Here is an eloquent parable of the atonement, of the part fulfilling its destiny not by preserving its separateness, but by uniting its will with the will of the whole. It was such a thought inspired the lines of Shelley:—

"The One remains, the many change and pass,
Heaven's light for ever shines, Earth's shadows fly;
Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of Eternity,
Until Death tramples it to fragments."

Just as each colour is only a partial ray of the One Light, so every energy in the universe is only a partial manifestation of the One Life.

Complementary Colours.

Being fragments of an inclusive whole it is no surprise to find orderly relations among colours. It is not a mere matter of taste that magenta and scarlet or blue and violet are considered as making a discord. Agreements and disagreements among colours have been reduced to mathematical formulæ and tabulated into a science.

There are no violent antagonisms in the arrangements of Nature. Recall the familiar contrast to be noted between the colour of foliage and blossom. We ordinarily speak of that infinite diversity of leaf-colour as green. But compare the dark glossy green of the wild briar (har-monising with its delicate pink roses) with the dull olive green of the lilac bush. Compare the glaucous grey-green of the Fumitory (setting off its blooms of marone with the light waxed leaves of some nasturtiums. The blades of the carnation are almost steel-grey; the common thistle has been described as bearing leaves of frosted silver.

In explanation of complementary colours or those that match, agree, and harmonise, Professor Tyndall devised an experiment in which, across the spectrum of seven colours into which light is split, various bands of colour were successively passed. Passing a red band made the red in the spectrum much more brilliant, but the overlaying changed the other colours, turning yellow into orange, &c. The blue part of the spectrum was made more vivid by the passing of a blue band, while the yellow was turned into green, red into purple, &c. But as these colours were passed up and down the spectrum, they each reached a stage where the mingling of tints resulted practically in white, red with green having a slight violet cast, orange with indigo, yellow with bluish-purple. The two colours that thus unite are called complementary.

The subject is charged with untold suggestions. Out of an infinite number of tints into which light divides and subdivides, each hath its counterpart, its match, its complement in some one other. It furnishes an analogy to the chemical affinity of the elements, to the mating of birds, to friendship and marriage in the human world, vindicating solitude à deux and dual selfishness as an ordained link in cosmic evolution. We may suspect the relation to be most complete when the union approaches nearest in hue to the "white flower of a blameless life," when the separate personalities blend in harmony "like perfect music unto noble words."

Now, the manifest care shown by the Infinite Artist in preventing violent contrasts and securing concord of colours in every plant, and perfect orchestration in the ineffable glories that make up the pageant of the sunset, would seem to suggest that if there is mind and love in Nature, they are displayed in Nature's scheme of colour. Why is sky-effect blue? and earth-effect green? Do these prevailing tints mean anything?

Influence of Colours

Modern science has opened out several lines of inquiry. Acting on the principle that yellow is the summit of luminosity in the spectrum, and heat-rays predominate in the red, and electrical rays toward the violet end, a series of arresting experiments have been tried. For instance, an Edinburgh seedsman found that seedlings that usually took fourteen days to germinate in a glass frame took five days only under indigo glass. On the other hand, of geraniums placed under the red and thermal rays, many became sickly, some died, some lost their leaves, others the brilliancy of their colours. The sickly plants, upon removal under bluish rays were healed, putting forth fresh leaves, and in ten days recovering normal health.

This treatment has been satisfactorily applied to sickly lambs and in the cure of certain human diseases; Sun-ray cures and electrical ray cures are becoming a recognised feature of hospital work. Perhaps the most interesting record is the use of colour-influence in the treatment of lunatics. Those whose wildness became aggravated by being placed in red-lighted rooms were found to get soothed and allayed when removed under blue. The healing rays are said to reside in the violet end of the spectrum, the stimulating rays in the other. An attempt has been made to work out a new theory of medicine upon these colour-principles, and it is possible there may be a causal connection between the sedative and anodyne properties of aconite and its dark violet-blue flower-tints; the stimulant qualities of cayenne and its bright scarlet berry-tint; the tonic quality and yellowish hue of quassia.

Colour-Symbolism.

To those who suppose the existence of some germ of fact, some kernel of truth even, in every superstition, however difficult to trace, an attractive field of inquiry is offered by the colour-symbolism of religious ceremonial and poetic imagery. What does the savage mean by the phrase "seeing red" in reference to anger? Why does Shakespeare designate fear as grey? Why does Browning speak of a youth in love as being caught in the "rose-mesh"? Why is blue sacred to our "Blessed Lady" among Catholics, and none but the pure and holy are deemed worthy to wear a blue sapphire gem among Buddhist devotees? Has colour a cosmic meaning, and is its uniform influence the reason why warlike passion is associated with red in so many diverse symbols from Assyria to Wales, and Buddhist and Christian justify a moderner—Jacobsen—in speaking of good things as of one tint, "blue hope," "blue liberty"—and give him the blue lotus as emblem of everlasting longing?

Do the Human Rays furnish a Clue.

A back number of the Lancet supplied an account of three years' experiments on the "N" rays or human emanations conducted by a London doctor of medicine. Passing these rays through a prism, the resulting spectra in the course of three hundred experiments were shown to demonstrate a close connection between the predominant colour and temperament. A passionate man exhibited rays of a deep red colour; one whose key-note in life is to do good abounded in rose-pink; a woman of compassion and devotion possessed much light blue; a deep thinker emitted deep blue; abundance of intellect went with abundance of yellow; orange marked ambition; grey, anxiety and depression.

Here we seem to witness a re-discovery of the observation of Herakleitus, who described the passions and affections as dense and coloured mists.

Even as long ago as 1712 Addison, in No. 387 of the Spectator suggested a universal interpretation to the meaning of colour, quoting Sir Isaac Newton, and citing those thinkers who made it an argument for Providence that the whole earth was covered with green, which is the symbol of cheerfulness. The paper is instinct with the modern spirit, being an advocacy of cheerfulness as the best promoter of health. As our knowledge of the laws of the universe deepens, and we are able to trace their operation in the minutest phenomena, we shall certainly discover a causal connection where now we see but coincidence, chance, or chaos. We shall go for arguments in favour of faith that God means well by us, not only to ancient Scripture, but to the broad Bible of Nature, the ever-living page of the ever-open Book, the manuscripts of God.

As it is through our sense of colour that we have been able to discover the constituents of distant stars, and as sure as we know the make-up of a piece of wood, also by means of the spectroscope, we know that aldebaran, inconceivably far away, contains iron, magnesium, and lime, so through this same sense of colour we may in the near future point to the dancing daffodils and say what manner of thought the supreme Thinker has there enshrined for us, and accept the blush of the rose as a glow tinged by a fresh vein from the heart of love.

And, more than all, turning to the sun, source of all vital energies, we shall see in it, more than ever before, the living dwelling of Him who is Light, and Love, and Life, and sing with Watson:—

"O bright irresistible lord, O Sun,
To Thee as our Father we bow,
Forbidden Thy Father to see,
Who is older and greater than thou, as thou
Art greater and older than we
* * * *

Thou art but a word of his speech,
Thou art but a wave of his hand;
Thou art brief as a glitter of sand
Twixt tide and tide on his beach;
Thou art less than a spark of his fire,
Or a moment's mood of his soul;
Thou art lost in the notes on the lips of his choir
That chant the chant of the whole."

MOTHER BICKERDYKE AS I KNEW HER.

BY MRS. FLORENCE S. KELLOG, OF FAY, KANSAS.

(From the Chicago "Unity.")

II.

She counted nothing small or trivial that added to the comfort of her charges, and nothing within her power was too great, too difficult for her to do, so only that it was needed and helped in any way to make life easier or better for another. Her detestation of the way "Comrade C——'s" family treated him, their indifference to his condition—that was pitiful in the extreme—or to his comfort, so aroused her wrath that she begrudged every cent they received from his pension—which was not many while she had charge of it. As his guardian she used all that was needed of his funds for his comfort. Yet, we may be sure, no penny of it was wasted. Her army record, the washing of hospital blankets and stores, of the shirts taken from the backs of wounded soldiers—all tell of her thrift, her ability to save and make a little go a long way. The lessons of economy learned in the pioneer days in the log huts of her forefathers were "born in her bones and bred in her flesh," she used to say, and she could not waste anything unless it was her own strength and life. Of these she gave without thought of withholding or of economy.

These incidents of her care and watchful oversight for her "boys in blue" are but a few of many that could be cited, for she was always at work in some way for them, and generally had one or more of the sick, "the lame, the halt and the blind" with her. I remember one poor soldier who had been under her care in some hospital during the war, came all the way from San Francisco, and from a sister who lived there, and who would have cared for him, to Russell that he might spend the last weeks of his life with the "Soldiers' Mother," whom he with many others loved so dearly. He knew the end of his earthly way was very near and could not bear not to see Mother Bickerdyke once more and feel her gentle ministries. She took him into her home and cared for him as if he had been her very own, and her face was the last that he saw ere he looked upon the angel faces. Her hand held his in its strong, comforting clasp; her voice sustained him as he "fell on sleep" to waken no more on earth. In her home the kindly people gathered for the last rites; from her home his body was borne by kind but stranger hands to its last resting place in earth's bosom, and on each recurring Decoration Day so long as she lived in Russell it was this dear old mother who placed on his grave the beautiful flowers sent from San Francisco for that purpose. And who shall say that the joys of heaven and heavenly rest are not sweeter and dearer to this man (and to many another who, like him, knew how good it was to feel her care) for all she did for him? Surely there could have been no "dark way" for him to cross while her hands held his, and her love gave him firm faith in the higher Love watching over all.
* * * *

I loved to hear her talk of her girlhood days "on the old Ball farm," back in Knox county, Ohio, where she liked the free, wholesome life of a country girl, with all of the animals on the farm for pets and companions. It was there she laid the strong foundations of physical being: there that she gathered up a rich store of thought and knowledge—living, as every true child of the country does live, close to the great throbbing heart of Nature—learning her secrets and drinking deep at her inexhaustible founts of health and wisdom.

Mary Ball, as she was then, must have been a merry, fun-loving girl, one who would have her share in all the "good times" around her, and yet we can never think of her as neglecting any chance for improvement, or failing in any duty that was hers, for, with all her love of fun and merriment, her heart and conscience were true and tender ever. And her strong sense of right and justice would keep her "up to the mark" always.

At comparatively an early age she entered Oberlin College—that blessed haven of learning for so many noble women of that time, open alike to the rich and the poor, to women as to men, to black as to white—as but few such institutions were at that time.

An epidemic of fever breaking out there sent her home just before the close of her college course, and her removal to another part of the state a little later prevented a later return. But lacking all this, knowing nothing of schools or colleges, she must have been of cultured mind, educated in the best meaning of the word, for she learned of everything with which she came in contact—of nature, and of life, of men, women and children—of the sun-rises and the sun-sets—of the coming and going of the seasons. All was “grist” to her—all taught her of life and its meaning. Of an open mind, as of open hand—far seeing and receptive, she was ever learning, ever growing in depth and strength of character. But she knew of books and of the writers of books, and was at home in the drawing-rooms of the educated and cultured as surely as in the hospital tent and the humble cottage of the poor. Some one has written of her “disregard of the king’s English,” but this is wronging her. There was a certain bluntness of speech in her, a disposition to avoid needless “frills and furbelows,” as she would say, both in her conversation and in her dress—with no display of what “Hosea Biglow” styles “book froth”—no bombast or vulgarity, and certainly no “disregard” or violation of “the king’s English.” Her’s was an active life, far removed from the quiet of books and meditation, but she loved good books and all that went to the making of a full well-rounded, well-informed character, and there was a great charm in her conversation, a something that told of reserve force and depths untouched below. Though she gave freely of that that was within her, she did not exhaust herself or her theme. She was ever plain and direct of speech, simple and unassuming in bearing, unless in combat with wrong, when she became a very Nemesis, pursuing the wrongdoer with relentless force, nor rested until, so far as lay in her power, justice was done. She stood always bravely, unflinchingly for what she believed to be right, and, truly, her judgment was seldom at fault, and she was seldom vanquished. As she once told a hospital officer who was opposing some of her efforts for the comfort of her “boys,” “You better not get into a row with me, for whenever anybody does one of us always goes to the wall—and it is never me.”

She “Knew the depth and knew the height,

The bounds of darkness and of light;
And he who these extremes has seen

Must needs know all that lies between.”
And this she did, this brave-hearted, resolute woman, to whom all around her instinctively turned in need and in sorrow, and for whom she had ever the right word of love and encouragement. The clasp of her hand revealed her strength and determination, the sound of her voice gave inspiration and hope, and the sight of her face so deeply stamped with the fine, tender yet strong lines of character, the eternal brooding motherhood that lay in the shining depth of her blue eyes—ah, who that has felt, heard and seen all this can forget it? Who but recalls it all with joy and gratitude now that she is away?

How little she could have thought in her school days of the work she was to do—the large place she was to fill in the hearts and homes of her countrymen, and in our national history! Nor could she once have thought that she was to be a household saint, the mention of whose name would bring a fervent “God bless her” from thousands of grateful hearts. Yet she was a very human saint, not one to be set upon a pedestal and worshipped from afar, but one sharing in our full humanity with all its joys and its sorrows, and whose experience had taught her how to be helpful in the experiences of others. That she was sometimes imposed upon did not deter her in her good work. She was one who would rather trust all and be sometimes deceived than to wound anyone by doubting too much. She was quick to decide and to act. While others were vaguely wondering over some social need or problem, she had found a way and gone straight to the need with sure supply. Though her work was chiefly among the old soldiers and their families, she by no means confined herself to them, but gave and gave, and gave wherever there was need, gave not of her money alone, but still more lavishly of herself. She must have felt with Lowell “The gift without the giver is bare.” She never wasted life in doubts or fears, but spent herself on the work before her, knowing this was the best preparation for the work that might be given in the future. She lived in the now—lived one day at a time, wisely and well. She had a noble scorn of all things mean and low, and yet a rare gift of separating the sin from the sinner and, while condemning the one, would help to save the other. As she once said, “Every miserable sinner that comes my way is sure of two friends—God and me.” Who can tell how many a poor life has been saved from utter wreck, how many a discouraged, despondent one has been aroused and given a new and stronger hope—a firmer grasp on things both material and spiritual by this combination of “God and me”? Whatever one’s faith in God may be there come times when only the human touch can help—when we must have that to keep fast hold upon the other—when God’s love must be seen in human love. The coming of Mother Bickerdyke at such a time could not but mean life and hope and salvation. Only the opening of the great Book of Life can reveal the extent and helpfulness of her work. Her’s was essentially a gospel of work, a religion of deeds rather than of words.

How Wordsworth’s beautiful tribute to woman comes back to me as out of the shadows of the years that are fled I recall Mother Bickerdyke as I saw her in her home. Not perfect in the sense of being immune from human faults and failures—we could not have loved her as we did—could not love her as we still do—had this been true, but yet most “nobly planned, to warn, to comfort and command,” with a something about her we could not resist—a something that called us to high belief and service. Was it the compelling power of her great love? The force of her deep, unshaken faith in humanity? How vividly her face and form come back to me as I sit writing of her! She was as plain in dress as in speech; “They try to fix me up and make me look stylish sometimes,” she told me, “but,” she added, “I don’t like it. I don’t want to think of my dress, there’s too much else to think of and to do. I’ve no time for the making or the wearing of frills. It’s what a woman does, not what she wears, that counts with me. I’ve no mind to be fashionable anyway,” and I hear yet the laugh with which she finished her remarks. And so it is that, when I look at her photo, taken when some one had “fixed her up,” another and dearer picture of her comes to my mind. A picture in which her soft, white hair is drawn smoothly back from her face, and coiled low down on the back of her head, her dress, guiltless of collar or tie, unfastened at the throat and turned back to give her ample breathing room, her waist untrammelled by girle or belt, her skirt short enough to be out of the way of her feet—never needing to be held up or thought of when she walked—in fact, the dress of a free woman who placed comfort before style, and to whom life was too busy and earnest, too filled with real things to have time or care for what she wore. Neat and tidy she always was, but unconventional and free. I called at her home informally at all hours—morning, noon, or night—and this was the garb in which she oftenest greeted me. This was as I saw and knew her in the summer days. As winter came on she dressed warmer, as we all do, but always in a way to leave her the free use of every member. In more formal dress she wore soft folds of white lace about her neck, but no stiff collars, no fetters of any kind for her.

As I have said, there was no formality about my visits. Wherever in the house she happened to be busy at the time I called, whether in kitchen, bedroom, or parlour, there she took me, there we talked and worked together, for, unless my stay must be very short, she would let me take part in her work, and thus I felt that I did not hinder her in any way, and stayed longer than I would have done had it been otherwise. Once it was the time of canning peaches; she led me out into the kitchen, where I found the dignified Professor Bickerdyke with one of his mother’s ample aprons fastened about his waist helping Lydia pare peaches, while she attended to the cooking and the canning of them. “Jimmy had nothing to do this afternoon, and these peaches needed taking care of right away, so I told him he might as well help us,” she said. At my request she gave me a can of peaches and a knife, and I, too, “helped,” and what a social, merry time we had over our work! She kept urging me to “eat them—eat all you can—they’re good for you.” “Yes, eat them,” said the Professor, “for what you eat mother won’t have to can. She is getting too tired, anyway”—so mindful was he ever of her comfort.

THE London Laymen’s Club are arranging a dramatic performance of the comedy “His Excellency the Governor,” on behalf of the “Boston Conference Fund, 1907.” The performance is to take place at the King’s Hall, King-street, Covent Garden, on November 21, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Lawford. Further particulars will be announced later.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE WORK OF OUR CHURCHES.

SIR,—Now that the holidays are over, work will soon be in full swing; ministers, secretaries, and committees are already devising ways and means of increasing the helpfulness of the churches.

May I say that the various sub-committees of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association hold their meetings early next week, and applications for grants of literature or money for special services or week-evening lectures should be sent to Essex Hall without delay. The committee are most anxious to be of service to any congregation desirous of making Unitarian Christianity a greater power for good in the town or district in which it is placed.

Your readers will be interested to learn that arrangements have been made by the committee for Dr. S. M. Crothers to deliver during October a week-night lecture at the following places:—October 2, Leicester; 3, Norwich; 9, Bolton; 11, Gee Cross; 16, Sheffield; 18, Liverpool; 23, Glasgow; 24, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

In Scotland, during November, arrangements are in progress for special services and week-evening lectures conducted by the Revs. Henry Gow, H. D. Roberts, and C. J. Street.

At Cambridge, the religious services conducted by Unitarian ministers will be reopened on Sunday, Oct. 14, when the Rev. John Page Hopps will preach, followed by Revs. Charles Peach, W. G. Tarrant, Alfred Hall, A. Hermann Thomas, George Critchley, Felix Taylor, and Charles Roper. The local committee trust that ministers, parents, and others will keep them informed of any young men or women who will be in Cambridge during next term.

There are new Unitarian movements at Blackburn, Newport (Mon.), and Wimbledon, which seem full of promise; ministers are wanted ready to undertake arduous, painstaking, devoted work at these centres.

The Unitarian Van Mission is proving once more that large numbers of people are ready to receive our Message, when presented in an effective and apostolic spirit. We are perplexed and cast down by difficulty and failure in some places, but if we have a message for the mind and heart of men, there are many in town and country who are eager to learn a truer and better way of life and religion than the old creeds present. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association exists that it may help men to reach this truer and better way. W. COPELAND BOWIE.

SERVICES AT CAMBRIDGE.

SIR,—As the beginning of a new academic year at Cambridge is drawing near, we would take this opportunity of reminding your readers of the services held there during the term.

It is three years since these services came into being, and as the period of University life is, in the ordinary course, of three years' duration, it is natural that for this ensuing year their vitality should tend to be below its normal strength. We are, indeed, losing the majority of those who were responsible for their foundation. We would therefore instinctively welcome all new energy. We would be glad to receive the name of any one of either sex who is coming up to the University from any of our churches and would care to be in touch with these services.

They begin on Sunday, Oct. 14, with the Rev. J. Page Hopps, and are held at 11, Emmanuel-street on Sundays at 11.30 a.m. Names for convenience may be sent to

R. MELDRUM.

St. John's College, Cambridge.

VETERAN TEMPERANCE WORKERS.

SIR,—In connection with the Jubilee Convention in London, Oct. 21-28, of the National Temperance League, I have been asked to send the names of members of our Unitarian Temperance Association who were in active work in 1856, so that they may be mentioned at the Veterans' Rally. As our Association has only just entered upon its 14th year, none of our members are apparently entitled to the honour, but there are many faithful veteran temperance workers in our churches whose names and work were prominent in 1856, and have so continued since.

If each of these would kindly send me a card, I shall be glad to make up the list.

W. R. MARSHALL.

31, Birkhall-road, Catford, S.E.

THE congregation of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton (a correspondent writes to the Manchester Guardian) traces its history back to 1672, at which date Robert Goodwin, who was vicar of Bolton at the passing of the Act of Uniformity, and came out with "the Noble Two Thousand," obtained a licence to preach in a house at the corner of Deansgate and Mealhouse-lane. Goodwin died in 1685; he was followed in 1689 by John Lever, and in 1692 by Robert Seddon, who, shortly before his death, presented to his people some land at the top of Bank-street, then known as "Windy Bank," for the erection of a chapel. The old meeting-house was built upon it, and opened in 1696; its bicentenary was celebrated at some notable gatherings in 1896. In 1854 a new chapel had become a necessity; the old one was pulled down and the present building erected on its site. The opening took place on August 21, 1856, when Robert Brook Aspland, of Dukinfield, was the preacher. At a meeting held afterwards in the Baths Assembly Rooms, among the speakers were Dr. J. R. Beard, his son (the Rev. Chas. Beard), Mr. Robert Heywood (Bolton's first mayor), and Mr. Joseph Crook, M.P. The jubilee of the present chapel is to be commemorated on September 30, when the minister, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, is to preach, and on the following Wednesday a re-union will be held in the Baths Assembly Rooms, at which the three surviving previous ministers will be present, viz., the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington (1864-73), the Rev. C. C. Coe (1874-95), and the Rev. C. J. Street (1896-1903). The congregation has throughout its history held an important place in the life of Lancashire Nonconformity and public service. It has at present about 440 members on its seat-holders' list, and is still growing.

ABERDEEN UNITARIAN CHURCH.

OPENING SERVICES.

THE new church in Skene-street, of which the hall has been in use for some weeks, was opened on Sunday with special services conducted by Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

On the previous evening a social meeting was held in the church hall, when there was a large attendance, and the proceedings were of an enthusiastic nature. Rev. Alexander Webster, minister of the church, presided, and amongst those on the platform were the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Dr. Ballantyne, Glasgow; Mr. H. B. Melville, Kirkcaldy; Dr. Wood, Dundee; Mr. Duncan M'Millan and Mr. John M'Millan, the architects, and others.

The CHAIRMAN said that was to him the greatest occasion of his ministerial life. That church had been in his mind night and day for a great many years. He hardly believed it existed, but he supposed it did. He hoped that church would be for the benefit of their congregational life, and that it would give them an opportunity, such as they never had before, of dealing with the city. It had long been his conviction that the old place was in no way suitable for them in these days. Their faith, as they believed, was a worthy faith, and he thought they should have a building worthy of it. The new building was in every way worthy of their cause, and he hoped they would have in it a happy life for many years to come. He would like to say in the presence of the architects, the Messrs. M'Millan, that they were very much pleased with the building, as the architects had designed it and the work had been executed. He was quite sure there was not another church like it in Aberdeen—he did not know one which had its freshness, and he wanted a reputation for sweet air as well as good doctrine. He congratulated the architects on a work which was a credit to them, and to the profession to which they belonged.

Mr. JOHN M'MILLAN returned thanks for the kind words Mr. Webster had used in regard to his father and himself. They all knew Mr. Webster's love for brother man, and he had extended that in the fullest degree to the architects. Mr. M'Millan also referred to the assistance they had received from the committee and others.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT said the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were glad to see a congregation with sufficient energy to undertake any such work as was accomplished there. He congratulated the chairman and all those concerned on the work which had been done. Unitarianism of to-day represented, rather than any particular doctrine, the desire for truth, and a building like that in a great university town, devoted to research after truth, must have a great influence. A town of cultured people could not be ignorant of the religious movements of the day, if they had a church whose object was truth, situated among them, especially with a building like that, with a congregation of considerable size, and with a minister of much distinction.

PRINCIPAL CARPENTER said that five years ago he had the pleasure to give some lectures in this city, and then, for the first time, became acquainted with their minister. Mr. Webster showed him the old church, and the situation which had already been secured for the new building. Mr. Webster told him many of his hopes and some of his fears in connection with it. Year after year the congregation and the minister had borne the brunt of that long and laborious toil, and they now rejoiced together on the work which had been accomplished. No doubt many tender recollections would gather round the old building, but it would not be long before new memories would begin to twine round that new house, and the new building would become enshrined in their hearts as a sanctuary of faith and devotion, more beautiful even than that old house which they had quitted. There was never a time which seemed so bright as the present for the truths which they believed they had to share with their fellowmen. As one looked back over the movement of the last 30 years, he saw how much had been done by scholars of many schools of Christian life and thought for the understanding of the Bible. It was very interesting to remember that it was from Aberdeen some thirty years ago that the first great impulse came, which opened up the new paths of scholarship in Great Britain, through the brilliant researches of Professor Robertson Smith, of whose memory Aberdeen might be justly proud. There came the question to all of them—when they had got their truth what were they to do with it? were they to share it with others? It was largely for that purpose that they had built that new house. The little crowd which gathered steadily from week to week would be only representative of the larger company which would more or less be influenced as they hoped and believed, by the work that was done and the words that were spoken there. A church existed no doubt primarily for the sake of those who constituted it, but he supposed that even in the most godly city in Scotland there was probably a larger proportion outside the churches than inside, and it must be the aim of every congregation to reach as many as it could, and gather them to what it conceived to be the highest interests of God, of duty, and the life to come. Any one walking along those splendid streets on a Sunday afternoon would see young men and women parading up and down, no doubt enjoying themselves in a wholesome way, but detached from the great religious thoughts and purposes and hopes of life. Those who had those thoughts and purposes and hopes should diffuse what was precious to themselves amongst others. Religion and integrity of character were most closely connected. It was for the building up of character that the Church existed. The Church that was not active in saving others would find considerable difficulty in saving itself, and it was only through a continual maintenance of the high purposes of work for their fellow-men that they could possibly hope to spread the love of God.

PRESENTATION TO MR. WEBSTER.

Mr. ALEX. ROBBIE said the congregation felt that the leader of the whole movement in connection with the erection of the church had been their most successful minister, and they thought that this was an opportunity of commemorating in a humble, but no less sincere, way the affection they bore towards Mr. Webster and their appreciation of his leadership. He asked Mr. T. M. Spiby to make a presentation to Mr. Webster.

Mr. Spiby then presented Mr. Webster with a handsome gold watch, subscribed for by the congregation as a token of their confidence in his ministry. They trusted that he would long be spared as their minister. The inscription on the watch was:—"Presented to Rev. Alexander Webster as a mark of affectionate esteem from his congregation, to commemorate the opening of the new church building, Aberdeen, Sept. 22, 1906."

Mr. WEBSTER returned sincere thanks for the generous gift. There were other men who had taken part in that work whose work should have been recognised before his. He would mention, for instance, the name of Mr. McRobb. He (Mr. Webster) had done nothing that deserved credit. He had simply done what he was impelled to do. He assured them that he was prouder than he could tell in having that house. He would always esteem their gift more than anything else, because it stood for their love towards him.

Mr. Spiby then presented Mrs. Webster with a silver tea service, and Mrs. Webster returned thanks.

Several other speakers spoke in congratulatory terms, and a programme of music was rendered during the evening.

THE SUNDAY SERVICES.

There was a large congregation both morning and evening at the opening services on Sunday. In the morning Principal CARPENTER said it was in 1833 that the first Unitarian preacher came to this city. Several years later their old church in George-street was built. Under a succession of pastors the little band of adherents had been slowly growing, and now they had raised that new home of faith and worship and of trust. He asked what lessons they had brought with them from the sanctuary which they had left, what hopes did they bring with them there, what truth would there be taught, what prayer would there be offered, what work would there be done, what thought should be wide enough to comprehend the purposes for which they had dedicated that house to the service of God and of man. He then proceeded to preach an eloquent sermon from 1 Tim. iii. 15—"The house of God, which is the church of the living God," in the course of which he pointed out the duty of the church to be always open to receive new truth.

Suffolk Village Mission.—Several parcels were sent for the Rummage Sale at Bedford from anonymous donors, besides others from those who enclosed name and address. Mr. Richard Newell wishes heartily to thank all with whom he cannot communicate direct, for their gifts.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: Hurst Street Mission.—The anniversary and harvest services, conducted by Mr. W. J. Clarke last Sunday, are reported as the most successful and inspiring ever held at the mission.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school anniversary was combined with the harvest festival on Sunday last, and the services were successful in every way. A numerous party cycled over from Taunton. The Rev. J. Worthington preached in the morning and evening, the morning lessons being read by Mr. C. E. Jewell, of Exeter, and J. Duckworth, of Taunton. In the afternoon Mr. Jewell conducted a service for children and parents, Mr. E. J. Yandale, of Taunton, reading the lesson.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual aggregate service was held on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 23, at the Hackney Chapel. The weather being fine, there was a strong muster of visitors from the various schools. The Rev. Henry Rawlings, who kindly conducted the service, welcomed the Union in the name of the Hackney school and congregation. His helpful address and the bright hymns and music were much appreciated. Programmes for the winter session may now be obtained from the hon. secretary, Mr. A. H. Verstage, Park Villa, Godalming.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—The Rathbone Club has issued an admirable programme of lectures to be given twice a month during the coming session on Thursday evenings. At the opening soirée on Oct. 4 the President, Mr. H. R. Rathbone, M.A., is to give an address; on Oct. 25 comes the first lecture, by the Rev. J. E. Manning, on "Plato." The Rev. C. Craddock follows on Nov. 15 with a lecture on "The Poetry of Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning in relation to Nature." Among the lecturers in the New Year are to be Miss Eleanor Rathbone, on "The Political Status of Women," and Professor MacCunn on "Stoicism."

London: Essex Church.—The next quarterly meeting of the London Guild's Union is to be held in this church on Wednesday evening, October 10, at 8 o'clock. There will be a religious service, when Dr. Crothers will preach.

Manchester: Broughton.—The welcoming soirée to the Rev. Henry Dawtreay, B.A., was held on September 19, when a large audience was present. Words of welcome were addressed to the new minister by the Revs. Principal Gordon, J. E. Manning, N. Anderton, and C. Peach, and Messrs. Fletcher Robinson, W. B. Haylings, and C. Hough. Mr. Dawtreay in his reply, thanked all those who had helped in the welcome accorded him. What had been said had been greatly encouraging. He had accepted the ministry at Broughton, because he knew it would be a hard place. He expressed himself full of hope and full of zeal. He had come, he said, not to work for his own cause, but for God's, and he hoped that the work would be fruitful, and that we should soon have a large church in Higher Broughton. Mr. Dawtreay urged his hearers to come to the services and encourage their minister; if they did this, success was assured. Some excellent songs were rendered during the course of the evening.

Oldbury.—A successful fancy fair was held in the school and grounds on Monday and Tuesday, September 17 and 18, in aid of the chapel funds. Councillor J. W. Growcott presided on the Monday, when the fair was opened by Mr. J. J. Lynam, and the vote of thanks was proposed by the Rev. W. G. Topping. Mr. Lynam said he was glad to do anything to further the work begun by his dear and much lamented friend, the late Rev. H. McKean, and to show his appreciation of the way in which Mr. Topping was carrying on his work. On the Tuesday, Mrs. J. Morgan, one of the oldest members of the congregation, opened the fair.

Whitby.—A very interesting feature of the service on Sunday evening last, at Flowergate Old Chapel, was the inauguration of a noble carved oak statue of a woman with her right foot on the neck of a serpent. The minister (Rev. F. Haydn Williams), after reading Genesis iii. 15, as the Hebrew version of the triumph of good over evil, which co-ordinates with the Greek myth of Apollo and the Python, and the story of St. George and the Dragon, presented the statue as the gift of Mrs. Tattersfield, one of the chapel trustees.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ANOTHER sermon by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, on "Östensö Church," preached after a holiday in Norway, appears in our present issue.

On Wednesday next, October 10, as we announced last week, the annual service of the London Guilds' Union is to be held in Essex Church, Kensington, when the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., will be the preacher. Though the service is primarily intended for the members of the five London Guilds, we are informed by the President of the Union that other friends will be cordially welcomed. The service is at 8 o'clock, and the church is easily reached from the Notting Hill Gate stations of the Tube or the Metropolitan.

THE Church Congress has been meeting at Barrow this week, under the presidency of Dr. Diggle, Bishop of Carlisle. "The most solemn fact I know about the Church of England to-day," said the Bishop, in his presidential address, "is that so small a proportion of the whole population, and a still smaller proportion of the male population, attends her public services. We condemn the indifference of the people; but our condemnation is unjust if we condone the shortcomings of the Church. And one of these shortcomings is that the world is too much in the Church and the Church too little in the world. No true Church will ever be of the world; yet will it always be, and be felt to be, in the world. Moreover, no healthy church will cling too closely to its past. Its healthiness will be manifested by its power of adapting its past to its present, and making its present a preparation for its future. Almost every age is to some extent an age of transition from a waning past to a waxing future; and a living Church must be the contemporary of each successive age.

DR. DIGGLE then spoke of the Oxford movement, from which the church had indeed gained something, but from which the time had now come to reckon up the losses; and he proceeded to ask some searching questions as to the true nature of authority and inspiration, pleading for a living church in touch with the realities of the present. The Church of England ought to be both primitive and progressive, not afraid of truth and enlightenment and clear-comprehensive thinking, "making life in God the basis of religion and life for man its evidence, bringing the light and power of the Gospel to bear on all national, intellectual, social, and moral problems; according a glad welcome to all reverent inquiry, and a loving embrace to every kind of truth; recognising the sacramental priesthood of the laity, of which priesthood the clergy are, through Christ and His Apostles, the ordained ministers? Shall we," he asked finally, "carnalise and materialise our holy religion? Shall we shrink from enlightenment and dread the iconoclasm of truth, and, magnifying hostilities among ourselves, show the world that we neither know nor care what human brotherhood means? Or shall we, for the sake of the Divine Redeemer and the sinful redeemed, close our ranks and sink our differences, resolute to break materialism in pieces with the forces of the Spirit of God, the God of all kinds of good knowledge, the Author and Giver of all kinds of truth, the loving Father of all men, in love of Whom all men of every race and church are brethren?"

THE Rev. F. B. Meyer delivered a stirring address at Huddersfield on Tuesday as President of the Baptist Union, at their Autumn Assembly. Human society, he said, was passing through one of the greatest revolutions of history. One most welcome sign of progress was the growing estimation in which the Inter-Parliamentary Union, in its efforts for arbitration and peace, was held. He used some strong language about the Tsar and the King of the Belgians, and then, turning to the Education question, urged Mr. Birrell to adopt a strong policy, in which they would give him unflinching support. As to the duty of their churches they needed earnest, educated, and travelled preachers, and he pleaded for a college at one of the national Universities. They ought to supplement denominational institutions by the enlarged horizon and bracing atmosphere which could be best communicated there. The concluding appeal of the address was for a practical gospel of social redemption, and regeneration for poor and rich alike.

THE opening of the Medical Schools on October 1 has long been utilised as a suitable occasion for the delivery of inaugural addresses by leaders in the medical world, whether as practitioners or professors. A review of the several speeches enables us to get some insight into the aims and ideals of medical education and service. Considering the great and growing function discharged by the doctors of the land, it would be foolish not to pause and ask ourselves what the thoughts are which animate those on whom the social well-being so largely depends. For, incalculable as are the personal needs of individual patients to which the physician ministers, the public office of the doctor is, perhaps, more far reaching and is continually increasing, as witness; by way of example, the growing call for medical supervision in the elementary schools.

WE notice in the first place the large amount of attention devoted to the subject of medical research. Thus Professor Iwan Pavloff, of St. Petersburg, addressing the students at Charing Cross, dealt entirely with this subject. The Russian Professor gave a full account of inquiries carried on by him in regard to the psychological processes of the higher animals, and mentioned particularly experiments on the excretion of saliva in cats and dogs. Dr. H. Campbell Thompson, at Middlesex Hospital, also treated on experimental research, and urged the pressing need for further public support of the medical schools. It may be that such support is lacking because the public is less convinced than the profession as to the need or the justification of vivisection.

ONE of the most widely interesting addresses is that of Professor Byers, of Belfast, to the women students at the Royal Free Hospital. Members of the medical profession are to regard their office as a trusteeship; they are to work for the betterment of life as "good citizens inspired with the desire of service." The lecturer then pointed out two directions in which there is an enlarging sphere for the work of medical women. The first is in connection with the medical inspection and supervision of school children. If the present Education Bill passes into law, there will be a great demand for such service, and we shall be able to put into practice some of the lessons in school hygiene taught to us by Scandinavia and Germany, which are at present so far ahead of us in this respect. The second point had to do with the prevention of infant mortality. Here, as Professor Byers tells us, our instructor is France. The long-continued decline in the birth-rate in that country has made the preservation of life a very urgent question. The same decline is taking place here, and on that account, as well as on other grounds, we too must prevent the waste of life. Professor Byers gave some account of the work being done in Huddersfield under the direction of two former Royal Free Hospital students—work which is based on the model of a French village near Dijon, and which is doing much to reduce the unsatisfactory death-rate in the Yorkshire town. These are a few of the topics of public interest, but they are sufficient to suggest that a collection of some of these addresses in pamphlet form would be of considerable popular value.

OF Gustav Frenssen's last novel, "Hilligenlei," published last November, 100,000 copies were sold in the first three months, and the book has been the subject of a great deal of discussion, especially in liberal religious circles, both on account of its moral bearings, and because, interwoven with the story of the Holstein peasant and sailor folk, there is a short life of Jesus, told from the standpoint of one who has accepted the results of German critical study of the Gospels in a somewhat extreme form. The writer, who is the hero of the story, called his work "The Life of the Saviour," presented in accordance with German research: the basis of German regeneration." Of this, and of the novel as a whole, we shall have more to say, and simply note here that an English translation, with the title "Holyland," has just been published by Messrs. Constable & Co.

"HILLIGENLEI" has not been so fortunate in its translator as "Jörn Uhl," of which the English version was issued by the same publisher last year. The work in the case of "Holyland" has been either too hastily done, or with an imperfect knowledge of German. Thus, in the Life of Jesus, in the description of parties among the Jews, "Fremdgläubigen" is translated "foreign beliefs" (p. 302), and on the next page, where the author has told of the last revolt of the Nationalist party, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and "bloody annihilation" of the people, the translator proceeds: "The people survived indeed," whereas the author is returning to the time of Jesus, to say that then indeed the people were still there, but as sheep without a shepherd. Then on p. 307 the translator makes Frenssen say that the boy Jesus criticised all the beliefs of his time, whereas in fact the statement is that he did not criticise, but accepted them all, as a child of his time. We need not multiply instances, but must warn our readers against the careless note at the end of the book, which gives a list of the authors consulted for the Life of Jesus. Werule, Urde, and Holtmann are merely misprints for Wernle, Wrede, and Hollmann, but "Historical and Religious Tales. By Schiele, Marburg," is too absurd, for the Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, the valuable series of popular handbooks, edited by Lic. Schiele, of which Bousset's "Jesus" is one. The reference to Professor Weinle is also misleading, as though he were the author, not simply the editor of the "Lebensfragen" series.

THE National Federation of Assistant Teachers met at Nottingham, last Saturday, some 400 delegates, representing over 16,000 members, being present, and passed the following resolution on the Education question. An amendment was moved, affirming that "a national and secular system" was the real solution of the difficulty, but the resolution was carried by a majority of five to one:—"This conference hereby expresses its satisfaction with those clauses of the Education Bill under which: (a) The present dual system of schools is partially abolished; (b) the Conscience Clause for scholars and teachers is made of a more genuine character; (c) further provision is made for the supervision of the physical condition of children in primary schools; (d) the present register of teachers is abolished; (e) compensation is to be granted to teachers who suffer financial loss through non-transfer to the local authority; but is of opinion that no Education Bill will permanently settle the present controversy unless provision is made for: (1) the complete abrogation of a State system of denominational schools; (2) the abolition of creed tests for teachers in State-aided schools and colleges; (3) a right of appeal for dismissed teachers."

A PAMPHLET on "The Peril in Natal," by "Gebuza," recently published by Mr. Fisher Unwin (3d. net) should serve as a useful warning against hasty judgment of the Native question. The story of the wrongs inflicted on the Natives, largely as a result of panic and misunderstanding, is sorrowful reading. "It is an ominous fact," says the author, "that speakers and writers on this side of the globe should continue in these days to harp upon the notion that the outlying districts of Natal are as dangerous as the Sioux-infested backwoods of Fennimore Cooper's novels, or as evil spots in England. The simple truth is that the journals of Natal may be searched in vain, from the date of its occupation, for any instance of Native attacks upon life or property other than individual breaches of the law, such as occur in all communities. A half-century's statistics of Native crimes against Europeans in the Colony would prove to be in striking contrast with the view usually presented of this matter in England. When this subject is debated, the usual criterion is that of arithmetic (10 Blacks to 1 White), coupled with assumptions as to the necessary tendencies of all savages. No appeal to history is suggested, and for a good reason. The actual experience of the Natal colonist is uniformly fatal to that theory of peril to the Whites, which has proved in the past to be a source of deadly peril to the Blacks."

WE have received from the Rev. F. B. Mott, of Southport, a letter in which he deprecates what he regards as our very inadequate review and appreciation of Mr. Hawkes's poem, "The Coming of Christ," in last week's INQUIRER. Mr. Mott does not convince us that our judgment was at fault; but, while we cannot publish the whole of his review of our review, we are quite willing that he should make his plea for the poem, and encourage readers to procure it, and judge for themselves. "I feel very keenly," says Mr. Mott, "that if your reviewer's notice is to be left as the only comment given to your readers, then, very many may easily form a judgment of the poem which would be far from worthy of it and might lead to their depriving themselves of the inspiration to be derived from reading and possessing the poem for themselves, and further, perhaps, check the efforts of others in the direction of making this new addition to our Unitarian literature known in circles beyond our own, where I think it is particularly calculated to do much helpful work for our faith. Surely a very inadequate conception of the poem is suggested by the absence from your reviewer's notice—an absence doubtless unintentional—of any appreciation of the restrained yet exquisitely delicate spiritual apprehension which permeates the poem from beginning to end. The singular simplicity of language, full of charm, never, so far as I am able to detect, anywhere throughout the poem presents a harshness, crudity, or colloquialism which jars against this pure and ennobling spiritual apprehension of the soul of Jesus."

THE extension of the Manchester Domestic Mission Society's station in Willert-street, Collyhurst, will be opened to-day (Saturday). The old premises, where the Rev. J. W. Bishop has been working for the last ten years, have proved too small for the many agencies carried on in them, and inconvenient for a Sunday-school of nearly 600 young people. The new and well-built premises form a handsome block of buildings in Willert-street, Guy-street, and Harrowby-street. The cost has amounted to nearly £1,500; but of the Extension Fund of £3,500, which was to cover the enlargement at the Renshaw-street as well, nearly £600 has still to be raised. The Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, will conduct the opening services in the afternoon, and a public meeting will be held in the evening, when the President of the Society will take the chair.

WE referred last week to Mr. Joshua Rowntree's book on "The Imperial Drug Trade. A Restatement of the Opium Question, in the light of recent evidence and new developments in the East," and stated the price, which was that of the first edition, as 5s. net. We are very glad to hear that a second edition, with some additional information, is now issued at 2s. Messrs. Methuen & Co. are the publishers.

SOCIAL REFORMERS.

V.—LEO TOLSTOY.

If great power as a thinker and as an utterer of thought, if beauty of character, and the mysterious influence that makes disciples are the marks of a prophet, Leo Tolstoy (born 1829) is clearly one of the goodly fellowship. I presume his life-story is generally known, at least in its main features. He has been his own biographer, and few modern writings of the kind are more transparently honest, more simply clear than his. Like another Augustine he confesses in public the sins of his youth, telling the story of his progress in social brilliance and literary fame, but also in early profligacy, and in a sceptic philosophy that resulted in a middle age of religious torpor. He became known far and wide, admired as a novelist, envied as a man of wealth and family, recognised as the promoter of liberal measures on his estates, and as a friend of education. But within the rosebud was a canker-worm. His nature was evidently susceptible in no ordinary degree to the influences of religion; yet he was a man of nearly fifty before he realised, first, that religion was a necessity to him, and, secondly, after a bitterly painful experience, what religion it was that alone could satisfy the hunger of his soul.

It is not my present task to analyse Tolstoy's theology; yet no adequate understanding of his position as a social reformer is possible without a knowledge of the chief thoughts upon God and man in which his mind at last, though late, came to rest, and which suffuse all his subsequent writings. I think, indeed, that the future study of his completed career will clearly reveal that the formative influences of social sympathy were already at work in him before he definitely took up theology, and that his view of Christianity became what it is largely through those influences. But no one who reads his works can doubt that, having once found in the words of Jesus the charter, so to speak, of emancipated society, his teachings on social subjects took on new and abiding illumination. He came, in the fulness of his maturity to the study of those Gospels which he had long ago relegated to neglect as an appanage of the puerilities of the "orthodox" Church. To his surprise, he found in those old pages the words of life. They lifted the burden from his soul, they confirmed his instinctive theism, they revealed God as a Father, and they showed him, as he believed, the one safe way of life, not only for the individual, but for mankind.

At first sight, and perhaps at second, we might conclude from Tolstoy's writings that he despairs of human society. He evidently regards society to-day as desperate. Its politics are a grief to him, its industry and commerce utterly vitiated, its art and literature largely corrupt and corrupting, and what it calls the Christian religion is, he believes, fundamentally opposed to the teachings of Christ. These teachings, so far as they are vital, he considers to be so explicit as to be unmistakable, and if they are directed primarily upon the inward life of the individual it is so that they may be of immediate practical application. His summary of the whole gospel into five commandments is well known, but I may usefully repeat it. The first injunction of Christianity, according to Tolstoy, is: "Offend no one, and by no act excite evil in others, for out of evil comes evil." The second is: "Be in all things chaste, and quit not the wife you have taken; for the abandoning of wives and the changing of them is the cause of all loose living in the world." Third: "Never take an oath, because we can promise nothing, for man is altogether in the hands of the Father, and oaths are imposed for wicked ends." Fourth: "Resist not evil, bear with offences, and do yet more than is demanded of us; neither judge, nor go to law, for every man is himself full of faults, and cannot teach. By seeking revenge men only teach others to do the same." Fifth: "Make no distinction between your own countrymen and foreigners, for all men are the children of one Father."

In illustrating the force of these cardinal rules of life, Tolstoy not only admits but maintains that they cut at the root of the present system of society. The first and the fourth clearly threaten our legal procedure with extinction, for he conceives it to be just as evil for society to kill or otherwise illtreat a person as for an individual to act so to his neighbour; and the application of the maxim "Judge not" lies not simply in prohibiting censoriousness, but also in forbidding the existence of tribunals. The capricious critic may query whether Tolstoy really appreciates the full force of his "fourth commandment," for to say absolutely that evil is not to be resisted would seem to preclude such resistance as takes the form of protest and argument—a resistance which he offers vigorously enough; while as to "teaching," his disciples expect it from him, and his last decades have been full of it. Omitting any comment on his second rule, as being engaged with a special problem of life, and one which, though of the gravest importance, is not so obviously concerned with the economics of society as the rest, it is clear that Tolstoy views the prohibition of oaths as specially solvent of our military organisations, and he is eloquent on the immorality of the surrender of one's self to the disposal of another. It is a comparatively small thing, granted the abolition of current ideas of property and justice and government—all of which he discovers to depend in the last resort upon violence—to be called upon to give up the spirit of local patriotism for one of universal brotherhood.

The limits of my space forbid enlargement on these points. It is of the utmost importance to observe, however, that not only does Tolstoy oppose the present constitution of civilised society, on the ground that it is based on violent coercion and the application of brute force, but he particularly impeaches our industrial system as founded on violence. One of the most striking of his essays on social subjects was published in 1900, with the title "The Slavery of Our Times." In this book he exposes some ghastly social facts, with the clear, quiet strength and simplicity of which he is master,* and which somehow pierce home where the invective of Carlyle or Ruskin leaves men mostly indifferent. His picture of human industry is, indeed, taken from Russian originals, and we may seek to parry his arguments by a reference to the system of restrictive legislation, which in this country limits (at least for many) the hours of labour, and is intended to prevent extremes of pressure on the workers. Let those who saw or heard of the recent "Sweating Exhibition" consider how far the good intentions of our legislators have been successfully carried out; and then let all consider a somewhat deeper matter. What is the real spirit of our industrial system when it is only by restrictive measures of the kind that even a tolerable state of things is patched up? Tolstoy maintains that "society," meaning by that term the comfortable few, is really less concerned with the health, well-being, and life of human creatures generally than with those of their horses and cattle. These inferior animals are rarely worked to death by their owners; men and women are ground down into abject poverty because, as Carlyle would grimly urge, they have no owner.

But, it may be urged, a very large number of our workers, probably the majority, are by no means so badly off. They get weekly wages, in many cases, quite sufficient to provide the necessaries and not a few of the comforts of life. Let this be granted; yet Tolstoy points out that the wages so earned cost the worker a disproportionate amount of toil, and he can only get them by giving up his liberty during the greater part of his working hours and by occupying himself in tasks, which are sometimes disgusting, occasionally harmful, and frequently benumbing to his finer faculties. This is not to live the life of a man, but of a slave; and if the slavery is but temporary as regards any one day or week, it is practically life-long for the bulk of the working population.

Why, then, do men submit to it? Because, says Tolstoy, they are actually compelled by the violence of governments, which are arrangements devised in the interests of those who have great possessions, and who especially hold that subtle claim on the poor which we call "capital." If it were not for the imposts of taxation rendered necessary by our costly hierarchies of officials, civil and military, if it were not for the heavy tolls exacted by the capitalists, and, finally, if it were not for the excessive "wants" stimulated in us by the spectacle of luxury, men might not only earn a living more easily but they would have time to live their own life. It is in the direction of such a consummation that Tolstoy would lead his disciples.

Of course, he is aware of the cold verdicts of so-called "economic science," and neither Carlyle nor Ruskin could be more scornful of them. The mountainous piles of literature on the subject are less than nothing to him; he sums them up as merely giving "such an explanation of the existing order of things as justifies some people in tranquilly refraining from labour, and in utilising the labour of others." He is, on the other hand, no less aware of the solutions offered by socialism, and in regard to this point he may be said to occupy a more advanced position than the social prophets which were before him. We have seen that in the case of all whom I have spoken of in these articles there has been a tendency, and something more, to find some solution in the nature of collective action, to be substituted for the largely haphazard individualism of to-day. Tolstoy will have none of it. He observes that the so-called "socialism" means tyranny no less than the present system. Many people have observed it who have been less inclined to perceive the tyranny which even now, according to Tolstoy, exists in all "civilised" countries.

What, then, would he have men do? Here we must pause to remind ourselves of a significant bit of Tolstoy's experience. In the prolonged crisis of his life, in the years (in the later "seventies") when he was painfully feeling his way towards a faith to live by, he studied the lives of men around him, and discovered that, while the idle rich were ever dissatisfied, the poor peasant, in spite of his drudgery, was generally better off in the things worth having—a quiet mind, a kindly helpful mood, a trustful spirit. Such a man, living close to nature, toiling on his own bit of soil and gathering in his own little harvests, could sleep well and, in the best sense, live well. Omne ignotum—the critic might exclaim. But Tolstoy has, as is well known, made loyal experiment of his theory, and he declares, as a practical man, that the "simple life," simple to bareness but filled with the "bread-labour" that brings health and at least enough to support healthful vigour, is the best life, it is the only "free" life, it is the true human life.

How far from this is the complex life of the city and the highly artificial life of most city dwellers! Would mankind escape the snares that imprison them? Let man resolutely obey the five Christian rules. Let them cease, so far as they can, every participation in the violent measures of governments. We can get on without all this machinery, he affirms. Let no one take office connected with violence; let no one voluntarily pay taxes, or accept government pay or pension, or make use of governmental institutions supported by taxes exacted by violence; let no one look to governmental violence for protection either for his property, his family, or himself, but if he possesses land or the products of toil, let him consider them his for disposal only so far as others do not claim them from him. And, so far as possible, let us refrain from benefiting by forms of industry that involve harshness or degradation to those employed in them.

It will be seen that the Tolstoyan ideal of human society as it should be differs very widely both from what now exists and from the ideals of many, if not most, social reformers. Certainly, he would not find Carlyle siding with him in the prohibition of force as a remedial and constructive agent; and, while Ruskin would assuredly substitute willing obedience for that which comes through coercion, it is equally clear that he would have scant sympathy for a "freedom" that would leave the foolish without the firm guidance of the wise. I can imagine Fourier rather enjoying the task of showing how, once the fetters of our vicious "civilisation" have been taken off, men would naturally gravitate through the stages of more or less solitary, or simple family agriculture, into the larger and more diversely organised groups which would yield the rich varieties of result and character he liked to contemplate. As for Mazzini, that champion of religious democracy, I should like to see the "Imaginary Conversation" some sympathetic adept would write as taking place between him and the great living prophet of revolutionary Russia.

I cannot pretend, here, to select among these typical Latterday Prophets, and to attempt to decide how far the suggestions of one or the other are practicable. All I can hope is that, however insufficiently quoted, the spirit of their utterances has not been unjustly represented, and that the very defects in my pictures may send the reader back again to the originals. Surely no one of us can look such men in the face and sink again into indifference to the cry of the poor which kindled in them the fires of a "prophecy" as real as any that ever burst from human lips.

W. G. TARRANT.

THE "OLD-FASHIONED ARTILLERY."*

MR. BENN'S two substantial volumes named below, offer us a history of "rationalism" in England in the nineteenth century, with chapters on the co-operative influences of philosophic thinking, and on analogous "rationalistic" movements in the eighteenth century. By "rationalism" the author understands "the mental habit of using reason for the destruction of religious belief" (vol. i. p. 4); by "religious belief" he means "theological dogma" (p. viii.); and he makes no secret of his own liking for "the old-fashioned artillery of purely destructive rationalism" (vol. ii. p. 473). His work is, however (with the exception of the opening chapter on "Rationalism and the Methods of Faith"), not controversial, but historical; and we may say at once that the author's wide and careful reading and literary skill make his book to be of real value and interest, more especially to Unitarians and liberal religious thinkers of every school.

Such readers will strongly dissent from an intellectual prejudice which the author, like most "rationalists" and "free-thinkers," shares with the ordinary "orthodox" writer. We refer to the prejudice which insists that the speculative, the historical, and the moral elements in religious belief are all on the same level, and constitute simply so much "dogma" to be dealt with by the same methods of attack and defence: so that the existence of God, and the six-days creation, the moral teaching of Christ and his bodily resurrection, his divine inspiration and his miraculous birth, in each case stand and fall together. But when full allowance is made for this, it is still a great advantage to have such an able and comprehensive account of the ways in which the foundations of dogmatic orthodoxy have been undermined during the last century.

The liberal religious thinker will also strongly object to the view that religious belief is nothing more than dogma. A recent writer has very well said that "by its wonderful power of accommodation religion continually gives fresh proof of its real independence alike of historic fact and historical criticism; this process of adaptation, by which religion is constantly shedding the accidents which it had for a time mistakenly incorporated into its message, is the despair of the rationalist, for it seems to reduce his long polemic to a labour of Sisyphus." It is possible for religion to be thus "independent" because it is more than dogma. It is just this independence of scientific fact and historical criticism that to the rationalist constitutes the utter hollowness of religion and to us constitutes its abiding vitality. Religious dogmas are imperfect mental interpretations of real experiences, whose form of expression depends on the general social and intellectual advancement of the age.

In speaking of the "deistic" writers of the eighteenth century, Mr. Benn makes an observation more important than he himself appears to realise. "The single-minded, almost fanatical enthusiasm with which the deists devoted themselves to attacks on Revelation and to the inculcation of natural religion is unique in history. As a consequence of this sectarian attitude, they lived on the creed they criticised, and shared the decline of its vitality. Their position, in fact, very much resembled that of the hero of one of Hauff's fairy tales, who has always as much money in his pockets as the gamester against whom he habitually plays, and consequently finds himself penniless at the moment of complete success. Rationalism could make no further progress until it became associated with the general interests of advancing knowledge, with the enjoyment of beauty, with the cause of suffering humanity" (vol. i. p. 159). To say that "they lived on the creed they criticised and shared the decline of its vitality" is to express precisely the characteristic weakness of rationalism, and of all criticism that is merely destructive. The same charge has been brought against Unitarianism; and in so far as Unitarianism takes up a critical attitude, the charge cannot be repelled. But the critical attitude is a necessary one. The damaging character of the charge will be greater or less according to the value and efficacy of the positive contributions which are put in place of the beliefs attacked. "Rationalism" has made no positive contribution, nor put forward any positive view of the world (except in that sense of the word "positive" which means "negative"). Mr. Benn speaks of rationalism being "associated with the general interests of advancing knowledge, with the enjoyment of beauty, with the cause of suffering humanity." If he means that these constitute the positive faith which rationalism seeks to substitute for theology, then it is high time that rationalists stated and defended this faith in some intelligible and systematic form, and proved in particular that the third of these desirable aims is compatible with the cosmic process as physical science reveals it. In the meantime, it may be remarked that interest in knowledge, in beauty, and in the claims of suffering humanity is not peculiar to nor distinctive of "the mental habit of using reason for the destruction of religious belief"; and rationalism cannot justify itself simply by claiming "association" with" these things. It must prove that they are the organic and necessary outcome of "rationalist" principles.

The truth is, of course, that "rationalism" is justified only so far as active negative criticism is essential to the progress of thought. Such criticism has its place and its rights. The great merit of Mr. Benn's work is that—unlike the writers of the "Rationalist Press Association"—he does not throw dust in his own and his readers' eyes by parading "rationalism" as if it were a great positive system capable of redeeming and uplifting the world. He defines it as just what it really is—negative criticism pure and simple; and his book may be taken as an extended historical proof of the importance of such criticism as a factor in the modification of dogma. He illustrates this effectively when commenting on Lecky's "History of Rationalism," the main argument of which is fairly described as follows:—"His (Lecky's) one original idea is that certain theological dogmas are abandoned, not because they are proved to be irrational, but because, to use a telling expression of his own, intellectual and moral changes have produced a climate in which they cannot live. . . . Physical science creates a general impression that there are no isolated interferences with the course of nature; a belief in miracles is incompatible with that impression, and therefore the belief ceases to be entertained. Religious persecution follows on the belief in endless future torments; but that belief is incompatible with modern philanthropy and modern theories of penal discipline, and accordingly it has disappeared or become inoperative, carrying the practice of persecution along with it" (vol. ii. p. 249). That there really is such an intellectual and moral "climate" in which certain beliefs cannot live is an extremely important fact; but while Lecky's statements emphasise this fact, they are only a partially true account of the progress of thought and the modification of beliefs. Their importance lies in a direction which is not—so far as we can remember—pointed out by Mr. Benn. The latter, indeed, goes out of his way to remark that Lecky's "History of Rationalism" has "very much in common with the modern Unitarian standpoint" (vol. ii. p. 252), the points of affinity being apparently a negation of the supernatural, a rejection of everything inconsistent with the demands of reason and conscience, and a preservation of the name Christian as "an attractive title for a mild social philosophy, among whose characteristics love of truth figures, oddly enough, as a specifically Christian virtue." It may very well be true that Lecky's views as to the supernatural, and as to the demands of reason and conscience, are the same as those of Martineau; the gibe concerning a "mild social philosophy" is probably well deserved, in view of the invertebrate condition of our ideas about social Christianity; but Mr. Benn—as other parts of his book show—is not so blind to facts as to suppose that the attitude of simply waiting for development is characteristic of a "sect everywhere spoken against" for its real or supposed "negations"! The real importance of Lecky's position is this: it represents the characteristic attitude and characteristic weakness of the "Broad" party in every orthodox Church to-day. The "Broad Churchman" of the present day may be described in George Eliot's words (quoted by Mr. Benn, vol. ii. p. 247): "One who does not know how far he goes, but knows that he does not go too far." The Churches are advancing with the times; why make a disturbance to hurry them on? The practical conclusion is to await developments rather than anticipate them. To swim in the centre of the current is the best way to avoid sudden shocks and rude recalls. This may be sound ecclesiastical policy, but it is not sufficient for the demands of truth. Direct attack upon error is as necessary to the intellectual life as the voluntary suppression of vicious habits is to the moral life.

In view of what we have been saying our author's account of the Broad Church (including the Unitarian) movement will repay examination in another paper. For the rest, we can only give a very brief account of the general course of his treatment. The opening chapter, which deals with the large and vexed question of testing beliefs by their results, cannot be dealt with in this place. The discussion which follows (dealing mainly with rationalism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries) does not seem to be either very interesting or necessary for the author's purpose; but from chapter vi. (an excellent account of Coleridge) onwards the interest is well sustained. The controversies in which the early Utilitarians were engaged, the Oxford movement and evangelicalism, the "Turn of the Tide" (rising interest in physical science in the forties), and the influences of Comte, Carlyle, and Mill, occupy the remainder of vol. i. In vol. ii. the main landmarks are "The Unitarians and the Broad Church" (W. R. Greg, Maurice, Jowett, Mansel), the onset of Biblical criticism and evolutionary science (followed by attempts at "Compromise and Conciliation"—e.g. Lecky), Rationalism at the period of Tyndall's Belfast address, the rationalistic influences of Hegelianism, James Martineau and Frederick Temple, recent developments of the Historical Method. These volumes are certainly full of variety and interest.

A SUPPLEMENT TO MARTINEAU'S LAST HYMN-BOOK.*

It is very natural that the congregation of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, should be unwilling to abandon the use of Dr. Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," in the church of which he was the first minister, and should choose rather to meet the urgent need, inevitable after the lapse of more than thirty years, for the inclusion of new hymns among those available for their worship, by the publication of a Supplement. It may be that there are other congregations, which feel the same need, and have a like reverent affection for the old book. In that case they should communicate at once with the minister of Hope-street Church.

* "Supplement to Hymns of Praise and Prayer," with which is bound up the "Psalms and Canticles for the use of Hope-street Church, Liverpool." (The Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 70, Lord-street, Liverpool, 1s. 6d. net.)

A limited supply of the Hymns alone, in sheets, can, we understand, be had by any congregation wishing to adopt this Supplement.

The Supplement contains 204 hymns, and contributions have been gathered from 79 fresh authors, out of a total of 109, though by no means all of these are moderns, subsequent to the date of Hymns of Praise and Prayer. Of the hymns the greater part are naturally found also in the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal and in the New Hymnal. 139 of the 204 hymns are in E.H., and 125 in N.H., 95 of these being common to all three. 35 of the Supplement's hymns are in neither of the others. Of these several are by old writers (Bowering, Bulfinch, John Quincy Adams, Sarah Flower Adams, &c.), but the majority are distinctly modern, and for the most part in the section on "Human Life." One is Mr. Tarrant's "Hymn of the City," published in these columns just a year ago.

Of the character of the Supplement the preface gives the following account: "A comparison of the classification of Hymns of Praise and Prayer with that of the present Supplement will suffice, not only to mark differences, but chiefly to indicate enrichment and additions. The tone and accent of the hymns chosen are our own, and suggest the significance of our changing outlook upon Human Life. Life and Being tend to become magnificent in our eyes; neither essentially degraded nor merely preparatory. We are coming more and more to believe that Eternity is concerned with Now, and that the Kingdom of God is Here. In a grander sense than ever, we realise the universality and immanence of the Divine Will; and in this realisation we would sing our songs of the Kingdom."

Stopford Brooke, Hosmer, Gannett and Chadwick are among the chief of those who in this Supplement furnish the expression for this new conviction, while large contributions are also made from Whittier and Samuel Longfellow, and among others from whom more than one hymn has been taken are Lowell and Samuel Johnson, Mrs. Armitage, Page Hopps, Savage, Blatchford, Hawkes, Chalmers, and Tarrant.

The real worth of hymns is tested by habitual use. We should be interested to hear whether it is possible to sing the very irregular verses from Whittier's poem, "My soul and I," beginning:—

"The present, the present is all thou hast." Another fresh selection from Whittier is very welcome, 829, beginning: "O Strong upwelling prayers of faith," and especially the verses:—

And most avails the prayer of love,
Which, wordless, shapes itself in deeds,
And wearies heaven for nought above
Our common needs.

Which brings to God's all-perfect will
That trust of his undoubting child,
Whereby all seeming good and ill
Are reconciled.

And, seeking not for special signs
Of favour, is content to fall
Within the providence which shines
And rains on all.

Less manifestly at home in a hymn-book are Tennyson's lines, 960, beginning "Love thou thy land with Love far brought."

We note a few errata. The first line of 902 should read "He whom the Master loved" (not who). In the Index of Authors, under Appleton, 1846 is not the date of his birth, but of the "Book of Hymns," in which his hymn first appeared. The Elliott should be Ebenezer, not Charlotte, as correctly given in the text. In the index of first lines there is a funny row of commas after the initial "O's" which fortunately do not appear in the text of the hymns. Other mistakes in the first lines we will leave to the research of those interested.

But what we specially want to do in this notice is to call attention to the excellence of this Supplement, and specially for the sake of those whose want for the further enrichment of their hymnody it may be able to supply.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Interlinear Bible: The Authorised Version and the Revised Version, together with the Marginal Notes of both Versions and Central References.—Here we have our English Bible presented in both the Authorised and Revised Versions simultaneously, not printed twice over in parallel columns, as has been previously done; but the text where it is identical printed in a fine bold type, and wherever there is variation in so much as a word or in the punctuation, dividing into an upper and a lower line of much smaller type, until the sentence merges once more into the identical text, and the one line of large type goes on again. Where a verse has been rejected by the Revisers as spurious, as in the case of the notorious "three heavenly witnesses" of 1 John v. 7, only the one small type line of the Authorised Version appears, and a blank in the upper line shows where omission has been made. Thus, as one glances over the pages, one sees at once the amount of revision, and can study the variations with the least amount of trouble. For this purpose the book will be most valuable to students; but for the reading of either version continuously, it must be confessed that the small type of the double lines makes it a very trying process. The book is beautifully produced, and printed on India paper. There are twelve maps with an index. (Cambridge University Press: In cloth, 12s. 6d. net.; in French morocco, 21s. net.)

The Treasury of Sacred Song, selected from the English Lyrical Poetry of Four Centuries, with notes explanatory and biographical by Francis J. Palgrave, late Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford.—A new and cheaper edition of this well-known collection will be warmly welcomed by lovers of sacred song. First published in 1889, sixteen thousand copies were issued in the first three years, and the book has been deservedly popular. But for a new edition, dated 1906, a little trouble might surely have been taken to bring the index of authors up to date. In the case of eleven of the authors the dates of birth and death should now be added, the Tennysons, Christina Rossetti, and Coventry Patmore being among their number. When the revision is made the date of Miss Procter's birth should also be corrected from 1835 to 1825. (Oxford: Clarendon Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Upper Goal: The Way Thither for the Bottom Dog, a Review of "Not Guilty; a Defence of the Bottom Dog," by Robert Blatchford. By Alexander Webster.—Four of the seven chapters of this spirited critique and earnest statement of the better faith were delivered by Mr. Webster as Sunday evening popular lectures at Aberdeen. The work criticised is set down as the emotional sally of an impressionist. While fully acknowledging the depth of Mr. Blatchford's sympathies, and the true motive of his work, "permeated by the emotion of redemption," the book is yet condemned as "crude in conception, hasty in execution, and lacking in the scientific quality." The writer "imagines that he reasons, but he only asserts." He has failed to recognise vital factors in human nature. The exposure of his misconceptions is vigorously carried out, and Mr. Webster goes on to vindicate the reality of human responsibility and the power of self-determination to mould the future of mankind. His own position of religious faith is well stated in this passage:—

"Till a man takes his selfhood up into the holy region of sympathy with the Highest, to make himself a means of higher life to others, he has not entered upon his proper being. Selfless we are not allowed to be, but self-devoted to human weal we should be. Our selfhood is not our own: it belongs on its social side to the race, and ought to be given to it in fullest power. We lose our own private and partial desires in that loftier region, and find all that belongs to us amplified and glorified in our connection with the larger whole. We do not renounce ourselves or become passive creatures of heredity and environment, but give ourselves in capableness to augment the general life, and in giving find ourselves fuller than before." Mr. Webster speaks as one who has a desire for a true Socialism and a real Religion. We must hope that his plea will obtain a wide hearing among those who have supposed that there is no other alternative for faith than that between the teaching of Mr. Blatchford and the orthodoxy which he mistakes for present-day religion. (London: Hendersons, 16, Paternoster-row; and at Essex Hall. Aberdeen: H. Munro, Crown-street. 6d. net.)

We are very glad to receive a fourth edition of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's God and the Soul: An Essay towards Fundamental Religion.—First published in 1896, a third and cheaper edition was issued in 1904 (the Sixpenny People's Edition). The new edition has been entirely reset, and is admirably printed in larger type. A brief preface refers to the memoir of the author by his son, Mr. George Armstrong, published with a selection of sermons at the beginning of this year, and quotes this passage from the Preface of 1904: "The standpoint is that of one who heartily and without after-thought rejoices in every advance of knowledge in every field, and desires to retain in his thought no opinions whatever that clash with or are contradicted by the newer knowledge; one who, nevertheless, believes that the religious element in man is primary and permanent, and that God has direct messages for the human soul, and that the human soul has direct access to the living God." (London: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 2s. net.)

The First Three Gospels, Their Origin and Relations, by J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., D.Litt., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, is also now in the fourth edition, the second of the People's Sixpenny Edition, in which a few verbal corrections have been made, and an index of passages in the three Gospels to which reference is made has been added. We have already called attention to the very valuable constructive chapter on the historical Jesus, which was added two years ago to the People's Edition. CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LATE MR. A. M. BOSE.

SIR,—In the two admirable notices of our friend Ananda Mohun Bose which appear in your last issue, the only thing I miss is some reference to his last great oratorical effort, about this time last year. He had already been, to use his own words, "secluded from the world by serious illness for nearly a year," and was destined to endure another year of suffering and seclusion before the inevitable end, when the call came to him to take his share in the patriotic opposition to the partition of his beloved Bengal. It may be that he somewhat over-estimated the mischief to be apprehended from that much-debated measure; but for me the bare fact of so intense a feeling being aroused in so typical a representative of all that is best in modern India is sufficient to outweigh almost any amount of mere administrative convenience. Be that as it may, the scene to which it gave rise will not suffer by comparison, for pathos and dramatic interest, with the last speech of Chatham in the House of Commons. Borne in a litter to the place where the foundation-stone was to be laid of a new "Federation Hall," intended to symbolise the indissoluble moral union of the officially separated provinces, voted by acclamation into the chair, he addressed the vast gathering in a few Bengali sentences, and then handed in the speech that he had prepared, but had not strength to deliver, to be read by Mr. Surendranath Banerjea. It has since been printed with some other matter as a pamphlet, and any one who reads it will have no difficulty in understanding the profound impression that it is said to have made. The tone in which he counsels a policy of determined passive resistance is marked by a rare combination of religious fervour and sweet reasonableness. Here is a specimen which should—if your space will admit it—be of interest to University men: "I have heard of people, and even of respectable journals, which speak glibly of the lawlessness and disobedience to authority of our student community. Let me bear testimony—and this I can do from personal knowledge—as to what is thus described as lawlessness and disobedience on the part of students of British universities, whom our students would not even dream of approaching in this respect. I will not pause to give examples, numerous and glaring as they are, but wonder whether our rulers and critics, most of whom, I presume, have passed through the universities of their country, have so forgotten the experience of their own student days. Why, our students are absolutely spotless in comparison with British youths, as indeed I believe they are practically spotless, not as a matter of comparison only but by themselves. Let us, my friends, continue in the same career, regardless of our own personal interests and all individual and sectional jealousies. For if the true spirit of loving sacrifice, and nothing of a baser admixture, be ours, surely God will provide for us, and for you, my student friends, and grant us true happiness and the true blessing—how great those only who have tasted it can say—of a self-consecrated existence. Let us all specially see to it, that no lawlessness characterise, or even tinge our proceedings. Let us be the victims, if need be, but never the perpetrators of wrong."

CHARLES DICKENS AND LITTLE PORTLAND STREET CHAPEL ACCORDING TO MR. CHESTERTON.

SIR,—The period of Dickens's connection with Little Portland Street Chapel dwindle in a most remarkable way. Forster stated it as two or three years. The author of the Life contained in "The Dictionary of National Biography," translated this into a year or two, but Mr. J. K. Chesterton, in his recent volume on Dickens, knocks off the years of the last statement, and substitutes weeks. "Once in a puff of anger at the Church's political stupidity (which is indeed profound) he left it for a week or two and went to a Unitarian Chapel; in a week or two he returned" (p. 218).

After investigating the subject I find that Dickens and his family joined the congregation on November 20, 1842, and continued their attendance until some date in the year 1847, a period of between four and five years, though his absences from home, including the residence of nearly a year at Genoa, would of course curtail the possible attendances during that period. This circumstance, and others connected with Dickens's relationship to Nonconformity, receive full treatment in a small work which I am preparing on the subject.

RELIGION is not a subject to be formally defined: it is a great experience into which we may enter.—S. M. Crothers.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN these days of photographs and beautiful prints of great paintings, most of us have our own private little collection of favourite pictures, very often in our bedrooms. We like to hang there pictures that we love, to look at when we are alone, yet not alone, especially pictures of holy subjects that have to do with our best thoughts. There are some pictures that many of us love and have, such as "The Light of the World," by Holman Hunt, the child Samuel kneeling in the Temple, and the Good Shepherd tenderly carrying on his shoulder the lamb that was lost. These pictures we all know and love. But there is another, and one which, I think, means more to me than any other sacred picture and which is not quite so well known. It is by Ford Madox Brown, and is called, "Christ Washing Peter's Feet." It is in the Tate Gallery (No. 1,394), and you can get photographs of it, in all sizes, at Mansell & Co., 405, Oxford-street, and you may buy it on a picture post-card.

Madox Brown was a friend of Rossetti, Burne-Jones, &c., one of the group of artists who resolved not only to be exactly true and faithful in their drawing and painting, but also to express in their work always some true and beautiful thought or feeling.

The thought in this picture you will find in St. John's Gospel, chapter xiii. It is the thought that Jesus was most anxious to leave with his disciples, when he knew he was going away and must leave them to carry on his work and to go on teaching people, the message God had entrusted to him. It is always sad to think how difficult Jesus found it to make even those chosen friends who were always with him, and heard him constantly teach and preach, understand what he meant. He was never vexed with their slowness, always patient with them; but one does feel it hard that just near the end of his work "there was a strife among (the disciples) which of them should be accounted greatest," and that James and John, the sons of Zebedee, should be asking him, so childishly, whether they might sit, one on his right hand and the other on his left, when he was in heaven, in glory, after his death. How was he to teach them the truth he strove so often and passionately to bring home to them, "whosoever will be great among you let him be your minister," "whosoever will be chiefest let him be servant of all"?

As he sat at that last supper table with his disciples, full of the thought that his time for leaving them had come, he longed to bring home to them in some way, once and for all, of what spirit he would have them be. Suddenly he rose from the table, and girding a towel round his waist he took a basin of water and went round the table, kneeling, to wash the feet of each disciple in turn. Peter, when the turn came to him, protested passionately—he could not bear his Lord to kneel to him; but Jesus sternly compelled him with the words, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." And then Peter, always passionate and impulsive, exclaims, "Not my feet only, but also my hands and my head."

In the picture we see the strong, patient figure of Jesus, so full of strength and majesty even with the head bowed in meekness, kneeling to perform this lowliest act. Peter, with hands clenched on his knee and head sunk on his breast, is enduring it in a tumult of feeling; John, with the deep, dreamy eyes of love, is loosening his head beside for his turn; other disciples are watching, musing and whispering, trying to understand the Master's meaning; and Judas Iscariot is sitting, clutching his head between his hands, in an agony to think that the Lord should be going to touch his feet—his, whose soul is black with treachery.

Then we read how Jesus, when seated once more in his place among them at table, tries to rivet the lesson on their minds with the words, "If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet." And this grand thought has come down through the ages to us who would also be Christians, disciples of Christ; and Madox Brown has tried to express it in his picture.

It will take us all our lives and more to learn the lesson. Some seem to get near to understanding it. I knew a nurse in a hospital who seemed to me one of these. One night a poor sick woman was brought into that hospital, drunken and filthy. She could not live many days, and so terrible a state was she in that most of the nurses even were willing to leave the poor wretch as she was. But the one nurse could not bear to do that—even this poor thing was her sister, a child of God. She went to her and tended her, and made her poor body clean and sweet, so that her last days were pure and wholesome. It is not many of us who have such opportunities of devoted service, but all our work may be done in the same spirit.

I have sometimes felt humiliated at the way in which working women talking to a lady will think it a sign of respect to take for granted that one could not do lowly work, that one is quite ignorant of all the ways of lowly service, and could not stoop to soil one's hands. Have we so learned Christ? It seems to me Jesus would not wish his disciples to let any brother or sister do for them what they would feel degraded by doing themselves. Service of all kinds, any work that is helpful to others, should be a delight and a privilege; not, as is so often thought by the world, a degrading hardship, to be done because men and women must earn money to live.

But there are many ways in which this lesson of Christ's is still for us to learn. What we have to do is to let that picture of Jesus kneeling to do that lowly act sink into our minds and hearts, as I think it must have done into the hearts of those simple "chosen few," never to be forgotten. Then, when an opportunity of being of use comes we shall be eager and thankful to have the privilege of being helpful. As George Herbert says:—

"Be useful where thou livest, that they may Both want and wish thy pleasing presence still:

Find out men's want and will,
And meet them there. All worldly joys go less,
To the one joy of doing kindnesses."

THE NEW SEASON'S WORK.

OCTOBER once more brings all the forces of the churches into line for a new season of more strenuous work. Plans are laid for the winter. Programmes of social and educational activity are completed, and the meetings of various societies have already begun. The minister's mind, after the unbending and refreshment of a good holiday, is set upon new efforts of more helpful preaching, and has perhaps already thought out some fresh lines of teaching, and courses of special sermons or lectures have been announced. Everywhere active energy is earnestly set upon the doing of better work. The rallying note, let us hope, has not been unheard or unheeded by any member or a single church.

And what, let us ask, is the ruling impulse in all this organising of the forces, this common effort moving forward by so many different ways into the field of service? It is of the work of the churches that we are thinking, and of which we have here to speak.

At the heart of all the true work of the churches is the thought of God. The great end always is to realise and live out our true life in Him, in the communion of worship, in the fellowship of worshippers, in the life of service in the world, to which that communion prompts and for which it keeps the fire of inspiration burning. Worship and work are not to be separated, as secular and sacred, when rightly understood, are one. The whole of life is to be consecrated. All common things are to be done in the pure spirit of reverence, in the light of faithfulness to God and man, with the constant sense of a hidden communion with the Highest, true to the ideal of a whole-hearted brotherhood. And worship, of which we never fathom half the depth of the riches open to the child-like, reverent, and rejoicing heart, is to be at the same time the moving spirit of habitual service in daily life, the prayer strenuously making for a true control of temper and disposition, the maintaining of the bonds of brotherly love, and the right ordering of every kind of work.

Thus, as we set ourselves to enter upon the new season's work, the first thought for us as members of the churches may well be of the times of united worship. Let these be guarded with a greater faithfulness, and their treasure sought with a new earnestness. As one people we are to come together, to be led in the true way, to be more attentive to the Truth teaching inwardly, to deepen our sense of the Divine Presence, to be glad together in the thought of the Love Eternal and the Mercy, which is from one generation to another, to bring our common needs into that Presence, to find a fuller utterance for our thanksgiving, to realise more perfectly the great communion of our hidden life, and among our own people, in a special sense, the fellowship of CHRIST'S disciples, and all that it means in keeping us true to the ideal of the highest life of the children of God. At every new departure in the progress of our life, striving for a fuller measure of faithfulness, this pleading with our own hearts must be renewed, to bring a new spirit of more perfect trust and gladness and reverent seeking into the hour of worship, to make our prayer more simple and sincere, more of a truly common prayer, and the voice of thanksgiving the living voice of the whole people. They it is who actually are the church. A great trust is laid upon the minister, but not on him alone. Every member of the church is called to help, to bring his own gift in the true spirit of worship, to be as a living stone in that building of God, which shall be indeed a place of rest and of rejoicing for weary souls, for the kindling of new life, and of victory of the good over evil, a veritable house of prayer.

And then, out of this happy privilege of worship, this communion, in truest human fellowship, with the unseen and eternal, there comes the impulse of service. The spirit of prayer goes forth into lives of daily faithfulness. The worship and the work act and react one upon the other. The fountains of faith and love flow for the cleansing of the stream of life, the nourishing of the noblest growths. Work in all honourable fields, and, above all, work for others' needs, kindled by a passionate sympathy into strenuous efforts for amelioration and reform, brings a deeper tone into prayer, a new passion of devotion, and self-surrender into the communion of the hour of worship. If, therefore, we seek for more of the true spirit of prayer in our churches, we must see to it that our work is done in a like spirit of faithfulness, and with love, glad to be used for the highest ends, unwearied in well-doing.

ÖSTENSÖ CHURCH.

A SERMON OF NORWAY AND THE REAL THINGS OF LIFE.*

BY RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

"I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the House of the Lord."—Ps. cxxii. 1.

THE last public religious service I attended was amid surroundings very different from those in which we meet to-day. Instead of the mighty city, the silent stretch of mountain and of fiord. Instead of a crowd of competing churches all around, one little church to which the peasants flocked from all the countryside.

I suppose there is no country in the world where a Sunday's service is more impressive than in Norway. It is not of splendour of ritual, or fragrance of incense, or glory of music that this impression comes, but of simplicity and earnestness and unity of heart.

Let me try to describe the scene as it passed before my eyes three weeks ago this morning.

A long arm of the fiord stretching up to the shingly beach, the little wooden pier standing out into the clear water—water in which every pebble was bright and clear at a depth of twenty feet—the great hills all around, timber and foliage profuse beyond anything we know at home, the deep blue sky mirrored with the mountain sides in the quiet bay, the pretty village with its wooden houses, white and yellow and red and brown, nestling on the gentle slope between the water and the wood, and in the midst the quaint wooden church with its graveyard round, where lay the dust of so many of the fishers and the farmers and the woodmen of the generations passed away.

On the strand were drawn up many row-boats, for it was "preaching Sunday" here to-day, and not only through forest and over the hills had the congregation come from all the hamlets round, but each village on the coast had sent its complement by sea of strong men and comely women, and of lads and lasses, who should attend the minister's preparation class before the public service should begin. And so we wound our way up to the churchyard. There were gathered together the peasants in quiet groups—hundreds and hundreds of them. The young folk verging towards manhood and womanhood were all inside at the preparation class. But here were the fathers and mothers, and their fathers and mothers too, and the little children, and the young men and women already confirmed—sitting on the graves, leaning on the palings, strolling up and down, waiting till the door should open for the public service. And then, when it did open—what a throng! We pressed in as early as we could, but already the church seemed full in every part—and scores and scores pressed in after us—till presently every spot was covered, aisles and communion-space, people sitting and standing everywhere, and each long, narrow pew two deep—a row standing in front of each sitting row, till the church was crammed to fully twice its natural capacity.

And what a congregation! On one side the men, in their rough cloth Sunday suits, old men and young, with tanned, grave, thoughtful faces, for the most part listening keenly to every word the preacher said in his quiet, earnest manner. And the women—the poorest peasantry were these, yet all in their bright, quaint Hardanger costume—the married women with their great broad white caps puffed out twice the width of their heads, and with the straight white band across the forehead as if they were nuns; the unmarried with gaily brodered handkerchiefs over their heads, or their smooth hair uncovered, while they fold the handkerchief about the little psalm-book during the long periods of the sermon. And gaily beaded bodices, red or green and fair white sleeves and dark blue skirts, made up the Sunday array of wife and maid alike. The men all on one side, the women on the other, and children scattered among both with a bit of apple or of cake to keep them good and happy, and now and then a dog sagely straying up the central gangway disturbing no one, and seemingly observed of no one except the English stranger.

And the faces of the women under their quaint white caps—faces lined with care—were it the old widow whose grandchildren were there, or the young matron with the baby in her arms; for these were working women, women used to pull an oar with sturdy arm or to mow the hay on the mountain side, and carry the great bundles to the barn. But yet almost every face a face of power and thought and feeling—women to whom life was real, life was earnest, a long day of toil for scanty fare, but a solemn light of religion over it all, and such a trust in the love of our Father, which the preacher spoke about, as would go with them out of the church and be with them in all the labour of the week. Here one that seemed a Madonna, conqueror of sorrow, feeling the touch of Christ upon her life; there a young girl, brave and bold, not without a wild strain in her blood, but awed by the solemnity of the service and open of heart for the word which should bring the better light. One longed to be artist enough to draw some of those faces in the beautiful dignity of their peasant life.

And in that congregation there was not a trace of the conventional decorum we know so well in our churches. The children were not required to sit preternaturally still. The grown folk stood or sat as they could or as they listed. Every minute some one rose from a seat here or there, and signalled to one who had been standing to take his place. The moment I got in an old white-haired peasant wanted me to take his seat; and one could not but think of churches where appropriated sittings are jealously guarded and the stranger is regarded as an intruder. There was no conventional decorum, the congregation was never still; but no one yawned from first to last, and certainly no one slept except some little children, and they were allowed to sleep. And over the whole was an air of earnest interest, of devout and genuine sympathy, a look of finding help and strength and comfort in it all which must surely be an inspiration to the preacher.

I think the bitterness of controversy between Catholic and Protestant hardly reached those northern shores. At any rate, these Lutherans of Scandinavia do not hold a usage condemned simply because it is akin to Roman custom. The candles on the altar, the rude carved angel suspended from the ceiling, and bearing the christening-bowl, and now and then a gesture of the clergyman, whom they call a "priest," or a turn in the service, which they call a "mass," suggested that the Reformation had not been such a root-and-branch affair as it was nearer Italian latitudes. And yet the service was wonderfully simple—prayer and lesson and sermon. The "Our Father" twice at least repeated, and the psalmody—out of the national psalm-book—rugged and strong, sung not too tunefully and joined in by most without looking at the words, as though they had sung the same simple measures from their earliest days. And then at last it was over, and half the congregation walked out with a tramp that resounded through the wooden structure, and half pressed forward to see the carved angel lowered by a pulley, and three of the youngest comers to that vale baptized into the Christian fold.

One saw, I think, here Religion as a thing natural, not artificial, an institution real, not conventional, a sentiment universal not exceptional, the common heritage of those hills and vales, received from the fathers and their forebears as simply, and as surely as skill with the axe and with the oar.

And it is a very noble type of character that goes with this—how far cause of it, how far caused by it, I will not pretend to say. But it is a very beautiful and noble type. The Norseman is so simple in mind and life. His wants are so few, his temper is so cheerful, bright, and kindly. He is honest as the day, From hill to hill and from fiord to fiord there is a perfect trust between man and man. Public tolls are collected in boxes set upon the mountains without watch or guard to enforce them or to keep them safe. No one can come in contact with these people without feeling their instinctive courtesy and kindness. Their steady toil on that rude soil, where half an acre snatched from the rocks on the cliff-side is a goodly farm, must extort respect from every traveller. The thrift you see at every turn in the stacked wood and the well saved hay and corn is a lesson to all the world. And with all their rustic ways this peasantry are full of intelligence and refinement—a natural grace and dignity of mind and bearing—which have a strange fascination for visitors from other latitudes.

But above all, it is the simplicity of life and manner among these cousins of ours that has a lesson for all of us to-day. These folk are nearer kin of ours than any other population in the world that does not speak our tongue. And we see in them what the Englishman would be unspoiled by cities, uncorrupted by wealth and luxury, undivided into hierarchies of social rank, winning his daily bread from the wood and the field and the river, by the sweat of his brow and the cunning of his hand. And while we know that our great cities and vast manufactures and mighty stores of wealth have brought us much which is of true worth, and that it is a vain affectation to make light of their great good, yet we get a hint of virtues which have somewhat sickened in teeming

England, and virtues it would be no bad thing if we could nurse back into vigorous, and full-pulsed life.

One comes away from a land of simpler civilisation, such as that of which I have spoken, with many problems working in one's mind. Is it really inevitable that with enormous population and gigantic commerce and vast complexity of callings we should lose hold of the simpler mind that belongs to men who live in contact more direct with the forest and the soil and the sea? Is it inevitable that material progress should involve the pressure of countless thousands into squalid spaces, where nothing is green and nothing is clean, and the divine ministry of natural beauty is crushed out and destroyed? Does civilisation really mean that the majority of men and women shall be cubed up in stone boxes with no nature visible except above their heads and that stained and darkened by the profane smoke which has no awe even of God's blue sky? And is it necessary that the conditions of human life laid down by God should be twisted and complicated by a second code of law and sentiment overlaying the first conventional laws of society and rank which deaden nature and take the sweetness out of life? One comes home from touch with a simpler people in a less spoiled land, grateful indeed for innumerable comforts and adjuncts of life, ornaments of art and literature, conveniences of intercourse, refinements of habit, which have grown out of our more highly organised conditions—but yet feeling that we are in danger of losing some things which go far to give life its worth, and which those peasants, scattered so scantily over their vast mountain tracts, have firmer hold of than we. For what are the things after all that constitute the essence and the worth of life?

Why, after the necessities of the physical being, food, shelter, raiment, they are the pure and sweet affections that bind us in families and draw us together in friendships and the pure and sweet pleasures of the love of nature and of art and of science, and of literature, all crowned and consecrated by the love of God. And men may have all the good of the more complex civilisation, all the good wrought out of the labours of generations of statesmen and students and merchants and artisans, and yet retain all these more primitive elements of the joy and peace of life to the full, if they will. We have to set a guard on our tendency to luxuriousness, to set faces of brass against all abandonment of life to the pursuit of pleasure, to pray day and night that the inevitable struggle in the business of life may not make our hearts hard or our tempers selfish, to put from us every social sham and unreality, every faintest desire to appear richer than we are or to enter on the treadmill of social competition—and then, though London and Liverpool are so huge, and streets and squares and splendid shops stand where once were wood and moor, all the preciousness of life may be maintained, and fresh untainted souls will look out on the English hills through glad and undimmed eyes; and the song of life will sing itself still in multitudes of gentle English hearts; and the lads and lasses of many a generation yet to come will pluck the flowers in our green hedge-rows and fill the English homes with mirth. And the strong and brave will do a good day's work in the meridian of their life. And the old men's eyes will still look out on the salvation that lies in pure and honest and loving lives, and they will fold them to sleep when the summons comes with the peace of God lying at their hearts.

I think we all know men and women, and perhaps whole families, who in the midst of our English culture and all the conditions of our complex society, thus compel culture and civilisation to subserve the true, pure, sweet, and simple life in which lie a nation's health and strength and hope. In these is the hope of our race against all the pride and pretence and luxuriousness and greed which would sap the strength of our national existence. With a glance at that sturdy peasantry on those far north firds—with the picture of their simple sincerity of worship still in our hearts—let us pray God that we may be of the simple, honest, pure, and tender whose righteousness is the only power in the world which can truly exalt a nation.

MOTHER BICKERDYKE AS I KNEW HER.

By MRS. FLORENCE S. KELLOG, OF FAY, KANSAS.

(From the Chicago "Unity.")

III.

A NATION'S growth is measured by the heart-throbs of its people, by their heroic deeds, their achievements and aspirations, but still more truly by the lives of the common people, those whom Lincoln said "God must have loved or He would not have made so many of them"—and their

"Plain truth to manhood

And to God's supreme design."

Knowing this, I love to think what an uplift to home and national life was given by Mother Bickerdyke's life and by each one who lives and serves as she did. One life, though it be ever so true and beautiful, seems but as a tiny drop in the great ocean of life, and yet it has its mighty influence for all time—for eternity.

Mother Bickerdyke took responsibilities upon herself as freely as those of a different make would have shunned them. She never seemed happier than when work was piled about her "mountain high." This was a challenge to her to do her best, and she accepted it with cheerful courage and great good will, nor gave herself rest or pause until she had accomplished her purpose. Her mind moved quickly and its grasp seemed almost marvellous at times. It was as if she saw the end from the beginning and felt the thing that should be ever beating beneath the thing that was. Her comprehension of a situation was instant. She saw at once what was lacking and the way to supply it. She aimed high, realising

"Not failure, but low aim is crime"—and went straight and true to her mark. She did not overestimate her ability, but knew herself even as she knew others, and was as relentless and exacting of self as of others always. Her sympathy and help enlisted in any movement was at once a pledge and a promise of success. Her strong word went out over the deep waters of life and did not return unto her void. Her sublime faith was in the right, and the conquering might of right lay back of every act and lent to its success. Self was lost in the work before her, or how could she have done what she did? How else could she have gone into the pestilential hospitals at Fort Pickering, where the dread scourge of small-pox raged unchecked, and the conditions had become so bad that no other help could be obtained? She did not hesitate for one moment, though, as Mrs. Livermore tells us, the place had become "fouler and more noisome than an Augean stable. But Mother Bickerdyke was just the Hercules to cleanse it. She raised such a storm about the ears of the officials whose neglect had caused its terrible condition as took the heads off of some of them." Though her time and her strength had seemed fully occupied before, she added this one more thing and went to the loathsome place, with the same cheerfulness, the same undaunted courage that sustained her elsewhere. Surely the good angels must have shielded her—knowing our need of her and the great work still awaiting her doing.

Her reminiscent talk of her army life and work was always very entertaining. Though the boys in blue were her first care, she cared also for the boys in grey when they came in her way. The leaders in the rebellion—the "hot-heads" on either side who were quick to make occasion for war—she denounced, but never the private soldiers. Of the "rank and file" in the southern army she said, "They fought from duty and love of home; for what seemed to them true patriotism, just as our boys did, and they needed the same care when they were sick and wounded, I could not pass them by unheeded." So the great mother-heart went out to them, and her hands were ready in service to them also. She told interesting stories of the southern women who sometimes came into camp in quest of a relative or friend. One such, born and bred in luxury, with all her environment so different from that of a northern woman that she could not imagine a lady would work as she saw Mother Bickerdyke working, was very haughty and could scarce bear to speak to the plain "Yankee woman," who, in telling me the story, said: "I was getting dinner for some of my sick boys. I knew this woman was hungry—as so many of the brave southern women were in those days—and I fixed some food on a tray and offered it to her. She drew herself up haughtily, disdaining to touch food prepared by a 'Yankee.' 'Very well,' madame," I said, 'but there it is; you can eat it or let it alone as you please.' And, putting the tray down, I went on with my work. She had come to see her son, who, badly wounded, had been picked up and brought in with a lot of other poor fellows. Later, when she found I had cared for him just as I did for the others her pride and haughtiness gave way and she was the mother only. With tears running down her cheeks she came back to me, begging me to forgive her—poor soul! I'd nothing to forgive. I knew all about it. She thanked me over and over again, asked me if she might kiss me, and said, 'I did not know Northern women were like you.' A little later she asked me for the food she had at first refused. 'I do want it,' she said, 'for I am hungry—hungry.' She came often to camp after that and we became good friends. I was almost as glad as she was when her boy was nicely convalescent and she could take him home with her. There were, of course, some subjects of which we did not speak. Why should we speak of them? She was a southern woman and I a 'Yankee.' We could not see nor think alike. It is better to 'agree to disagree' in such cases, I think."

* * * * *

It was early in the memorable spring of 1861 that Mrs. Bickerdyke "enlisted for the war," though it was long after that that she was enrolled as a "regular"—and, even then, she drew no pay, but gave herself freely to the cause she had espoused.

Her first work was in the hospitals at Cairo, Illinois, where Miss Mary Stafford was also at work, trying to make more comfortable the four hundred or more men who were sick there of fevers of various kinds, measles and other diseases incidental to camp life.

Miss Stafford, as we can well imagine, welcomed Mother Bickerdyke with great joy and gladness and they worked together through several months.

Though she had seen much of the dreadful effects of battles, the first one she really witnessed was at Fort Donaldson, and here it was that she did what has been so often told in "song and story." It must be familiar to every one. Her voice would grow tender and a far-away look would come in her eyes when she spoke of it—as if again she was out under the midnight sky with her lantern, searching over that field, still thickly strewn with the unburied dead, lest somewhere among them one still alive might have been overlooked. "Oh, those dead faces! those staring, sightless eyes that no tender hand had closed! Young boys who should have been at home with their mothers—men everywhere cut down in the pride and bloom of manhood—I can never forget it all—never shut it away from my sight." It is known, too, that her brave search was rewarded by finding two young men yet alive, one of whom died soon after, but the other lived to return to his home in Dayton, Ohio. Think how he would tell the story there, and with what reverent love and gratitude those who loved him, and for whom she had saved him, would name her name! Think, too, in how many homes all over our beautiful land these scenes are duplicated—homes where she holds

"Such place in all men's thoughts that when they speak

Of great things done, or to be done, her name

Is ever on their lips."

At Fort Donaldson she assisted in the removal of the wounded to the different hospitals along the river, and did valiant work among them. At Paducah, Mound City, Pittsburg Landing, Savannah (Tenn.), Farmington, Inka, and Corinth, she went from hospital to hospital, laden always with "good things" for her "boys"—with material comforts of food and clothing, and the no less real if less material things that cheer and inspire the soul—words and deeds of love and mercy

Wherever she went order followed in her footsteps—disorder, inefficiency, wrong and injustice fled before her approach in ways that must seem no less than marvellous to those not understanding her character and resources.

Great quantities of "supplies," the making of which helped so much to relieve the weary months of waiting and anxiety for the women of the North, the loving but brave mothers, wives and daughters who waited and prayed at home while the fathers, husbands and brothers fought and fell on southern fields—were sent to her by sanitary commissions and other benevolent associations, supplies that she always put in the way of doing the greatest good to the greatest number possible, and that she gave out to the soldier-boys with many a cheering word of home and mother, thus giving them a greatly increased value and power for good. When these supplies ran short, as was sometimes inevitable, she would get a great ambulance wagon, and, with some convalescent soldier, or one detailed from the ranks for a driver, would go on long foraging expeditions into the surrounding country, returning laden with all manner of good things for the "inner man." The negroes everywhere were her friends and were glad and proud to give her fruits and vegetables from their "truck patches," and eggs, chickens, milk and butter from their storehouses. Her friends in the North sent her great boxes of clothing for her own use. She appreciated their kindness, but she kept only what she must have for herself, the rest she took with her when she went "foraging" and exchanged them for provisions for her boys.

It was not until in November, 1862, that she felt obliged to take a vacation, but it was not for long, and again in January, 1863, she said "good-bye" to her own loved ones and turned her steps southward, beginning her work at Memphis with renewed vigour and zeal. Her sons were well cared for in the school where she had placed them, and she felt herself free to do her work.

SOME THOUGHTS WHILE THE CHURCH WAS OPEN.

I HAD been reading THE INQUIRER on Saturday afternoon, and in one of the articles which interested me very much some words occurred which remained firmly in my mind. "We must know how to live."

So strong an influence had they made upon me that, during the Sunday morning, even into the church itself, they occupied my thoughts, which played upon them somewhat in this wise.

They reminded me of a great and wealthy city situated at the mouth of a river, on which could be seen almost at any hour large vessels bringing to and fro the produce of all lands; upon its quays and in its warehouses were food and material for clothing sufficient for an empire. I know its streets, I remembered that a third to a fourth of its population when I knew it, and not much change has taken place since, were dependent on casual earnings of unskilled labour, as they called the hard work of loading and lifting, and that 15s. per week was quite an average wage all the year round, out of which 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. per week had to be paid for what in most cases was a wretched apology for a house. I remembered houses, streets of them, four rooms in a house, and a family in each room, each family paying 2s. 6d. per week for its bedroom, sitting-room, working-room, study all in one, and I remembered the problems which faced those families. We must know how to live.

I had been living more recently near a colliery district. I had always associated the idea of a collier with that of a higher paid workman than many of his compeers, but I found that during a large part of the year three or four days a week were all that the pit was worked.

It was not deemed wise to put too much coal on the market, it might make it too cheap. So successful were the coal-owners in this policy that coal came in large quantities from other districts right into their preserves. Even in winter the collier works only five days in the week, as he seems to prefer having at least two days in the light, rather than spend all his time on his back in the mine. This curtailment of working hours tells hardly on the "pit-brow" man, who in the district I speak of earns 3s. 4d. per day for three or four and never more than five days a week, with 4s. to 4s. 6d. to pay for rent; any houses to be had for less were little better than pig-styes. Here again was the problem for solution, for these men had actually chosen to try to realise some of the real joys of life in the love of wife and children, but with 10s. to 16s. 8d. per week income, less 4s. for rent all the year round. How are we to know how to live? That was the urgent question. When I remembered that only about 2s. 6d. per ton out of the price paid for the coal by manufacturers and householders represented the payment for all the labour concerned in raising it out of the earth, the answer did not seem far to seek.

Then I thought of what I had seen and read of the payment to women workers in what are known especially as the "sweated industries," of twelve and fourteen hours' labour day after day, repaid by a few shillings every week, rarely reaching ten, while all the time the struggle for life goes on. We must know how to live.

The article which started my thinking appealed to Herbert Spencer. I thought I remembered something of what he said. When I returned home I found it. He says*: "Men who cannot live and move and have their being without the leave of others, cannot be equally free with those others."²

And again†: "It is very easy for you, O respectable citizen, seated in your easy chair, with your feet on the fender, to hold forth on the misconduct of the people, very easy for you to censure their extravagant and vicious habits, very easy for you to be a pattern of frugality, of rectitude, of sobriety. What else should you be? But what would you do if placed in the position of the labourer?"

How would those virtues of yours stand the wear and tear of poverty? Where would your prudence and self-denial be if you were deprived of all the hopes that now stimulate you, if you had no better prospect than that of the Dorsetshire farm servant, or that of the perpetually straitened stocking weaver, or that of the mill hand with his periodical suspension of work? Let us see you tied to an irksome employment from dawn till dusk, fed on meagre food, and scarce enough of that, with no place of recreation but the pot-house, and then let us see whether you would be as steady as you are."

My thoughts then turned to the churches now open, and to their effect on the problem—How to live? Churches of various ecclesiastical designations with which I was acquainted. Churches which charged 10s. or 20s. per year for the privilege of regularly praying to God within their exclusive walls. Rich churches which seemed most anxious to have pure philosophy retailed to them with a perfect accent, and the best music most tastefully rendered: poor churches struggling hard to keep up the support of a minister as educated as the one in the next parish by giving themselves up in the winter to dramatic performances, negro minstrel entertainments, and bazaars with cafés chantants. Then into my soul entered familiar words, yet seeming to be deep toned with a new reality, "For behold I create new heavens and a new earth." They shall not build and another inhabit, they shall not plant and another eat, for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and my chosen shall long enjoy the work of their hands." "If a brother or sister be naked and in lack of daily food, and one of you say unto them, 'Go in peace, be ye warmed and filled,' and yet ye give them not the things needful to the body, what doth it profit?" "Go and tell John again those things which ye do hear and see, the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good tidings preached to them."

"And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and soul, and not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things common."

Here my thoughts ended with a start, for was not this rank socialism? Nay, more, it was Communism. So I proceeded that very afternoon to a Socialist meeting, and intend to continue in that fellowship as the best means of solving the problem for most of my fellow men and women." "We must know how to live." And as I spoke to the careworn crowd of men and women with the marks of the world's harsh treatment plainly to be seen in form and face, I heard that same gracious voice once again in the spirit:—"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

ABERDEEN UNITARIAN CHURCH.

THE opening of our new church was in every respect a complete success.* The day was radiant with autumnal sunshine, the preacher was eloquent, and the congregations were large and eager. There was much in other churches to attract: many of them had special musical features in their services in honour of the University celebration, and there was an Extraordinary Service in King's College Chapel, in connection with the Quater-Centenary. We could not have had a more trying day for our opening, for, in addition to these church attractions the decorations for the King's visit lured people out of doors; but still even the extra seats provided for the occasion were occupied, and the church was quite full. Very animated and cordial the congregation looked. I was preoccupied with my part in the service, but as I led the Principal to the platform, I felt the welcome in the gaze that greeted us. The preacher was robed in his scarlet gown and hood, and his dignity was impressive. As a first act of devotion in the new building I began the service with prayer, and was glad to feel that there was perfect hearing all through the building. The opening hymn was No. 496 in the Essex Hall Hymnal—"God of our fathers hear our prayer," and, to the tune "Old Hundredth," the congregation sang it heartily. I read the lessons, and, after the anthem "God is a Spirit," Principal Carpenter engaged in prayer. Hymn No. 322—"Our Friend, our Brother, and our Lord"—led up to the sermon, which had for its theme, "The Church of the living God," and kept the audience in rapt attention during its delivery. The clear rich voice of the preacher and his earnest spirit and thought-laden words made his preaching very impressive.

In the evening the church was almost as full as it was in the morning. The largeness of the congregation was surprising on an evening so fine and with so much excitement on the streets. The extemporaneous delivery of the speaker was charming, and produced a profound effect.

There was much wonder regarding the new organ, but the highest expectations were exceeded. The instrument fits the stately building well. It is rich and sweet in tone, and has a harmonious and comprehensive variety of stops. Messrs. Wadsworth Bros. have certainly favoured us highly by so fine an instrument.

In the afternoon there was a children's service. The centre of the church was filled with glad children, rejoicing like their elders in the new meeting-place. They listened attentively to the address given by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, of Wakefield, on "Choosing." We had hoped that Professor Lanman, of Harvard University, would give the address, but he could not reach the city in time. I was ready to take his place, but Mr. Chalmers kindly volunteered, and almost on the impulse of the moment he chose his subject. His speaking was an unexpected service and was much enjoyed. Thus the bairns had their part in the dedication of the building.

The lecture on Monday, the 24th, was projected ere I realised that the city would be so much excited over the King's visit; and on going through the streets glowing with plenteous illuminations, I was afraid no one would come to it, but over a hundred were present. A report of the lecture in Bon-Accord said:—"Professor Lanman, who presided, holds the chair of Sanskrit in Harvard University, and is one of our most distinguished visitors. The lecturer touched the whole range of higher criticism with a skilful hand, and laid before his hearers a clear and convincing statement which would enable those who followed him to study the great theme for themselves. The closing part of the lecture, depicting Jesus as known in his life and work, was a masterpiece of portraiture, glowing with imagination, yet without the exaggeration so common to speakers on this fascinating theme. The occasion was unique, the contrast being striking between the crowded streets around, turned into fairyland by the illuminations, and the peaceful assemblage within, intently listening to two scholars of the highest culture happily brought together, and representing the old world and the new."

* A report of the opening meeting appeared in last week's INQUIRER.

The collections at the various meetings, augmented by donations of southern and local friends, amounted to nearly £150. The pleasant spell of sunny weather held good over the services of the second Sunday of the opening. To a large congregation the courageous minister of Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh—the Rev. John Glaspey, D.D.—preached in the forenoon on "The Divine Presence." He prefaced his sermon by a kindly expression of friendship and goodwill. In the evening the congregation was larger, and the sermon on "The Need of Vision" was listened to with absorbing interest. The fraternal act of the gracious preacher was one of rare bravery, and I appreciate it deeply. He may have to suffer for it, but it marks him as a heroic advocate and exemplar of brotherhood in religious aspiration and moral effort.

The spaciousness, freshness, and fine acoustic qualities of the church are matters of general admiration, and it is very gratifying to us that we now have a home worthy of our cause. We shall concentrate thought and effort on the most effective use of it on behalf of religion and morality, and shall have a very busy winter in it. The accounts for it are not fully made up, and we do not precisely know what debt we shall have. Its cost has considerably exceeded our calculations, but it justifies all that has been spent upon it, and we trust that its maintenance will not prove burdensome. Our members are giving generously and heartily, and their spirit is enthusiastic and unifying. I am glad to report a steady addition to the membership. Ere long, I hope, it will be double what it was in our old church.

I may mention that a very touching incident in last Sunday's forenoon service was the baptism of two infants, both boys, one being named Alexander Webster Stephen.

I rejoice in the good set-off we have had, and trust that it is the beginning of a new life for our cause in Aberdeen. We are looking forward to a crowded church on Wednesday next, when Dr. Hunter preaches.

ALEX. WEBSTER.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE busy season has begun, and from all quarters I hear reports of renewed activity. My letter can only give a few illustrations of efforts which are numerous and practically universal among our London congregations. Before mentioning them, however, I should record a piece of united action which will take place after these lines are written, but before they appear in print. On Wednesday this week (October 3), a Conference is to be held at the invitation of the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, when it is hoped that ministers and representatives of all the congregations will be present. The subject of the Conference is entirely practical—viz., the condition and prospects chiefly of our pioneer and smaller churches and suggested means of increasing their efficiency. The Committee has spared no pains to get together a large and living assembly, and much good should result—especially if the representatives are able at an early date to report to their respective congregations, and so draw the whole body of members into collective action upon their own problems, as well as others'. It is not enough that ones or twos should be imbued with zeal and energy. These will be found in every church, but the progress made will depend on the degree in which they are supported by the rest. This week's Conference should certainly be followed up by congregational conferences as soon as possible, specially summoned to consider our duties and devise plans.

The "Van" campaign, which has done so much to arouse workers in the North, has attracted keen interest in the South; and again and again I have heard men say, "We ought to have a van about here." Still better, I have heard it said, "I would gladly go round with a van as silent manager." The meeting at Essex Hall at Whitsuntide, when the Rev. T. P. Spedding gave his stirring account of the opening weeks of the campaign did much to stimulate this feeling, and the reports subsequently printed have kept alive the flame. The van must now go into winter quarters, but there are other missionary methods still at the disposal of our congregations. There are, doubtless, great numbers of people who are densely ignorant of our gospel. It is equally certain that to some of these, at least, the news of our gospel would be a new birth of thought and life. Every Unitarian, worthy of the name, desires to help his neighbour, and here is a conspicuous way to help. As for the Unitarians who are not worthy of the name, mere Ephraims joined to their idols, "let them alone." If the sight of the city, with its woes and dissipations, cannot move them to earnest effort, our reproaches will not. "Let them alone," and let us who are otherwise minded, keep our gospel as sweet and healthful as we can, a spirit of dauntless faith and wise work, renewed day by day.

It is satisfactory to be able to report that our pulpits are almost fully manned; indeed the only really vacant place is STRATFORD, where the system of "supplies" under the supervision of the missionary minister of the Provincial Assembly, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, appears to be the only practicable while it is a fairly adequate, provision for the services. Mr. E. Capleton continues the brave work at STEPNEY, which he took up in emergency some time ago; and at BERMONDSEY another layman, Mr. Jesse Hipperson, is working in succession to the Rev. Eustace Thompson, who left in August, for Belfast, with sincere good wishes and hearty gratitude for his labours in a rather stony field. In connection with the RHYL-STREET DOMESTIC MISSION (Kentish Town) a namesake (but no relation) of the Rev. Dr. Charles Read is temporarily to assist in the services and otherwise. Mr. Charles Read, the young layman thus called to missionary work, has the confidence of the Committee of the London Domestic Mission, and I hope the experiment will succeed. At PECKHAM, I understand that the Rev. G. Critchley is to have charge for a short period, pending more permanent arrangements. This is a good thing for the congregation, which indeed deserves well for its courage and fidelity under somewhat trying circumstances.

Mr. Critchley's name recalls the excellent service rendered by him at WIMBLEDON, where the pioneer work begun last winter under the District Society has clearly taken firm root. The services have recommenced at the smaller Worple Hall, an energetic local committee being in charge. It is gratifying to note that a large proportion of the supporters of the movement are, or have been, in connection with our Wandsworth congregation, itself a "pioneer movement" not so long ago. There is plenty of room between, three or four miles, and while the population around the older church grows denser every year, there is a distinct local life, at Wimbledon that renders it a peculiarly favourable scene of enterprise. The example of ACTON is encouraging. Since the opening of the iron church, in Creffield-road, the summer, long, glorious, but rather church-emptying, has intervened, and it is but now that the full benefits of the increased accommodation are manifest. In addition to the greater dignity of the Sunday services, the building affords house-room for meetings formerly scattered, and what with its Literary Society, Choral Society, and the Acton Social Union for the study of Social Questions (Sunday afternoons), the young congregation and the Rev. A. Hurn, their minister, seem to be fully employed. Of the new congregation gathering at SEVEN KINGS, in the far east, I have heard encouraging accounts, but I leave this to be reported upon by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the Provincial Missionary.

Lancashire friends will not need assuring that the Rev. Charles Roper is engaging in animated efforts at KILBURN. A variety of week-night lectures, reading circles, and classes are arranged for. Propagandist discourses are announced for Sunday evenings, and a comprehensive scheme has been formed for the dissemination of literature from house to house over a very wide district during the next twelve months. The big church has yet to be built, and so the ladies have been working most enthusiastically for a November sale of work. Similar efforts are, as heretofore, being made at LEWISHAM and PLUMSTEAD, where likewise the new church buildings are as yet un-built; and as regards the recommencement of classes, &c., the story given is, of course, one common to most, if not all of our churches.

The organisation of work at ESSEX CHURCH, Kensington, appears to be so good that I cannot forbear commending it to the notice of ministers and congregations generally. This church's means are undoubtedly greater than all can command; wealthy members find part of their æsthetic pleasure in adorning it; it has two ministers, both young and vigorous; its accessory buildings, though not ideally perfect, are adequate. But evidence abounds of the presence and unwearying interest of able men and women who loyally share the work of the church and support the pastoral lead. The affiliated societies are numerous, the printed announcements are carefully thought out and handsomely presented. If we had thirty such churches and congregations at the back of our staff of London ministers—well, things would be different. And I cannot but think that, with similar devotedness, even without the abundant means, things might be different with us. As everybody knows, the Rev. F. K. Freeston is engaged just now in a two months' pulpit exchange with the Rev. Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, U.S.A. We shall be sorry when the time comes to part with Dr. Crothers, whose happy spirit and tender wisdom have endeared him to so many up and down the country; but, grateful for his whole-hearted service amongst us, we shall send him to his own people, benefited, we trust, by his residence here, and bearing kindly remembrances of us who will kindly remember him. As for brother Freeston we all wish him a safe return, with only so much of Yankee accent caught as will impart added dignity to his speech.

I close with an item of immediate importance. The ISLINGTON congregation is about a work deserving loyal support throughout our circle. Additions and alterations to the school buildings are imperatively needed. The site adjoining the church is admirably situated as a centre of education and social work; the scheme proposed, to furnish class-rooms, &c., is a sensible one, and by no means extravagant. The total sum which they hope to raise, for this and other purposes, is £1,700. Already, nearly £1,000 has been subscribed by the congregation and friends, and a bazaar is to be held on October 18 to 20 next to raise the remainder. With the help of outside friends the success should be certain. That help will assuredly be the more cordially given because the new buildings will be known as "The Preston Memorial Hall." The late Mr. Joseph T. Preston, whose "long and faithful service to the cause of Liberal Christianity in North London" is thus to be commemorated, belonged to a family which, for generations, has contributed good workers to our cause. Some are entered into rest, and some, happily, are worthily carrying on the high traditions of their lineage. Mr. Joseph Preston himself set a fine example of devotion to his church and to our whole community. The honour due to the dead and the service due to the living demand a ready response to this appeal.

W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast: All Souls' Church.—A hundred years ago the Rev. W. H. Drummond, D.D., preached in the Second Church in Rosemary-street, at the opening of the organ, which was the first to be erected in a place of worship in Belfast. Last Sunday, his grandson, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, the minister of All Souls', which is the present representative of the Second Church, and still uses the organ, preached on the occasion of its centenary, a sermon from which we hope before long to be able to publish a considerable passage. The organ was originally opened on Sunday, Sept. 7, 1806, and the Belfast News Letter of the following Tuesday had this reference to the event:—"On Sunday last the new organ in the Second Congregation of Protestant Dissenters of Belfast was opened by Mr. Bunting, with the music of the Old 100th Psalm, the composition, as Handel said, of Martin Luther. The instrument was conducted with chaste gravity, suited to the simplicity of Presbyterian worship, and the finest effect produced by an admirable finger, directed by pure taste. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Drummond, and a large collection made for the support of the Dispensary and Fever Hospital, an institution which has produced the happiest effects by limiting the quantity and reducing the virulence of contagion. Though the hearers were many, the house being very crowded, a number of opulent ladies and gentlemen were absent, whose charity will, no doubt, be sent in, as usual on such occasions. The Right Honourable Lord Castlereagh was present in the uniform of his regiment, and assisted in receiving the collection after the sermon." On Sunday, Oct. 14 and 21, the Rev. James Drummond, Litt.D., DD., is to preach in All Souls' Church at both services.

Bolton: Bank street (Jubilee Services).—The Jubilee of the present Bank-street Chapel, to which we referred in a note last week, was celebrated last Sunday with special services, which were very largely attended. In the morning the choir sang the anthem, "Praise His Awful Name," from Spohr's "Last Judgment." The Rev. J. H. Weatherall began his morning sermon by quoting Schiller's saying, "To which religion do I belong? I answer, 'To no religion.' And wherefore to none. Because of religion itself." In the evening the anthem was Gaul's "I was glad." The Rev. J. H. Weatherall again preached. His sermon was a vindication of the Bank-street position by the test of 50 years of theological transition, and he quoted George Meredith's saying, "We have the world against us. It shall not keep us from trying to serve it." All the tickets for the reunion at the Baths Assembly Rooms on Wednesday were sold, and many more could have been disposed of, had the accommodation permitted.

Carlisle.—The winter activities at the Viaduct Church began last week with a lantern lecture on the English Lakes, by the Rev. A. Thornhill, and a musical party by Mrs. McAlister. Both were successful, the lecture being attended by over sixty persons, and the party achieving its purpose, which was to defray the cost of a cover for the new piano, now happily paid for. A junior guild and a children's hour are being organised, and several projects are on foot, with the object of avoiding a financial deficit. In these laudable efforts the congregation deserves the aid of distant friends, as, owing to heavy losses by death, the financial burden presses heavily upon this remote outpost of our faith. Last Sunday very successful harvest festival services were held, attracting unusually large congregations. A fruit banquet on Monday was equally successful, the total proceeds amounting to about £4 6s.

Chatham.—On Sunday, Sept. 23, the sermons at the Unitarian Church were preached by Dr. Bimal C. Ghosh, M.A.: in the morning taking as his subject, "Ancient Hindu Religious Ideals," and in the evening "The Meaning of Religion."

Coventry.—After being closed for two months for extensive renovation, the Great Meeting House was opened on Sunday, September 30, when the Rev. F. H. Jones, of Dr. Williams' Library, preached both morning and evening, his subjects being Religion and Charity. As part of the much needed renovation of the chapel, the fine oak of the interior has been freed from inartistic staining and has been polished. The organ has also been improved, and the walls pleasantly coloured. The trustees of the chapel have carefully seen to the interior of the building, placing incandescents, instead of the old system, where needed. On October 1 a most successful party and entertainment took place in the Sunday-school, when Mr. Jones gave an encouraging address.

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.—In addition to the harvest services noted under other headings, we have reports of successful services held at Congleton, where the Rev. J. E. Manning was the special preacher; at Scarborough, where the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, was the preacher; at Stannington, where the Rev. J. Ruddle, the resident minister, preached; and on Monday evening a service of song, "The Golden Glade," was rendered; and at Moss Side, Manchester, the Rev. A. C. Fox preached to large congregations; in the afternoon the Sunday scholars rendered the sacred cantata, "Under the Palms," and a collection was made in aid of the Blackpool Convalescent Home.

Liverpool: Hope street.—The annual soirée of the congregation was held in the Church Hall on Tuesday, Sept. 25, and proved a most enjoyable occasion. Mr. F. Robinson, who presided, said he was proud to belong to a reconciling church, the influence of which was probably greater than they thought, or than appeared on the surface. He referred with appreciation to the new supplementary hymn-book. The Rev. H. D. Roberts gave an address in which he spoke of many matters of congregational interest, both personal and in reference to future work, and gave, in conclusion, reasons why their members should pre-eminently possess a sturdier and more intense core of personal enthusiasm than others.

Liverpool Sunday-school Society.—The winter session opened with a devotional service at the Ancient Chapel on Thursday, September 27, above thirty members being present. The Rev. W. Reynolds conducted the service, and the Rev. Joseph Anderton gave a very helpful and beautiful address on "Love," showing how, in all our Sunday-school work, that was the essential thing; that by loving our scholars, and showing our love, we may teach them to love, first each other, then the beautiful things around them in the world, and finally bring them to love God, the Giver of all; for Love never faileth.

London: Islington.—On Thursday, September 27, Mr. J. H. Leigh generously gave a dramatic recital of "Hamlet," at Unity Church, on behalf of the Preston Memorial Building Fund. Mr. Leigh is no stranger in this school-room, and his powerful rendering of the play was warmly appreciated by the enthusiastic audience. The fund has two objects, the first being to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Joseph T. Preston, the "Father of Unity Church"; the second to provide means for enlarging and maintaining the accommodation of the Sunday-schools and social activities connected with the church. In aid of the fund a bazaar will be held in Myddleton Hall, Upper-street, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, October 18, 19, and 20. The openers, for the three days, will be successively Lady Durning-Lawrence, Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, and Mrs. Hahemann Epps. The minister and congregation have been working strenuously for the fund during the summer, and hope all friends who can possibly do so will be present at the bazaar, and help in clearing the stalls of the many beautiful articles already provided for them; but, as some of these are still insufficiently furnished, any gifts (which should be priced) would be gratefully received by Mrs. Savell Hicks, 26, Marquess-road, Canonbury, N.

London: Kentish Town.—On Friday evening, September 28, the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., gave an address in the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, on the "Crisis in the Christian Church," dealing with the subject from the intellectual and moral point of view. The address was preceded by a short service conducted by the minister, the Rev. F. Hankinson. The congregation and friends from neighbouring churches attended in large numbers, and the service and address were greatly appreciated. On Sunday the harvest services were held, conducted in the morning by the Rev. Dr. Cressey, and in the evening by the minister. Both services were well attended.

There are evidences that the untiring work of the Rev. F. Hankinson is bearing good fruit.

London: Mansford-street.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes in the October Calendar, after telling of the various activities about to be recommenced for the winter season at this vigorous Mission:—"In the midst of all the meetings which will occupy our rooms at the Mission every night of the week from Monday to Saturday, I hope the claims of the Sunday-school and the evening service on Sunday will not be forgotten. They are the most important of all our meetings. We still need two regular teachers to take two classes of boys on Sunday afternoons, and I should be glad to hear of others who would be willing to take a class occasionally in the absence of the regular teacher. 'Let us not forsake the assembling of ourselves together' for rest and worship."

Manchester: Longsight.—The harvest festival services were held on Sunday, September 30, conducted by the Rev. H. J. Rossington. In the afternoon the Lord Mayor of Manchester (Councillor Thewlis) gave an address. In the evening the choir rendered Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm: "O come, let us sing."

Mansfield: Old Meeting House.—On Sunday, Sept. 16, the annual harvest thanksgiving services were held, the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, B.A., the newly-appointed minister, officiating. There were good congregations, especially in the evening, the chapel being crowded. On Monday the annual congregational tea and welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Vaughan took place. Mr. J. E. Birks presided at the meeting, and on behalf of the congregation offered the new minister and his wife a most hearty welcome. Mr. J. Harrop White offered a welcome on behalf of the Sunday-school, the Rev. W. H. Burgess, B.A., of Loughborough, on behalf of the North Midland P. and U. Association, and the Rev. J. Carnegie, the minister of the Mansfield Methodist Free Church, in an eloquent speech, expressed the great pleasure it gave him to join in the welcome, and wish Mr. Vaughan every success in his ministry at Mansfield. The Rev. F. H. Vaughan, having thanked everybody present for their hearty welcome, Mr. C. H. King, of Hull, expressed the good wishes of the Hull congregation. Mr. J. Birks, as chapel warden, thanked the speakers, the visitors from other towns, and those who contributed to the musical part of the programme.

Sheffield.—On Saturday last, Sept. 29, the Quarterly Conference was held at the Attercliffe Unitarian School Church where a number of teachers and friends met at 3 p.m. to visit High Hazels Park, returning to the school church at 5 o'clock for tea, after which, a meeting was held at which about 40 persons were present. After the transaction of routine business, Miss Ida Bennett, the delegate from the Upper Chapel (Sheffield) to the Oxford Summer Session of S.S. Workers, gave a brief, bright, and pithy account of her visit. Following Miss Bennett's paper, an address on the subject of "Our Labour of Love" was given by the Rev. W. Stephens, of the Church of Our Father, Rotherham. A vote of thanks was proposed by Rev. C. J. Street and seconded by Rev. A. H. Dolphin, supported by Mr. W. Laycock, after which the meeting was open for discussion, in which several teachers and friends took part.

Stourbridge.—We have received only a belated report of the welcome to the Rev. Dr. J. Ewart as minister, which took place on Sunday and Monday, September 16 and 17. On the Sunday special services were conducted by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Bristol, and in the following evening a welcome meeting was held in the Music Rooms. Mr. J. Grosvenor Lee presided, and Mr. A. W. Worthington and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford and the Rev. A. H. Thomas the new minister's predecessor in the pulpit, and the Rev. A. H. Shelley, on behalf of the Midland Christian Union, all spoke in support of a resolution of welcome, which was carried with enthusiasm. Dr. Ewart, in the course of his reply, said that among the things he had felt in Stourbridge was that there were few critics of sermons, a feature different to the Scotch nation. In this work at Stourbridge he was going to keep two things in view in regard to his sermons. He was going to try to be as simple as possible, and in the second place he was going to try to be short. There were other things which the chapel must carry on. If all the members of the congregation were as enthusiastic as some ten they would have a new hall in six months. There were other interests besides their souls, and in order to faithfully discharge these they must have a hall, and they would have a hall. It was all very well to form high hopes. It was dangerous to form high hopes unless they carried them out. He promised them he would do his best to help them to carry them out, but a minister was helpless unless he was backed up by his congregation. If they would do their best to make their congregation a success and a place of light and leading in the town; then, with God's help, he would.

Unitarian Van Mission.—After the week-night meetings at Royton and Shaw, the van paid a visit to Oldham on Sunday by the invitation of the minister, who undertook to give an address at the close of his evening service indoors. The site secured was an excellent one, not far from the chapel, and a splendid meeting in perfect weather was begun at 8 o'clock and concluded at 9. A large body of the congregation gathered round with several members of the choir. The lay missionary conducted the devotional part of the service, and the Rev. J. A. Pearson addressed a congregation numbering between 500 and 600. At his request three collecting boxes were taken round for freewill offerings on behalf of the funds of the mission, and a record, both in the number of coins and amount realised, was the gratifying result.

JAMES MARTINEAU

THE STORY OF HIS LIFE.

By ALFRED HALL, M.A.

THIS little book has been written in the hope that it will be welcome to young people who ought to know something of James Martineau, whose thinking has had and continues to have a powerful influence upon the best religious life of our time; also to busy people who have not time to read the larger biographies published.

The Christian Register (Boston, U.S.A.) says:—

"This little volume, which may easily be read in an evening, omits of course very much that may be found in the ample biographies of this remarkable man. It is likely, however, to be read by far more people than those, and thus serve a ministry their fulness forbids. Small as it is, however, it brings together the more salient details of Martineau's career in a style, though compact, yet lucid. The author warmly admires, yet is he restrained in his utterance. He is little disposed to criticise, yet abstains from exaggerated praise. The book is designed more especially for the young, yet it is one that the father may read to his children to the improvement of himself, and the minister may ponder to the renewal of his consecration. What a treasure for a young man's birthday!"
